It is notable, in this connection, that London-based financial interests and their allies in the British government were responsible for development of the plantation slave system in the United States during the 1815-1860 period, and were directly responsible for promoting and indeed almost creating the U.S. Civil War. Although Great Britain formally acknowledged U.S. independence at the Treaty of Paris in 1783, the United Kingdom did not in fact recognize U.S. sovereignty in practice until negotiations between Her Majesty's government and the administration of Abraham Lincoln in 1863.

It was under the dangerous circumstances of the 1815-1863 period, the period in which British power was predominantly committed to subverting and crushing our nation, that the administration of President Monroe steered through perilous political and military waters to the adoption of the so-called Monroe Doctrine.

Although the popular account of the Monroe Doctrine is that it was a de facto compact with Great Britain's naval power against Latin American intrusions by the Holy Alliance powers, those responsible for the Doctrine understood that the Holy Alliance powers were principally subjects of a British-controlled "concert of powers" on the European continent.

British Foreign Minister Canning had proposed to make de facto U.S.-British hegemony over the Western Hemisphere a treaty-agreement between His Majesty's government and the government of the United States. This would have been, in effect, U.S. granting to Great Britain official looting rights throughout Latin America. Thus, on the advice of Secretary of State John Quincy Adams, the United States declined the treaty offered by Canning.

However, the United States was in no position to make a direct confrontation with Great Britain. Hence, the Monroe Administration adopted the Monroe Doctrine, which had the double purpose of placating London while maintaining the principles of United States foreign policy doctrine for the time that the United States grew strong enough to enforce such a doctrine.

The principal distinction between the proposed treaty with Great Britain and the Monroe Doctrine was identified at that time by John Quincy Adams. The United States maintained the principle of unconditional sovereignty of new republics in the Western Hemisphere, whereas the British had a doctrine of "limited sovereignty," meaning British creation and destabilization of Latin American governments at its pleasure through British influence over such clients as Simon Bolivar.

This principal difference between Britain and the United States was most clearly expressed in the Maximilian affair, in which the combined naval forces of Great Britain, France, and Spain overthrew the legitimate Benito Juarez republican government of Mexico as part of a looting effort of debt collection against the subjugated people of Mexico.

There were two elements in the influential thinking of John Quincy Adams behind the Monroe Doctrine. First, there were extensive precedents in United States foreign policy, as notably expressed in preceding treaties for the policy of absolute sovereignty of new American republics. More fundamentally, from the political movement associated with Benjamin Franklin and his collaborators leading into the American Revolution and in the establishment of the United States as a federal republic, the principal issue between the United States and His Majesty's government was American commitment to the realization of technological progress in industrial and agricultural development, in opposition to the British policy, as set forth in Adam Smith's colonialist policy in the Wealth of Nations, of keeping England's colonies and competitors in a condition of ruralized labor-intensive relative technological backwardness.

The foreign and domestic policy of the founders of the United States, from the roots of the American Revolution through the election of 1828, was the constitutional principle that the proper basis for government and law of a republic was the development of the wealth and culture of the people through promoting an environment of technological progress in discovery, in the expansion of industry and agriculture, and in the educational and free-press policies of the nation. The establishment of sovereign republics committed to those principles and enjoying the benefits of such principles is the purpose and essence of the establishment of the United States and its order of constitutional law.

Over the intervening decades, and most notably during the present century, a growing bulk of fraudulent reinterpretation of United States history has been popularized both inside the United States and abroad. The false report has been circulated that the English Plantations and republic of eighteenth century North Americans was principally an aggregation of rough, semiliterate frontiersmen. In fact, despite the efforts of the British government and allied financial interests to prevent the people of this nation from acquiring the capital needed for industrial development, our people were the most literate in the world, with a much higher level of popular culture than existed either in England or in France. It was that literacy and other factors of the superior popular culture of the English-speaking people of North America which made the American Revolution and establishment of the constitutional Federal republic possible, where efforts to the same effect failed in both England and France. Although the early United States lacked the capital resources of Great Britain, wherever our people's passion for science and technological progress were given outlets, our technical accomplishments, such as those of Robert Fulton, were conspicuously in advance of what was generally possible in the poorer level of popular culture then available in England.

Although our forefathers were largely of British origins, they represented in kernel the most advanced impulses from among the British people, who had founded societies on these shores to the purpose of establishing political and cultural forms not generally possible in the oppressive and politically backward England. This nation drew skilled persons from England, from France and other European nations, seeking here the possibility for the freer and more fruitful expression of their productive powers.

It was on the basis of those impulses and principles that the United States was founded and the foundations established for this nation's growth to great economic power.

In the early successes of the American republic and in the comparable failures of the French Revolution, a fundamental principle was demonstrated.

In the struggle between Federalist Thomas Paine and other friends of Benjamin Franklin, on the one side of the French Revolution, and in the associates of Robespierre on the other side, the allies of Paine sought to establish France as a republic committed to scientific and technological progress under constitutional principles modeled on the lessons of the United States experience. The followers of Robespierre's faction, including British agents Danton and Marat, offered an opposite conception, mob democracy. It was the success of the latter faction which produced the hideous Red Terror in France, and led to the Napoleonic period through which British hegemony over Europe was established for most of the 19th century.

This demonstrated that the "American System" works, while the British system, and political forms derived from Rousseau and Bentham's "philosophical radicalism," led to chaos and dictatorship.

The principle underlying the success of the American System is that in a climate of freedom and cultural development of the individual focused upon objectives of technological progress, the individual member of society is encouraged to value himself or herself for his or her creative mental powers, his or her ability to discover, transmit, enrich, and practice new scientific and related conceptions through which man's dominion over nature is advanced. By so placing the valuation of the individual upon that creative mental power which fundamentally distinguishes man from such lower beasts to baboons, the individual member of a republic committed to technological progress develops respect for his or her own mind, and for the mental potentials of his fellow citizens.

This policy and cultural circumstance has two consequences essential for a republic. First, a climate of technologically progressive popular culture and education is the indispensable means for raising the productive powers of labor, which is in turn the fundamental human basis for enhancing the prosperity of the nation and its individual members. Second, the practical emphasis such a republic places on the individual human mind's creative potentials provides the basis for the prevalence of moral values consistent with the needs of humanity, and consistent with the quality of general electorate a republic requires.

The antitechnological progress prejudices associated with both the doctrines of Rousseau and those of Jeremy Bentham are intrinsically what we call today Malthusian or neomalthusian. In these latter anti-American conceptions the human individual is degraded politically and morally to likeness with a lower beast. He is degraded to the status of a mere biological individual, with more or less fixed potentialities and impulses attributed to him, just as the needs and behavior of lower beasts is apparently determined from generation to generation by a fixed generic heritage. Just as the judge who sent the great Lavoisier to the Red Terror's guillotine said, "The revolution has no need of men of science," so the Malthusians and their cothinkers degrade man generally to a lower beast-likeness fit only to find his miserable peace with existing natural conditions, and to propose political utopias in which man returns to baboon-likeness in harmony with some more primitive condition of the ecology.

It was America as the symbol and reality of the principle of technological progress which made America the cynosure of oppressed Europeans fleeing from relative zero growth to the land of opportunity here. Although we have often deviated from that principle in our foreign and domestic policies, it is the perpetuation of the American System despite those deviations which has given our nation its greatness and power, a power which depends for its perpetuation upon a repudiation of both what our forefathers regarded as the British system and of the antitechnological doctrines of philosophical radicalism traced in part to Rousseau and Jeremy Bentham.

It is therefore the historical and still imperative fundamental policy of the United States to base its domestic and foreign policy upon the principles of the American System. That is the viable continuing principle embedded in the Monroe Doctrine, and the proper basis for our policy toward Panama and other Latin American nations today.

The guiding principle at the basis of United States foreign policy is to foster sovereign republics committed to the fulfillment of the humanist principles of technological progress and the cultural development of their populations. We do not arrogate to ourselves as a nation the right to determine the internal political processes of those nations, but we do assume responsibility for the effects of our foreign policy in determining the climate in which nations pursue their internal development.

Thus, in the United States' treaty relations with Panama, it would be an abomination if such treaties promoted the circumstances under which the internal life of Panama favored atrocities of the sort symbolized by the Red Terror of Danton and Marat in 1792-1794 France. It is the vital self interest of the United States that its neighboring countries be viable republics, which those nations cannot accomplish without the circumstances favorable to technological progress in the expansion of their industry and agriculture. It is our vital interest, insofar as our means and other relevant circumstances allow, to afford to the struggling weaker republics of this hemisphere the kinds of friend in ourselves our own new republic desired during the late 18th and early 19th century.

In this connection, some critics of the treaty signed between the governments of the United States and Panama have raised the most relevant criticism that this treaty does not adequately consider Panama's need for a climate of technological progress, of fruitful capital formation in the progress of its industry and agriculture and in the corresponding advancement of the employment and cultural opportunities of its people. This criticism is a valuable one.

If we do indeed condone in Panama and other Latin American nations the conditions of raging sansculottism and the political philosophy of the culturally backward, desperate sansculottist mob, we are thus permitting the kids of internal developments out of which the ongoing succession of social-political chaos and dictatorship must tend to prevail. In the course of later events, we might lament and denounce such political transformations of these nations, although our errors in foreign policy might have been a major contributing cause behind such unfortunate developments.

A proper United States foreign policy does not mean an unending flow of charitable donations. The entirety of modern history, in particular, demonstrates that the proper combinations of productive capital and increasing of the productive powers of labor generally means a growth in both gross and net produced wealth in industry and agriculture in excess of the growth of debt service incurred by capital formation. We cannot arrogate to ourselves the prerogative of imposing such technological development policies upon sovereign nations, but we can shape our foreign policies toward nations to the effect of fostering the choice of a humanist, technological progress policy by those nations. In point of fact, most of the nations of the world would readily cooperate with such a United States policy.

We cannot, of course, take total responsibility for affording nations the external capital they require, but we are a powerful force in world affairs to the purpose of creating a general climate favorable to a humanist policy.

Other critics of the signed draft treaty between the governments of Panama and the United States, including governments friendly to the United States in this hemisphere, have expressed emphatic concern respecting elements of the treaty which appear, in their estimation, to undermine the principle of sovereignty.

There are two things to be done in response to that criticism.

We must, firstly, emphasize the included principle of the Monroe Doctrine, that the sovereignty of the republics of this hemisphere may be breached only by act of war. We must especially emphasize that point because the British Empire and its political cothinkers down to the present day have never accepted the principle of sovereignty for nations, especially not toward the nations of the southern portion of the globe. We must also emphasize that principle of the Monroe Doctrine because some influential voices within the United States itself have lately proposed that the United States participate in adoption of a doctrine of limited sovereignty.

We must, secondly, emphasize the nature of the problem giving rise to those features of the draft treaty which are the focal point of the complaints made.

The Panama Canal Zone was established as an integral part of the procedures by which the nation of Panama was established, through United States' interests directly responsible for encouraging and generally making possible the separation of Panama from the nation of Colombia. At the outset, the nation of Panama was essentially a client state of the United States, and the Panama Canal Zone an integral arrangement for the very existence of that nation. To quote one influential United States figure, "We stole the Panama Canal fair and square."

However, history moves on. The nation of Panama, originally virtually a mere puppet state of the United States, has evolved into a nation, and with the special circumstance that the ostensible prosperity of the Canal Zone abuts directly the Central American poverty of the majority of Panamanians. With the aid of certain busy bodies from outside Panama, that contrast between the modern standards of the Canal Zone and the poverty of most Panamanians has been for over a decade the specific obsession of a political ferment centered around "New Left"-type, university and other students of Panama.

In this circumstance, two interests collide.

The Panama Canal remains a vital strategic economic and military interest of the United States. It is an important element of United States internal commerce, and without it the United States would be obliged to augment its naval and related forces most considerably.

At the same time, despite the efforts of the Panamanian government of Gen. Torrijos to maintain rational and friendly relations with the United States, he came into power in the sequel to student riots which destabilized and ended the lawful former government of that nation, and presides over a much enlarged student-led ferment of the same impulses. This unstable feature of the present internal situation in Panama, combined with a general destabilization among the countries of Central America, prompts the United States government and leading forces of the United States population to be concerned with the possibility and consequences of an overthrow of Gen. Torrijos's government by forces associated with the student "New Left."

Although we do not propose to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama, we have the right and obligation to take into account what effect internal forces such as those of the student-led ferment might have on the policies and practices of a future Panamanian government. It is our right and indeed our obligation to speak plainly on the subject of that student-centered ferment. It is essentially a sansculottist demagogues' movement in the tradition of the movements of Danton and Marat, a violent "New Left" formation of the philosophical-radical variety, of that variety which at one moment represents itself as "ultraleft" and at another proves to be a new variety of the fascist movements associated formerly with Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, a movement essentially characterized by irrationalism.

If those forces were to succeed in coming into power, the identified vital strategic interests of the United States would be indeed threatened. Moreover, whereas with the case of governments with whom we have differences, but which are committed to a rational perception of vital national interests, satisfactory negotiations will usually solve problems, with a government of forces which are essentially irrational, no such avenues of negotiations exist as efficient remedies.

Consequently, the majority of United States citizens, to the extent their spokesmen inform them of such facts, will not accept a simple relinquishment of the United States' rights in the Panama Canal Zone.

As long as that problem persists, the United States has no practical alternative but to establish treaty rights which establish protection of vital United States' interests in the operation of the Canal.

For related reasons, some political currents in the United States may miss the valid kernel in the objections put forth by the government of Mexico.

It could rightly be observed that the proposed treaty increases the effective sovereignty of the government of Panama in respect to the Canal Zone, as against no treaty at all. The point is nonetheless made that the treaty implicitly sets forth a doctrine of limited sovereignty, reaffirms that as an acceptable principle at this present time. Worse, that feature of the treaty is asserted at the same time that a significant number of influential voices are proposing the promulgation of a doctrine of limited sovereignty, and that the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, among others, have gone to new extremes in arrogating a principle of external limitations on the sovereignty of debtor nations. It is not that the draft treaty lessens the sovereignty of Panama; it accomplishes the exact opposite. It is that the inclusion of specifications with the effect of limited sovereignty in a current treaty is deemed an offensive act of policy at this present time.

This is also an important point among Latin Americans because of current efforts in some influential quarters to foment what is sometimes termed a "Second War of the Pacific" among Chile, Peru, Bolivia, Ecuador and other nations, and related matters in Central America, including the threatened outbreak of a Guatemalan-based adventure against Belize. The proposal of a Bolivian outlet to the Pacific and Ecuadorian access to the headwaters of the Amazon River are connected to the cited features of the Panama treaty in not only the minds of some leading Latin Americans.

How do we, then, resolve this matter?

First, at the moment, relinquishing the vital interests of the United States in the Canal is, at best, a difficult proposition. Furthermore, as long as the threat of student-led overturns of the present government of Panama persist, going further in concessions than the treaty proposes is probably unacceptable to the relevant institutions of the United States.

However, we can significantly mitigate the difficulties involved in two ways. First, we can avow, as a ruling doctrine of United States policy, that the practical features of the current draft treaty with Panama are in no sense a precedent for a doctrine of limited sovereignty, and specifically disavow any United States support for forcible adjustment of the borders of Ecuador and Bolivia.

Second, we can respond to the viable criticisms of the treaty concerning the internal economic development of Panama. Those critics rightly point toward the fact that the present draft treaty will not work. U.S. Senate ratification of the treaty will not avoid a threatened destabilization of the present government of Panama; a general destabilization of Panama and adjoining nations of Central America is already underfoot and will continue whether or not the treaty is ratified. We must therefore supplement the treaty with measures within our proper means to aid the government of Panama in isolating and otherwise neutralizing the anti-humanist, student-led irrationalist forces in Panama. We must aid Panama in neutralizing and isolating the irrationalist forces of destabilization by arranging economic development programs of the sort which inspire and sustain that quality of humanist outlook for which the American Revolution was fought and the establishment of federal republic and constitution was effected.

The approach to the reassertion of the essential content of the Monroe Doctrine identified here is the appropriate road toward proper relations within the Americas, including further steps toward full solution of the problems interlinked with the Panama Canal.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Oct. 13, 1977]

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS SUPPORTS PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the American Jewish Congress recently called for "speedy ratification" of the Panama Canal Treaties, noting that the treaties "securely protect the interests of the United States and guarantee continued efficient operation of the canal."

The American Jewish Congress is a national human rights organization founded in 1916 by the revered Louis Brandeis, Rabbi Stephen Wise, and other American Jews to strengthen Jewish life in America and help Israel's people live in dignity and peace. The good work of this organization is well known in my State of California.

Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, president of the Congress, made a fine statement concerning the treaties, and I ask unanimous consent for his statement to be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

POSITION OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS ON RATIFICATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

The American Jewish Congress welcomes the recent signing of the proposed treaties between the United States and Panama. This occasion can serve as an admirable example and precedent demonstrating that even in difficult and complicated situations, direct negotiations between conflicting parties with a sincere desire to avoid confrontation can result in compromise and resolution.

The proffered treaties acknowledge and take account of the sovereignty of the Republic of Panama over the Canal Zone. At the same time they securely protect the interests of the United States and guarantee continued efficient operation of the Canal. Most important, they carefully assure the long-term neutrality of the Canal and its continued, unobstructed availability for use by the United States and all other nations.

The American Jewish Congress supports the proposed treaties as correctly reflecting the legitimate aspirations, goals and obligations of both our own country and the Republic of Panama. We urge the speedy ratification of the pacts by the Senate, confident that such action will underscore our nation's long-held commitment to the preservation of peace and the protection of the rights of sovereignty of all states.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations continued hearings on the Panama Canal treaties today receiving testimony from the following witnesses: Lane Kirkland, AFL-CIO, appearing on behalf of George Meany; Martin Gerber, United Auto Workers; Panelists from the Canal Zone: Alfred J. Graham, AFL-CIO, Canal Zone Central Labor Union & Metal Trades Council; Capt. J. R. Williams, Panama Canal Pilots' Association; Rene C. Lioejanje, Central & South America National Maritime Union; John Fred Schlafly, American Council for World Freedom; Gary L. Jarmin, The American Conservative Union; Dr. Herminio Portell-Vila, American Security Council; Hon. Hamilton Fish, former Congressman from New York.

I ask unanimous consent that the prepared text of the statements of these witnesses be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF GEORGE MEANY

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you to urge approval by the Senate of the Panama Canal treaties.

We of the AFL-CIO have a vital interest in these treaties both as citizens, concerned with the security and welfare of our country, and as trade unionists, representing thousands of workers employed in the Canal Zone.

At its last meeting, on August 29 and 30, the AFL-CIO Executive Council discussed the Panama Canal treaties at some length. Following this discussion and analysis of the summary terms of the treaties, the Council unanimously adopted the following statement:

"After thirteen years of on-again, off-again negotiations between the governments of the United States and Panama, two treaties have been agreed to which radically alter the Panama Canal Treaty of 1903.

"According to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the treaties of 1977 provide for continuing freedom of action of the United States to maintain neutrality of the Canal and further guarantee U.S. access and rights to use all land and water areas and installations necessary for the defense of the Canal through the year 2000.

"Job security and rights of workers in the Canal Zone, both U.S. and Panamanian, will be assured. Since 1949, the AFL has called for justice in the Canal Zone in arguing for equal pay for equal work, so that Panamanian citizens would not be exploited through a double standard of remuneration. Through the years, particularly during the long and arduous periods of negotiations groping toward a new treaty, the AFL-CIO has maintained a vigilant stance concerning workers' rights in the Canal Zone and the safekeeping of the elements of U.S. defense inherent in the Panama Canal Agreement.

"We are satisfied that the new treaties cover both considerations adequately. U.S. citizens now employed in the Canal Zone will be protected and remunerated as U.S. government employees and will be offered new benefits tailored to fit the new treaty characteristics, such as early retirement.

"After reviewing the summary of the new treaties, and based on the assumption that it is an accurate reflection of the final treaty language, which is not yet available, the AFL-CIO Executive Council views the two Panama Canal Treaties guaranteeing the permanent neutrality of the Canal and the operation and defense of the Canal through the year 2000, as instruments worthy of support by U.S. citizens and their elected representatives. These new instruments constitute a just and enduring basis for harmony in the Western Hemisphere, and we support their ratification by the Senate."

Mr. Chairman, our position is based on practical grounds, in the light of the circumstances of the modern world, and the conviction that we have more to gain today, in terms of the broad interests and ideals of the United States, then we have to lose, by approval of these treaties.

In the public debate of recent weeks over the wisdom of these treaties, some arguments have drawn attention to the dubious circumstances surrounding the original treaty of 1903. I do not propose to rehash that question, for it has no bearing on our position.

While historically interesting, revisionist aspersions on the role of this country in a by-gone era are scarcely relevant to the issues actually before you. Adverse judgments by this generation on the actions of another generation in another world, three-quarters of a century ago, may excite the moralism of some but they have little persuasive appeal to our members today. Nor are latter-day efforts to portray Theodore Roosevelt as some sort of an international brigand likely to rally broad public support behind these treaties.

In fact, the Panama Canal treaty was renegotiated twice, in 1936 and in 1955, with duly constituted Panamanian governments, with significant modifications in its terms and increases in annual compensation to Panama.

In no way should the treaties now before you be painted or regarded as acts of atonement for American "guilt", for we are guilty of nothing. On the contrary, the construction and operation of the Panama Canal by the United States was and is an extraordinary service to humanity and to all the maritime nations of the world. The American people have every right and reason to continue to regard this as a proud chapter in our history, as has been taught to school children for generations. And I, for one, deeply deplore and resent the campaign by Latin American demagogues, and by our own guilt-mongers, to condemn it as a locus of American "imperialism" or "racism", as was put forward at the ILO last June.

But the time has now come to bring to the fore another aspect of American pride; our pride in the fact that we are not and do not want to become an old-time colonial power, clutching a sort of cloudy, semi-sovereignty over this strip of territory, for its own sake, like some faded banner of past glory.

Our real interest in this canal is simple and concrete and derives from its only real purpose and function. The function of the Panama Canal is to offer transit to the vessels of all nations (which can fit into its locks) from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean. That is all.

Mr. Chairman, I accept as valid the assurances by the President of the United States, supported by the Secretaries of Defense and State and by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that the terms of the treaties afford adequate guarantees that this function will continue to be performed without let or hindrance and that there is no serious risk, as a consequence of these treaties, that American vessels, commercial or military, will ever be deprived of full access to this vital passageway between the oceans. I have no reason, in the face of those solemn and expert assurances, to interpose any less-informed judgment to the contrary.

Beyond that, I believe that the continued assertion of sovereignty, for no definable further reason, over a narrow strip of land, inside and dividing the territory of another country, would not, in the modern world, be an asset, but could on the other hand, be a liability.

Mr. Chairman, speaking for the AFL-CIO, we therefore support and strongly urge the approval of the Panama Canal treaties.

STATEMENT OF MARTIN GERBER

INTRODUCTION

My name is Martin Gerber. I am a Vice President of the United States Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) and I office at 800 East Jefferson Ave., Detroit, Michigan 48214. I am accompanied by Stephen I. Schlossberg, UAW Director of Government and Public Affairs.

The UAW is the largest industrial union in the world. We represent approximately a million and a half workers and their families. Our members are concentrated mainly in the automobile, aerospace, and agricultural implement industries. Taken together with their wives and children, UAW represents more than 4½ million persons throughout the United States and Canada. These workers are organized into some 1400 Local, self-governing unions.

The UAW does much more than bargain for its members. It is active in world, national and civil affairs and citizenship and legislative activities, conducts schools and camps for active members, and drop-in centers for retired members. We are, by mandate of our constitution and tradition, deeply involved in the larger issues of the quality of life of war and peace and morality in foreign policy.

UAW'S PARTICULAR INTEREST IN THE CANAL ISSUE

The UAW takes its position in favor of the Canal Treaties as a group of United States citizens interested in furthering and protecting United States interests in the Canal and in the Western Hemisphere. As you probably are aware, we do not have members of our union working on a regular basis in the Canal Zone. Therefore, we do not come to you as a special interest group. Rather, our concern is on a much larger scale. We are deeply concerned that the United States project an image abroad which truly reflects the nature of our country and the fundamental principles for which this nation has stood for the past two centuries. We are also concerned with maintaining efficient international transportation routes to speed international trade, and with our defense posture. Our examination indicates that the Treaties now before you protect our interests in all of these areas.

They represent a giant step forward in the relationships which the United States maintains not only with the Republic of Panama but with all of Latin America and indeed with the entire Third World. They show that the United States does not wish to deport itself as the world's larger nations did earlier in this century. Rather it is the intention of the United States to establish relationships with other countries based on fairness and mutual respect. It is not our intention to force our views on other countries nor to make them supine before us. We seek equality and justice, not superiority in our relations with others. These Treaties show that we both believe in and practice the fundamental principles on which our country was founded and under which we have lived since our own revolution.

The UAW International Executive Board acted in 1975 on the issue on the Panama Canal, urging then that the United States control over the Canal be phased out over a period of years. A similar resolution was passed by our more than 3,000 delegates at the 25th Constitutional Convention in May of this year. These resolutions were not adopted in a vacuum. They were based on our considered judgment as to what was morally right and in the best interests of the United States and on our findings growing out of constant and ongoing relationship with free trade unionists in Latin America, many of whom have suffered persecution, and free trade unionists all over the world.

August 30th of this year, our International Executive Board unanimously passed the following resolution:

"After 13 difficult years of negotiation, the United States and Panama have reached agreement on a treaty that would, over an agreed upon phase-out period, cede to Panama, between now and the year 2000, full sovereignty over the Panama Canal.

"The UAW supports this long overdue diplomatic effort and finds it consistent with the position we adopted in September, 1975, that U.S. control over the Canal should be phased out over an appropriate period. We urge the Senate to ratify this treaty promptly.

"It is clear that the draft agreement provides fully for the defense and safety of the United States, as well as the Canal itself and for labor and commercial interests connected with the operation of the Canal.

"We are assured by no less an authority than the Joint Chiefs of Staff that the proposed treaty gives the United States the necessary rights and powers to defend the Canal, guarantees our complete access to it and preserves its vital neutrality. We have even been assured of a role in the building of any new sea level canals in Panama. United States Navy and supply ships will have priority, when necessary, in the use of the Canal. We will, under these understandings, maintain naval bases there until the year 2000 and, moreover, the power, after the year 2000 to protect the integrity of the Canal.

"It is appropriate that the United States, a nation which was founded in a revolt against colonialism, takes this cooperative initiative to end the Canal Zone's status as an American colony.

"The Isthmian Treaty of 1903, which created the colonial enclave known as the Canal Zone, was signed between the United States and a Frenchman, Philippe Bunau-Varilla, without participation by Panama.

"The negotiations just completed should, when the treaty is ratified, not only improve relations with Panama significantly, but with Latin America generally. Many countries there have regarded the U.S. conduct in Panama as an obsolete relic of the past.

"This treaty could lead to a new era of cooperation and stability. It proves that United States initiatives in such vital areas of life as human rights are not mere rhetoric.

"The Panama Canal Company, under the treaty, will be operated by a board of directors consisting of five Americans and four Panamanians and administered by an American with a Panamanian deputy until 1990, when the positions would be reversed. Thus, for the immediate future and beyond, the American presence will be constructive and continuing.

"Those employed by the Panama Canal Company and/or the American government, both American and Panamanian, would continue to work in the Canal Zone and would have complete protection, including benefits tailored to the special circumstances presented by the treaty. They would have the same rights and privileges as U.S. government employees overseas, although three years from ratification they would be subject to some Panamanian laws.

"The U.S. Senate should reject the unfounded propaganda barrage from the far right and those who have been misinformed and misled by the reactionaries.

"The Senate should overwhelmingly approve the proposed treaty because it adequately provides for U.S. interests as well as those of Panama and the rest of the world."

We do not agree with those who say that ending what we see as colonialism in Panama is a sign of weakness. On the contrary, we view the United States phasing out of control over the Canal Zone and the Canal—the tearing down of the fences and the ceding of full sovereignty over its land to a small nation—as a signal of strength, maturity, and enlightened self-interest. Only a major, secure power could make such a gesture. It is evidence of the internal and external national will to practice what we preach and to walk honorably in the world. It is those who are independently strong and powerful who can afford to do what is right. Doing what is right in this case happens also to be in our own self interest. If we are to continue to lead the free world, we must do so by commanding the respect and admiration of the world's nations and peoples—not by flaunting our size, wealth and power. International politics is not a game of virility and manhood testing. It is the pursuit of national self-interest, in the broadest sense, by means of reason and common sense.

A recent article in the UAW publication, Solidarity, contains two significant interviews with UAW members. The article reports:

"Manuel Felix, 50, a member of Local 1183 in Newark, Del., recalled that 'the original treaty was signed by a government that only lasted two weeks. Most major governments of the world have given up direct colonialism, and we shouldn't hang on to it. The Panamanians must have the Canal to feel they are no longer a colony.

"Being from Mexico, I realize how they feel. From what I've read, our rights are fully protected by the treaty. If we don't ratify the treaty, world opinion will severely castigate us as a colonial power * * * and if you light a fuse, you get an explosion."

"His views were echoed by Dave Nicholson, 26, a committeeman for UAW Local 1975, Ypsilanti, Mich. "That land belonged to the people of what is now Panama before we took it, and it must be returned. The Panamanians have got the short end of the stick. Strategically, the canal is almost indefensible. Economically, it's rapidly being outmoded. The big new supertankers just can't get through it. Older shipping can continue to use the canal under the terms of the treaty. Our rights would be the same as any other country's. That's fine.

"A good friend of mine was raised in the Canal Zone. He says most Panamanians look at our presence there as U.S. manipulation of their political system.'"

NATIONAL DEFENSE OF THE U.S.

As an organization, we are concerned with the defense of our country. We believe that the United States must be militarily strong if it is to maintain a credible profile abroad. The treaties fully protect the United States defense interests in the Panama Canal. Our naval vessels will continue to be able to transit the Canal both during the time that we are responsible for its operation and the period thereafter.

This interest is, we believe better protected by the United States making certain changes with respect to the Canal's administration to take into account Panama's increasing aspirations. Indeed, we believe that failure to do this will present a threat to our defense posture. Increasing hostility to our operation of the Canal will make our job more difficult and could, if that hostility should rise to greater levels, pose a threat to the efficient functioning of the Canal.

There is no doubt that it is easier to protect the Canal against sabotage in a country with a friendly population than one in which a hostile people views our presence as an intrusion.

THE PERMANENT PROTECTION OF THE CANAL'S NEUTRALITY

We have heard much in the recent press of secret cables and of dispute as to the right of the United States, in perpetuity, to protect the neutrality of the Canal. I want now to present the UAW's view on that issue.

First of all, we respect and believe the President of the United States, the Secretary of State and the word of our military chiefs. We also believe the words of our trusted negotiators. Second, we believe in the inherent power of the United States, and the public statements our leaders have made absolutely commit us and, indeed, empower us to guarantee, permanently, that neutrality. Third, General Torrijos' own words lay this contention to rest. He has said that the Canal will be permanently "under the protective umbrella of the Pentagon." But we cannot expect too much of the other side. They have their treaty haters and difficult constituencies with which to deal. They have face-saving needs which a mature political democracy should be able to understand.

Fourth, defending the Canal against international attack is a defense task neither the Panama nor U.S. forces specifically stationed in Panama could by themselves undertake successfully. In World War II we were prepared to defend the Canal in areas far removed from the Zone itself, keeping enemy craft away from its approaches. In the nuclear age, we must depend even more on our overall hemispheric and global military posture to deter a specific strategic attack.

Fifth, in terms of U.S. defense interests, perhaps the most important aspect of these treaties is what they don't do—they do not limit in any way our ability to draw upon our whole range of military options to act in defense of the canal in any way we find necessary, not only during the duration of the Panama Canal Treaty, but thereafter into the 21st century. As a practical matter, we can, will and must defend the neutrality of the Canal.

Finally, I am a negotiator and know something about negotiation. In the final analysis, the real agreement rests on the strength and integrity of the parties and on what is promised and not promised—not on the unilateral claim or disclaim of one person on the negotiating team of one side. No one familiar with labor negotiations takes seriously an effort by a member of a management or union team to undermine public opinion by trying to draw doubts around a sphere of understandings. Sometimes it is in the best interests of both parties and the common good not to dot every "i" and cross every "t". Some things depend on reality and the facts of life.

While I am not an international lawyer, I am a negotiator. My reading of the public discussion of the Neutrality Treaty fails to show that substantial differences exist. The Panamanians, we must understand, have a political problem with anything which smacks of the right of the United States to take any action within their territory after the expiration of the Panama Canal Treaty. The Neutrality Treaty I would point out does not speak of intervention. It speaks only of maintaining the regime of neutrality. Comments by the Panamanian negotiators which have been published in the press indicate that Panama understands that the United States intends to assure the continued neutrality of the Canal after the year 2000. Panama's only reservation concerns the possibility of United States intervention in Panamanian internal affairs. Given the history of our relations with Panama and with Latin America, that concern is understandable. Moreover, as a trade unionist, I know that in many Latin American countries the word "intervention" has a sinister meaning. When a totalitarian government intervenes in the unions, it takes them over.

We should not be alarmed by statements from the Panamanian side on this subject. Indeed the absence of comments would be remarkable. We can have no right to intervene in any country. That is clear from both the UN Charter and from the OAS Charter. But under the Neutrality Treaty we do have the right to maintain the regime of neutrality of the Panama Canal. Our commercial and defense interest in the Canal is protected by this provision. Panama does not dispute our right to maintain the regime of neutrality. Therefore, the controversy is much ado about nothing.

Similarly there has been much discussion about the concept of expeditious passage contained in Article 6 of the Neutrality Treaty. Panama's negotiators have made clear that this means the speediest possible transit. I submit that a more rapid trip through the Canal than that would be difficult to arrange. I will leave it to the lawyers to debate these questions on a more sophisticated level. I merely wish to point out that in practical terms the Neutrality Treaty meets the test of being both sufficiently broad to cover various possible situations while at the same time being sufficiently precise so as to leave no doubts about the intention of the drafters.

PROTECTION OF THE GOVERNMENT AND PANAMA CANAL COMPANY EMPLOYEES

We are assured that the treaties adequately protect the economic security of those who are United States Citizens and Panamanians who have given long years of service to our Government and the Corporation. Our conclusions on this score do not rely entirely on government assurances but on conversations of UAW officials with Zone union officials.

The treaty provides job security for employees whose jobs are transferred to Panama. The same terms and conditions of employment will apply, and special provisions have been made concerning health and retirement benefits.

Of course, employees who are displaced are also of great importance. They should not be victimized by treaty provisions. For these employees—and the numbers should be relatively small—various options are provided: placement in other U.S. Government jobs, assistance in finding private sector positions, relocation allowances. Also, in view of the unique circumstances, the U.S. will provide a special optional early retirement program to all employees of the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone Government with liberalized entitlement and annuity provisions. This language is imprecise but I would hope that the implementing legislation will provide for retirement after 20 years of service with no reduction in annuity. I believe this is fair treatment to these employees who have worked hard to keep the Canal running efficiently and safely over the years. So from a labor point of view, we find the Treaty provides well for current employees who will remain with the Canal enterprise and who will be displaced.

COMMUNISM IN PANAMA

There has been much scare talk of the potential danger of Communist takeover of the Canal once the treaty is ratified. I am constrained to comment on that talk. I note, at the outset, that my information is that there are not many Communists in Panama.

I recently returned from Canada where I met and talked with one of the Separatist leaders in Quebec. Many dispassionate observers feel that the secession of the Province of Quebec would be tragic for Canada and also for Quebec itself. There is, however, some disagreement on the issue. But there is little disagreement that the treatment of the French speaking majority by the English speaking minority over the years bred this kind of response. There is similar breeding ground for dissension and internecine struggle in the history of Northern Ireland.

It has been said that those who don't learn by history are doomed to repeat it. If we remain as a foreign and chronic irritant, in short as a colonial, imperial power on the soil of Panama, continuing to fence off the country from the enclave, denying national dignity to the country, treating the Canal not as a resource we operate by treaty but as a personal possession, do we not by these attitudes and actions create a breeding ground for Communist and other totalitarian movements in Panama? We in the UAW have struggled with Communists over the years. We know that they generally oppose genuine reforms because the worse conditions are, the better their chances to grow and prosper.

Of course, no one can say with certainty what the future will bring, but reasonable people would have to agree that Communism in Panama would be deprived of a root issue upon which to build if the treaties are ratified. Conversely, a turn down would give the Communists a ready made and controlling issue to run with—not only in Panama, but all over Latin America.

The Senate should never forget that the Communists oppose the treaty. It is their people who are agitating in the streets of Panama against the treaty. Simply put, it is the Communists who are placing their bets on the emotionalism and the frenzy of the far right in this country. Doesn't that tell us something?

The most sensible course to set back the present Communism drive and to cut off the Communist future in Panama is to take away their main rallying cry by ratifying the treaties. In doing so, this country not only "sends a message" to Panama and to South America, it sends one to the Communists too.

NATIONALISM IN LATIN AMERICA

The single most powerful political sentiment in Latin America is not Communism, however, but the far more conservative passion of national pride . . . old-fashioned nationalism, just as it is in the U.S.A. Virtually all Latin Americans, irrespective of their political coloration, view the canal issue primarily in terms of "Yankee" respect for a small Central American republic.

Every Senator here—and in the Senate—understands deeply the meaning of American patriotism. Why then not extend in generosity and magnitude that same understanding to one of the smallest and militarily weak countries in the world—Panama?

Why not, in short, legitimize their own fierce devotion to country, to history, to culture and, finally, to belief in national pride?

BIPARTISANSHIP

The UAW headquarters is in Michigan. That state is our heartland. For that reason we take particular pride in the fact that spirit of Senator Vandenberg lives on.

It is true that the Republican National Committee and some of its leaders have joined the chorus of emotionalism and voted to oppose the treaties. But the spirit of bipartisanship in crucial foreign affairs decisions by this country is alive and well. Former President Ford and former Secretary of State Kissinger have shown the way to good sense bipartisanship in this delicate matter. They, along with other prominent Republicans such as the junior Senator from California have urged the ratification of these treaties. We are pleased too that such very conservative forces as those represented by the National Review and its editor, William Buckley have endorsed the treaties. Indeed, Mr. James Burnham writing in National Review has said:

"Judging by the probable consequences for our national security and interest, it is time for us to leave. In fact, the weakest feature of the new treaty is its failure to get us out soon enough."

Burnham predicts that, if the treaty fails, "the aftermath would probably be bad, and might be very bad both for the country and for those responsible for the rejection."

Garry Wills, the Journalist, has reminded us of the words of Samuel Johnson, a great conservative which are appropriate in considering the Canal issue today. Mr. Wills wrote:

"The pride of power has destroyed armies to gain or to keep unprofitable possessions. Those are the words of Dr. Johnson in 1771. He was attacking the foolish zeal of Englishmen who wanted to wage war with Spain in order to assert not only the possession of the Falkland Islands but sovereignty as well.

"The case is uncannily similar to our Panama Canal controversy. Johnson, the great conservative, was merciless against those who confused 'shame of deserting a project' with real loss, and who would risk the lives of men on the terms of a legal phrase. The question was not one of pride and sovereignty, he argued, but of use and cooperative gain. He mocked the men who 'profess to be disturbed by incredibilities.'"

And Wills also says:

"Those who say we would be capitulating to blackmail by accepting the treaty are like men who say they will not be 'blackmailed' by rain clouds into carrying an umbrella. They are not brave; just dumb."

THE ECONOMICS OF PANAMA

The United States is clearly on record against exploitation of small countries and in favor of the development and economic independence of the "have not" nations. How else do we square our foreign aid programs and our participation in multinational projects?

In the light of the above given, the new treaties become a national imperative not only for Panama, but also for the United States.

Perhaps it has been laid on the record before, in any event, I will do so now. Panama's major natural resource is the Canal, which, in the final analysis, is there because of Panama's geography. In 1970 118.9 millions of tons of cargo passed through the Canal. That year Canal profits were 175 million dollars, of which Panama received a pitiful one per cent—less than $2,000,000. In that same year the Empire State Building's net profits were more than $13 million. In 1976 the U.S. rented three military bases in Spain for $20 million a year. But how cheap is the rent on the Canal? Most of Panama's million and a half citizens live in abject poverty, while the world's richest and most powerful nation controls her major resource. By ratifying the treaties, the Senate will enable this small nation to help itself rather than to raise the income of the world's richest nation.

So, we should ratify these treaties not because of any abstract theory of morality but because in simple bread and butter decency terms. It is right, fair and long overdue.

CONCLUSION

The Treaties are of course negotiable documents. In negotiation, neither party gets all that it asks for. General Torrijos has been quoted as saying that Panama did not get as much in the Treaties as he expected. Treaty critics in both countries have concentrated their opposition on areas where compromises were required. But the measure of any agreement is whether it protects the vital interests of the parties. The answer in this instance is clearly yes as far as the United States is concerned.

Because United States defense and commercial interests are adequately protected and because it is in the enlightened self-interest of the United States and the people of the world, particularly those of Panama, we urge ratification of these treaties.

We see this a felicitous moment in history when moral values coincide with security interests. We must take full advantage of this opportunity.

STATEMENT OF CANAL ZONE LABOR UNION AND METAL TRADES COUNCIL

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, my name is Alfred J. Graham, President of the Canal Zone Central Labor Union and Metal Trades Council, AFL-CIO.

The CLU-MTC represents 14 local unions in the Canal Zone, affiliated with nine national AFL-CIO unions. We represent the largest organized group of U.S. citizen employees of the Panama Canal Co./Canal Zone Government. We also represent a significant number of non-U.S. citizen employees of the Company/Government.

Our presentation will be in two parts. The first part will cover Employee Privileges and Immunities along with labor provisions written into the Treaty. The first part has been submitted for the record. The second part will be an oral presentation to the Committee, on the Canal Zone, the Government employees working there, and the present and future interests of the United States in the Canal. We are U.S. Government Employee labor representatives. As such, our self-interests cannot overshadow the best interest of the United States in this matter. Our silence and acquiescence to the terms of this Treaty would surely put us in the position of parasites; "trading off" the best interests of the United States for "assurances" that our labor interests will be taken care of. The CLU-MTC refuses to take that position. Although, individually, we may differ in our approach to the problems of this Treaty, no CLU-MTC representative has, or will "trade off" the best interests of the United States in this matter.

EMPLOYEE PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

As written into the new Panama-U.S. Treaty, Employee Privileges and Immunities are for the most part satisfactory provided, of course, that one accepts in good faith these assurances of privileges and immunities given to us by our own government.

We are not satisfied with the lack of Treaty provisions that would solve the dual citizenship problem once and for all.

The Republic of Panama has a Citizenship Law that in our opinion was enacted for the sole purpose of harassing U.S. citizens born to American parents on the Isthmus of Panama. The law states that these Americans are Panamanian Citizens. The high officials of Panama have all indicated that these U.S. Employees will be treated as Panamanian Citizens. We requested that the Treaty stipulate that Panama will surrender all claim of Panamanian Citizenship, in the past and for the duration of the Treaty, on all U.S. Citizens born on the Isthmus of Panama, if the U.S. Citizen makes his or her intention known to the U.S. State Department. This request was denied. If Panama becomes sovereign over the Canal Zone these employees fear that they will be subject to further harassment from the Government of Panama. This apprehension is not without substance, citizens of Panama have no civil rights. At this time, with the Chairman's permission, I would like to present, for the record, the official position of our State Department in respect to these U.S. Citizens, dated March 4, 1975. Their position can be defined in one sentence extracted from this letter.

"Such persons continue to be Citizens of Panama although they may also be United States Citizens and are subject to the laws and regulations of that Country while residing there."

We are not satisfied with the lack of Treaty provisions that would provide for the transfer of employees who do not wish to live or work under the joint administration of the Panama Government. For U.S. Citizens, this benefit is at the option of the new agency, "The Canal Commission", which is composed of that Government. For non-U.S. Citizens this benefit is not provided for at all. Without these provisions, guaranteed before ratification, the Canal Zone will not be efficient, and it will not be secure.

LABOR PROVISIONS IN NEW PANAMA-U.S. TREATY

As a result of the July meeting of the AFL-CIO Panama Canal Committee, I was elected by the Committee and appointed by AFL-CIO President George Meany to be the AFL-CIO Labor Advisor to the U.S. Treaty Negotiating Team. I worked with the U.S. Treaty Team on Treaty labor provisions until August 26, 1977. Most of the labor provisions we required are included in the new Treaty.

One of the most important labor provisions, Optional Open-Ended Early Retirement, will require legislation. However, we are grateful for the attention President Carter and his staff gave this matter by stipulating that the U.S. Government would sponsor this legislation in the Treaty.

We face other labor problems with DOD. Canal Zone Government operations that will become DOD functions, if the Treaty is ratified, are in danger of losing the Washington, D.C. pay base and Canal Zone leave benefits. Canal Zone teachers, in particular, are left in limbo as to what their entire future employment status will be.

The loss of repatriation rights and leave benefits are other factors now under consideration by the present Company/Government, that may affect as much as 50 percent of the present U.S. work force, prior to the possible ratification of this Treaty. Were the worst of these proposals implemented at least half of the present U.S. work force would be economically forced to remain in the Canal awaiting possible transfer rights that will be administered at the option of the new Canal administrators, "The Canal Commission". The new Canal Treaty addresses itself to this problem. The Canal Zone Governor, the Department of the Army, the Department of State and other agencies affected by this Treaty, have all indicated, and have all gone on record in this hearing or others, that they are opposed to affording transfer of the present employees "at the option of these employees".

There is no mention in this Treaty as to whether or not, the employee who remains working in the Canal, will retain his present benefits cited above. The Treaty uses the phrase, "Conditions will be generally no less favorable."

This leads the Canal employee to believe that he or she will lose something. The question of course is what. This Treaty makes absolutely no mention of protections for employees who, in good faith, trains someone to take his or her job and then is pressured out of the system by "The Commission" who no longer needs their presence. It makes no mention of protections for employees scattered throughout the work force who cannot or will not live and work under the conditions of this dictatorship.

An employee who is guaranteed an early retirement or job transfer, at his or her own option, throughout the duration of this Treaty, not just those displaced immediately, but all employees, would not be as apprehensive about staying.

Only through these guarantees will the new agency be able to maintain the necessary and willing personnel required to make this "transition" efficient and effective. By a simple Executive Order, these transfer guarantees, can be effected.

LABOR LEGISLATION

We will be seeking labor legislation for the following:

1. Optional open-ended early retirement (15 years, 50 percent, no loss of annuity). A benefit that would greatly support the new agency in the retention of qualified employees through the transition period.
2. Unemployment compensation for non-U.S. employees.

CONCLUSION

Although, it would appear, except for those important issues cited above, that the Treaty provides sufficient labor protections we wish to go on record at this time opposing the new Panama-U.S. Treaty. President Meany does not speak for the affiliated local unions of the CLU-MTC when he supports this treaty.

President Meany's office is not aware, as we are, that the present provisions of this Treaty, by excluding all of the above, will not provide for the protection and efficiency of the Canal. The protection and efficiency of the Canal will directly depend upon whether or not the employees believe that they are being treated reasonably, and in good faith. They do not, generally, believe that they are.

This concludes the labor section of our testimony.

Legislative Representative Of The Canal Zone Central Labor Union and Metal Trades Council Statement Before The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Contrary to the statements of our negotiators, and others, we believe it an accurate statement when we say that our Executive Branch has decided that it is in the best interest of this Nation to sacrifice the Canal in favor of the continued presence of the multi-billion dollar private foreign investment in Latin America. This action appears to be based on the theory that the turnover of the Canal will somehow appease and stabilize Panama and the rest of Latin America, that a new and more modern relationship will exist once this Treaty has been ratified.

In order to promote this action, it has been necessary for our Executive Branch to reinterpret history and the Constitution of the United States; economically, materially, and militarily support an oppressive, racist dictatorship in the subjugation of the Panamanian people; apart from the Canal assets, expend even further billions in tax funds, and sacrifice the economic base and political freedom of the very non-U.S. and U.S. employees who maintain this Canal. By so doing, this action will destroy the very efficiency and security that this Canal is dependent upon.

We finally believe that the reasons given, by our negotiators for ratifying this Treaty are neither valid nor sound.

PAST HISTORY OF CANAL

There has been much commentary made that the 1903 Treaty was made, not with a Panamanian, but with a Frenchman, Philippe Bunau-Varilla, whose only interest was in recovering 40 million dollars promised to the bankrupt French Canal Company.

Little is mentioned of the fact that prior to entering into this 1903 Treaty, known as the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, the United States had entered into negotiations, and in good faith on our part did ratify the Hay-Herran Treaty with the then dictatorship Government of Colombia. Herran, the dictator's agent, agreed to the terms of this Treaty. But, this dictator was not dealing in good faith with the United States. After his personal agent had made an agreement for 10 million dollars, he decided to call an extraordinary meeting of the Colombian Senate for the sole purpose of rejecting the Hay-Herran Treaty, January 23, 1903, and to set the stage for further monetary negotiations on the matter.

It is interesting to note that the dictatorship of Colombia, in its very deposing of the lawfully elected President of that Country, used this very action as the reason for disbanding the Colombia legislature and thereby establishing himself as the supreme ruler of Colombia.

While this thinly masked shakedown was in progress, another of several previous Panamanian breakaway revolutions was set into play.

It was because of this Frenchman that the Panama Junta Government was able to secure 100,000 dollars to support and effect their revolution, and it was because of this help and this man's unique knowledge of the Congress and Executive Branch of the United States that he was appointed their Treaty negotiator. Without his help there could have been no revolution. By offering and effecting a new Treaty with the U.S., this Frenchman secured the independence of Panama. Contrary to statements otherwise on November 2, 1903 the U.S. Warship Nashville did not prevent Colombian troops from landing in Panama. In fact, they disembarked in full view of this Warship in Colon, Panama. The commanders of these Colombian troops crossed the Isthmus by train, were bribed with 10,000 dollars by the Panama Junta Government, returned to Colon and departed with their troops.

There has been much said of the unfortunate 1964 Panama riots in which 21 Panamanians were killed. These riots are presented, by our own negotiators as an act of nationalism when in fact, for the majority of these rioters, it was a chance to loot, steal and destroy property. They became unmanageable because the Panama Government refused to allow the Panama Guardia Nacional Police to enforce order in the streets of Panama. Little is said of the fact that the majority of the 21 Panamanians killed in these riots died of suffocation in a building in Panama that they themselves, or men like them, set on fire. They were found with their pockets stuffed with stolen monies.

It was not the Canal that was being threatened in 1964 and it is not the Canal that our negotiators are primarily trying to protect with this new Treaty today. It was, and is private foreign investment, and the expulsion of that investment in Panama and the rest of Latin America.

GOODWILL WITH THE PEOPLE OF LATIN AMERICA

Even apart from the allegations that there exists a Corps of Engineer Study, dated February, 1968 recommending that Panama should be ruled by a dictator, there is no doubt, at least in respect to Chile and Panama, that our Government relied upon and supported dictatorships in order to protect private foreign investment in these countries.

It is difficult not to notice that 90 percent of Latin America is composed of dictatorship governments. This Committee was given testimony that "Panama is not a full-blown democracy." It is, however, a full-blown racist dictatorship with a proven record of inefficiency and corruption.

It is the opinion of the CLU-MTC that President Carter's Treaty Signing Ceremony in Washington, D.C. set democracy in Latin America back 100 years. It amazes us to witness a U.S. President, with a Human Rights Platform gather together the largest group of anti-human rights dictators in Central and South America and honor them by signing a Treaty with another dictator. These dictators do not represent the people of their country, they impose their will by force of arms supplied in many cases by our own Government.

To the people of these countries, the President of the United States is the Champion of human rights and yet, by this one single act, he has repudiated their right to gain back these human rights. In Panama, this Treaty represents the last hope of the people of Panama for a return to a Democratic system of Government. These people will not soon forget that it was the United States that perpetuated this dictatorship.

GOOD FAITH FROM THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Ambassador Bunker and Mr. Linowitz have testified over and over again that the Canal Zone will be turned over to the People of Panama. This is what they label as "Educating" the American voter.

You can be assured that, even apart from the assets of the Canal, multi-billions of U.S. tax monies will not be turned over to the Panamanian "People". As usual with military dictators, the "People" will benefit little or nothing from this Treaty.

The American "People" will not benefit from this Treaty. Even the multi-national and banking interests will not gain the protections that they are seeking by this Treaty.

The Canal employees are being used as pawns in this Treaty according to a report submitted to our State Department in 1976. Mr. Chairman, you haven't read this report. I would like to submit it into the record of these hearings at this time. The State Department denies that this document represents their position, but yet every recommendation made in this report has been implemented. The recommendations given, range from influencing Canal labor and civil groups, with or without their knowledge, reeducating these employees through "manipulation" of the controlled news media, eliminating interference from the Canal Zone Company/Government, and the assistance of the Panama Government in all of the above. This report even has its own enemies list, of which of course I am a member. The object of this report is to use Canal Labor and civil groups to help sell this Treaty or to, at least, neutralize these groups.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit into the record, a protest letter dated September 21, 1977, to Congressman Zablocki, Chairman of the House International Relations Committee in which I describe the actors, and actions taken by our own State Department in which to comply with these objectives. Ambassador Jordan, and Mr. Linowitz are knowing principals to these actions at least.

If you still are not convinced that our Executive Branch has misrepresented the true objectives and benefits accrued from this Treaty, let me present several more issues that cannot be disputed.

Our Executive Branch has strongly emphasized that without this Treaty with this particular dictatorship, there will be sabotage in the Canal. They have not told this Committee that it was this dictatorship Government that bombed Canal Zone cars and buildings and that in a written protest letter from our State Department, delivered by Ambassador Jordan, our Government had "positive proof" that Guardia Nacional Officers participated in these bombings. This letter further specifically cautioned against the public disclosure of its contents.

They have not told this Committee that it was this dictatorship Government, substantiated by our own intelligence documentation, that have on a number of occasions planned and participated in riots against the Canal Zone and the U.S. Government.

They have not told this Committee that it is this dictatorship government, through its controlled mass news media, that is pouring out hate against the Canal and the U.S. Government.

They have not told this Committee these substantiated facts because they are engaged in a "siege attitude". They are protected by a presidency that is generally regarded as open and honest. They are not confronted with a hostile U.S. news media, and finally the full damage of their actions cannot be assessed until after this Treaty has been implemented.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion Mr. Chairman I wish to state as a labor representative that all I seek, if this Treaty is ratified, is that the Canal Employee retain his or her civil rights, as you and I know them, without being economically destroyed. If this position makes me dangerous to our State Department, and they have indicated that they consider me as such, then I strongly insist that there is something fatally wrong with our State Department's position in this matter. If they are allowed to continue in these repressive actions described above, then surely there must be a weakness in our system of Government. Civil Rights is not a conservative issue, nor is our rights in the Canal.

This issue is a non-partisan issue and should be labeled as such. I am dismayed that it is not.

I would be more than happy to answer any questions that this committee wishes to ask.

Thank you.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. J. R. WILLIAMS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I welcome this opportunity to provide certain employee related impressions on the new Panama Canal Treaty.

In order to further introduce myself to you, I have been a Panama Canal pilot for 11 years and possess a United States Coast Guard license as Master of Ocean Vessels, Unlimited Tonnage. I hold the rank of Commander in the United States Naval Reserve.

BACKGROUND

Although only recently of primary interest in the United States, the Panama Canal Treaty issue has been the dominant concern of employees for several years. Early in 1977, when a general outline of the Treaty began to emerge, the Panama Canal Pilots Association developed on active interest in what future situation pilots, and other employees, would be placed in a post-treaty environment characterized by two major changes to the current situation:

- (1) The elimination of United States political jurisdiction over the community.
- (2) An employee transition period that would be in progress for the entire life of the Treaty, which implies a reduced scope of employment and promotional opportunities for U.S. citizen workers. More importantly, however, the duration of the Treaty clearly stipulates a shorter career period that will profoundly influence the retention of newer employees in key positions.

A primary Treaty objective of the United States, and as expressed by our negotiators, is to keep the Canal open and efficiently operated for the benefit of all nations; certainly a worthy goal. An absolutely essential ingredient to its fulfillment will be the retention of a skilled work force that is dedicated to the Canal, competent, and highly motivated. Governor Parfitt's statement in this regard have already alerted you to this necessity.

The Pilots Association, therefore, in cooperation with other Canal Zone unions, sought to achieve Treaty language that recognized the unique situation created by the Treaty as it impacts upon the employees. This has been generally accomplished in two broad aspects; one being an early retirement concept, and second, a general provision for collective bargaining—as yet absent from the isthmian labor scene.

A very important characteristic that has typified employee union efforts during this period has been a mutual realization that our futures are as closely intertwined as our present interdependence. In this regard, Panama Canal pilots are only one of several essential categories of employees crucial to the operation of this international public utility. Further, these employees, and their families, constitute a community that is very dependent upon the continuation of good schools, medical care, and related services.

In short, gentlemen, we are all in the same boat.

SOME PROBLEMS THAT WE HAVE ENCOUNTERED

It has been, and continues to be, to some extent, extremely difficult to convince top management that the canal work force is career oriented; not the usual overseas employment that is rotational in nature, and that attracts a less committed type of individual.

For many employees on the waterway, particularly at the locks, where specialized skills are absolutely vital to the canal operation, the attitude has traditionally been demonstrated to be a highly motivated and professional one. The continuation of the Canal's efficiency is absolutely dependent upon this extraordinary degree of skilled dedication.

Pursuant to the retention of these, and other skilled employees, there will be required legislation consistent with the spirit of commitments made to employees, both in the Treaty and in Department of the Army Assurances.

Specifically important will be the development of a genuinely liberalized early retirement statute in keeping with Department of the Army intent to retain essential skills.

One personnel policy viewpoint of management pertinent to the period of a new Treaty, is to entice people to remain on the job with unspecified forms of premium pay. We are not opposed to this, of course, but our attitude becomes wary when it is clearly indicated that "at some point in time possibly these incentives would no longer be required, or would be adjusted for recruitment purposes as local skilled labor becomes available."

Being informed in advance that this viewpoint has a certain acceptance is helpful, but also causes an apprehension about management's intent once our skills become readily replaceable from the local labor pool.

Concluding this portion of my statement, I recommend that the gentlemen of this Committee obtain a report to the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company from the Personnel Committee of the Board, which was submitted last January. This report, we are informed, contains specific recommendations relating to employee matters, based upon board member perceptions of how Canal employees should be dealt with in a new Treaty.

IMPRESSIONS ON CHANGE IN JURISDICTION OVER THE CANAL ZONE

For most Canal Zone residents, the elimination of United States political jurisdiction over their communities is truly a profound change that will require individual and thoughtful adjustment by many, if not most, employees.

For second and third generation employees, this represents a complete alteration of their actual self-identity. This "crisis", such as it is, includes many Panamanians of West Indian origin, who have identified solely with a Canal Zone existence for their entire lives and English is that primary language.

However, most employees appear to be quietly developing an individual attitude that will cope with such an impending change. It is a very personal reaction that makes it nearly impossible to provide any sort of institutional or otherwise organized opinion.

These aspects, coupled with the fact that the jurisdictional change is not in keeping with the career expectations of most employees residing in the Canal Zone, is a very important fact that cannot be over-emphasized.

Recognizing this, however, it should be borne in mind that what was previously blind resistance to change has moderated considerably, to the point that a more open-minded tolerance to "wait and see" is now prevalent.

How many key employees, such as pilots, will terminate their employment if this Treaty enters into force? Preliminarily, our estimate is that perhaps fewer than five, possibly as many as ten, pilots would take steps to resign. This number could go much higher with the ranks of newer men, if legislative and related responses fall significantly short of expectations.

My conversations with other Canal Zone union officials provide a similar picture for other categories of employees.

This rather conditionally optimistic outlook on attrition of key employees should be received, however, by keeping in mind one very critically important element that will, to a great extent, determine the success of this Treaty. By this, I am referring to the necessity of a hospitable and cordial attitude towards former Zone residents by the Panamanian Government that translates into a spirit of active and harmonious cooperation in administering the affairs of the Canal.

That there is a realistically tolerant expectation of this development is probably a significant factor—among others—that has contributed to a marked reduction in the resignation rate of U.S. citizen employees.

The immediate post-Treaty transition era will obviously be a delicate period requiring the disciplined restraint and good judgment of all concerned.

A related aspect of this situation that should be recognized, however, is that in those categories of employment where loss of jobs is most likely to occur, the very generous application of severance benefits and priority transfer policies should govern in all cases. It is obvious that the extreme dislocation, coincident with loss of employment in this situation would justify such measures.

PANAMA CANAL PILOT REQUIREMENTS FOR THE FUTURE

The Panama Canal, compared with other major pilotage waters, presents a combination of navigational conditions that make for a very demanding shiphandling task; possibly the most difficult in the world.

Due to several reasons, including the prolonged and continuing uncertainty posed by this Treaty issue, there is a genuine concern, both by this Association and the Panama Canal Company, about the maintenance of a proficient pilot force with high professional standards that will assure the confidence of shipowners throughout the world.

Therefore, it is essential, in order to continue operating an efficient canal, that these high standards be maintained.

At present, Panama has very few pilot candidates ready to be trained. The Panamanian Government is aware of this, and is taking steps to train merchant marine officers at the recently established Escuela Nautica in Panama. The United States could assist in this situation by increasing the quota of Panamanian cadets eligible to attend the United States Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, New York.

There is one final observation on this subject that we would like to make, and stress its importance very heavily. That is the essential requirement for the United States to take every reasonable step to fulfill its Treaty obligations to the employees in order that no substantial exodus of pilots ensues. If, in reaction to a high resignation situation, short cuts or some form of "crisis management" were to be adopted to fill a sudden need for pilots, the resultant deterioration of professional standards—triggering even more resignations—could very well inhibit the ability of the Panama Canal to maintain its traditional high standards of performance.

CONCLUSION

Gentlemen, in these few pages, I have attempted to explain, with as much candor and precision as possible, the likelihood of a sufficiency of pilots, and other critically important workers, remaining employed in order to keep the Canal operating efficiently. If questions arise from my observations, I will attempt to answer them.

Concluding then, and conditioned by the viewpoints contained in this statement; the Treaty language, with its general recognition for the unique circumstances that it creates for employees, shows promise of providing a workable employee transition period.

STATEMENT OF RENE LIOEANJIE

I am Rene Lioeanjie, Regional Director for the National Maritime Union in Latin America and the Caribbean. I am appearing on behalf of the National Maritime Union, which represents approximately 7,000 workers of which approximately 98 percent are non-U.S. citizens, in all phases of the operation in the Canal Zone. These members are spread throughout the Panama Canal Company, Canal Zone Government, Department of the Army, Navy, Air Force and the Armed Forces Non-Appropriated Fund activities. These workers are employed in practically every bureau.

President George Meany of the AFL-CIO has expressed the views of organized labor with respect to the Panama Canal Treaty revisions.

The National Maritime Union's position has continually been since the beginning of the negotiations some 13 years ago, to do what we can as a labor union to look out for our members and leave the treaty negotiations to those experts in that field. Therefore, my brief comment is intended to reflect only on the labor guarantees and protections that are in the treaty for all Canal Zone employees.

Rather than enumerate and comment on every labor provision in the treaty, which we have been reviewing for some weeks, I shall summarize my comments by saying that it is our opinion that all of the employees employed in the Canal Zone will be adequately protected by the labor provisions in the treaty if unemployment benefits are extended to all employees in the Canal Zone that may be affected by the treaty and if the implementing legislation includes adequate open ended early optional retirement provisions for all employees.

Thank you Mr. Chairman. I shall attempt to answer any questions that you and the committee may have pertaining to these labor guarantees.

TESTIMONY OF FRED SCHLAFLY

My name is Fred Schlafly. I am a graduate of Georgetown University and Harvard Law School. I live in Alton, Illinois and practice law in the states of Illinois and Missouri. I am Chairman of the Emergency Task Force on the Panama Canal.

Here follows some of the many reasons why the United States Senate and House of Representatives should not ratify the treaty signed by President Carter and dictator Torrijos on September 7, 1977 calling for the surrender of our Canal and Canal Zone:

1. Starting in 1872 Presidential Commissions had repeatedly reported in favor of an American Canal through Nicaragua. In 1889 Congress chartered the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. On November 16, 1901 the Walker Commission, appointed by President Theodore Roosevelt, reported in favor of the Nicaragua route. This route took advantage of the large deep lake in Nicaragua and of the San Juan River. However, in 1902 the French offered to sell all the canal work they had done and the equipment they had in Panama for $40 million dollars. This persuaded President Roosevelt that Panama might be the most practicable route. The residents of Panama were rightly concerned that the proposed canal might be built in Nicaragua because of the much shorter distances involved for American shipping.

As soon as they seceded from Colombia they energetically started negotiations with the United States and drafted the November 18, 1903 Treaty which Congress approved on February 26, 1904. The words "in perpetuity" in this Treaty, which occur seven (7) times, were taken from the recommendation of the United States Isthmian Canal Commission made on January 18, 1902 to Congress that the "grant" for a Canal Zone should not be for a term of years but "in perpetuity." See Senate Document No. 123, 57th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 9. As a consequence, the "in perpetuity" words were embodied in the 1902 Spooner Act authorizing the purchase of the Canal Zone, and also in the November 18, 1903 Treaty with Panama.

2. After the United States started work on the Canal, a law suit was filed to enjoin Leslie M. Shaw, Secretary of the Treasury, from paying money for the construction of the Canal on the theory that the Canal Zone is not part of the territory of the United States. In 1907 in this case of Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24 at 32, 33, our Supreme Court unanimously decided that:

"The title to what may be called the Isthmian or canal zone, which, at the date of the act, was in the Republic of Colombia, passed by an act of secession to the newly formed Republic of Panama. . . . A treaty with it, ceding the canal zone, was duly ratified. 33 Stat. at L. 2234. Congress has passed several acts based upon the title of the United States. . . .

"Article 2 of the treaty, heretofore referred to, 'grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said Canal.' By Article 3, Panama 'grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article 2 of this agreement * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority.'

"* * * It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this nation, because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate."

In U.S. v. Husband Roach, 453 F.2d 1054, 1057 (1971) cert. denied 406 U.S. 935, the United States Court of Appeals held:

"The Canal Zone is a unincorporated territory of the United States."

Our State Department ignores these cases and tried to claim that "The United States does not own the Panama Canal Zone * * * under law we do not have sovereignty in Panama."

These assertions are contrary to the unanimous Supreme Court decision in Wilson v. Shaw and to the clear language of our 1903 Treaty with Panama which excluded Panama "in perpetuity" from "any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

3. In the case of Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, 324, 326 (1942) our Supreme Court held:

"Section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution confers upon Congress exclusively 'the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.'

"Since the Constitution places the authority to dispose of public lands exclusively in Congress, the executive's power to convey any interest in these lands must be traced to Congressional delegation of its authority."

Congress has not delegated to the Presidency its exclusive power to dispose of the public lands in Panama. Therefore, President Carter has no power to negotiate the Treaties he signed on September 7, 1977, before receiving such a delegation from Congress.

4. Besides the false argument that Panama has some kind of sovereignty over our Canal, the Carter administration also claims that, if we don't surrender the Canal, the Panamanians might destroy it by guerrilla warfare. The first answer is that our very powerful enemies in World War II were unable to destroy or injure the Canal, although they knew how vital it was to move our troops and ships. Second, Panamanians who plotted to destroy the Canal would probably be reported in advance because the Canal is Panama's chief source of income. Destruction of the Canal would bring poverty to Panama which now has the highest standard of living in Central America.

However, if the United States Congress approves the Carter-Torrijos Treaties then there will be opportunities for sabotage because the Canal Zone will disappear and the United States will lose ownership and share control of the forts and bases guarding our Canal and Canal Zone.

5. Paragraph 5 of Article IV of the Treaty obliges the United States: "to maintain its armed forces in the Republic of Panama in normal times at a level not in excess of that of the armed forces of the United States of America in the territory of the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty."

Annex A to article IV of the Treaty requires the United States to permit Panama to jointly control a long list of our defense sites and bases as soon as the Treaty is ratified. Three years later another list of United States facilities will come under joint control with Panama. Paragraph (3)(a) of Annex B of the Treaty provides that:

"Only the Flag of the Republic of Panama shall be flown in Military Areas of Coordination."

Supporters of the Treaty allege that the United States could recapture the Canal Zone if the Treaty is violated. To do so, the United States would itself have to violate the Treaty. Paragraph 5 of article IV limits the armed forces to a level "immediately prior to entry of force of this Treaty." To recapture the Canal Zone and the many bases which the treaty requires us to surrender to Panama would require forces much superior to our present forces and much loss of life in attempting to recapture our bases. Why expose our military men to these most unnecessary dangers? Furthermore, nothing in the Treaties prevents Torrijos from inviting Communist troops from Cuba or Russia to come to Panama to defend the Canal and its forts.

6. The chief contention of witnesses for the Treaty seems to be either that the United States took advantage of Panama in 1903 or that the 1903 Treaty is out of date. The United States generously paid in full every claimant. We paid $10 million dollars to the Republic of Panama, $40 million dollars to the French Canal Company for what it had done and for its equipment, millions to the property owners in the Canal Zone for the purchase of all their land and other property, and $25 million dollars to the Republic of Colombia. The historians say that the United States paid a total of $80 million for title to our Canal Zone. All these claimants acknowledged fair and full payment. However, in November 1946 Alger Hiss, then head of the Political Affairs Office of our State Department, who later served time for denying that he turned secret documents over to the Communists, sent a report to the United Nations in which he described the Canal Zone as one of America's "occupied territories." In the 1960's and 1970's our State Department has been repeating Alger Hiss' argument that the Panama Canal is not "the sovereign property of the United States," and also that the "Panama Canal is a colonial enclave." In terms of both price per acre and total price, the United States was far more generous to Panama than to all other sellers of land the United States bought, including the Louisiana Purchase, the Florida Purchase, the Alaska Purchase, and the Gadsden Purchase of New Mexico and Arizona, added together (House Doc. No. 474, 89th Congress p. 361.)

The Panama Canal Spillway reported on July 16, 1976 (Volume 14, No. 49) that the Canal benefits for fiscal year 1975 to Panama were $253,130,000. This gives Panama, with its 1.6 million population the highest per capita income in Central America, when it was the poorest country before the Canal was started.

It is a mistake to say that the United States pays "rental" for the Canal Zone. In 1903 the United States assumed the obligation of the Panama Railway Company for payment of its annuity, first made to Colombia and then to Panama, of $250,000 per year. Because of inflation the United States increased this annuity to $2,328,000.

7. The surrender of our Canal and Zone in Panama, proposed by President Carter and Ambassadors Bunker and Linowitz will cost the American taxpayers dearly. First, we will be giving up an asset for which our taxpayers paid approximately $7 billion dollars and which, with inflation, is now worth about $12 billion dollars. Second, Lieutenant General V. H. Krulak USMC (Ret.) in an article in the Strategic Review, 1976 Winter Issue, has described what surrender of the Panama Canal would mean to America in terms of our military security and financial costs:

"By closing down the canal at their own whim, [the Panamanians] could double the cost of maritime fuel for a voyage from the west to east coasts of the United States and more than double the average transit time from coast to coast. When it is realized that fully 8,000 ships a year carry cargo through the Canal, destined for U.S. ports, the resultant increase in retail costs of the commodities is evident.

"A common argument is that the Canal has largely lost its strategic value to the United States because our principal combatant ships are too large to get through the locks. Actually, a total of only 13 ships in the U.S. Navy have beams too great to permit passage through the waterway. The remainder of the fleet, some 470 ships—not to speak of an equal number in reserve—can use the Canal, and do so beautifully.

"Without absolute control of the Canal and the essential contiguous land, the United States could not accept the hazard of a one-ocean navy. It would be essential at once to initiate construction of fleets independently able to meet a crisis in either the Atlantic or Pacific—a massive expenditure which we are now spared only because of our control of the Canal."

8. Not only does the proposed Treaty give control of the Canal and Zone to Panama, but it requires us to pay Panama to take the Canal. From 1978 to the year 2000, Panama will receive $10 million per year in guaranteed cash, plus $10 million per year for police and other utilities, plus 30 cents for each ton going through the Canal, estimated at $50 million per year, plus an additional $10 million per year if Canal revenues permit.

In addition, Panama will receive Export-Import Bank credits of up to $200 million, up to $75 million in credits from the Agency for International Development, $20 million in credits from the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, and $50 million in military sales credits. This totals $345 million in loans guaranteed by the U.S. taxpayers.

In short the shippers, most of whom are Americans, will be paying Panama about $80 million per year, and American taxpayers will be putting up $345 million, in order to give Panama the privilege of taking our great American Canal away from us.

9. The question must be asked, cui bono? For whose good is this surrender of America's greatest single investment? Of course it is for the benefit of Marxist Torrijos who allows only one political party, which is the Communist Party, to operate in Panama.

The next biggest beneficiaries are the ten giant American banks who have loaned over $2 billion to the bankrupt Torrijos government.

The evidence not only indicates that these big banks are willing to let our Canal be transferred to Torrijos so that he gets funds to repay their loans, but that they furnished the agent to negotiate this surrender of our Canal.

President Carter appointed Mr. Sol Linowitz to negotiate the surrender of our Canal.

When Congressman Robert Dornan exposed Mr. Linowitz's conflict of interest as a director and member of the Executive Committee of the Marine Midland Bank of New York, which had loaned large sums to Panama after Torrijos became its dictator, Mr. Linowitz resigned, but instead of resigning as U.S. negotiator, he resigned his bank directorship.

10. On July 19, 1977, the Soviet Union and Panama signed an Economic Pact which gave the Communists:

1. The right to build, open and operate a bank in Panama;
2. The right to take advantage of the Colon Free Zone, which includes Old France Field in the Canal Zone, for the selling of Soviet merchandise; and
3. The right to construct a hydro-electric plant in Panama.

Former Commander-in-Chief, Pacific, Admiral John S. McCain testified on July 29, 1977 that the United States should reclaim Old France Field in our Canal Zone and use it as an air base to protect our Canal. Instead Torrijos has made it available to the Russians, seven weeks before he came to the White House to sign the Treaty giving him title to our Canal and Canal Zone.

11. We sympathize with the ten giant American banks who made large, uncollectible loans to the Torrijos dictatorship. Most of them have branches in Panama and should have been able to discover that the interest alone on Panama's debts take 38 percent of its income. Perhaps these banks relied on the unauthorized and never ratified Kissinger-Tack Agreement signed February 7, 1974 which talked of ceding all the U.S. territory in the Canal Zone to Panama.

The directors of these giant banks are a Who's Who of American business and finance. Could that explain why two of our country's best known public relations men, F. Clifton White, who worked for Senator Goldwater in his 1964 campaign for the Presidency, and Joseph Neopolitan, who worked for Vice President Humphrey's campaign for the Presidency in 1968, were hired for $200,000 to sell the surrender of our Panama Canal?

12. Some of these same giant banks were criticized for very large loans to Bert Lance and for selling to unwary buyers their New York City bonds of questionable value. It is certainly hoped that these ten leading American banks are not directly or indirectly involved in the high powered campaign, extending from the White House to a movie star in California, to persuade American taxpayers to approve the surrender of the greatest single construction and investment our country ever made, our Canal and American Zone in Panama. Another surrender, after the abandonment of our friends in Cuba, Southeast Asia, Angola, Mozambique, and our Monroe Doctrine, might be construed as the twilight of the great American Republic, which built the Canal for less than all the time and cost predictions.

STATEMENT BY GARY L. JARMIN

Mr. Chairman, the American Conservative Union appreciates the opportunity afforded by the committee to present our views with regard to the proposed Panama Canal Treaties. The ACU is the nation's largest conservative organization with over 100,000 members and 40 state affiliate chapters. The ACU is one of the leading organizations opposed to these treaties and has, as a part of this effort, established a "Task Force to Save the Panama Canal" headed by the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, Strom Thurmond.

We believe there are many valid reasons why these treaties should be rejected by the Senate, but chief among them is the problem of the contradictory interpretations by Panamanian and U.S. officials with regard to key provisions guaranteeing: (a) the United States the right to intervene to defend the canal; (b) preferential passage for U.S. warships in time of major conflict or war; (c) the neutrality of the canal; and (d) keeping it open under all circumstances (except in the case of natural disasters).

The major source for this conflict over interpretations is primarily based on the statement made by Panama's chief treaty negotiator, Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, before the Panamanian National Assembly on August 19th and the remarks by another of Panama's treaty negotiators, Carlos Lopez Guevara, as disclosed in a confidential State Department cable made public by Senator Robert Dole. The ACU, we feel is particularly justified in addressing this issue since it was the ACU which first obtained a copy of Dr. Escobar's speech as printed in the August 20th issue of Matutino, a Panamanian newspaper, translated these remarks and made them public on September 2nd by issuing numerous copies to many Senators, including some members of this committee, Congressmen, the media and others.

If there is no objection Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit for the record a full translation of Dr. Escobar's remarks made before the Panamanian National Assembly on August 19th:

TRANSLATION

"The original (American) position was that to reach an agreement with Panama there would have to be a neutrality treaty and a military treaty. The military treaty would be made before the end of this century to be operative after the year 2000. This kept the negotiations stalled for a long time, because Panama opposed the enactment of a military treaty. Such a treaty would have implied two things: First, the continued U.S. military presence in Panama after the end of the present treaty (2000); and second, the United States, as a great power, is a country frequently involved in wars in other parts of the world, and we did not want that, because of the existence of a military treaty, the future youth of our country to have to go fight in the American battlefields with the pretext that this related to the defense of the Panama Canal. This was a position that Panama maintained until the United States withdrew the idea of a military treaty. We were then able to negotiate a neutrality treaty alone.

With regard to the neutrality pact, the following situation arose: The United States asked if Panama would disagree with the idea of the Canal being neutral. We told them we didn't, that on the contrary, a long-standing aspiration of Panama had been that the Panama Canal would be neutral. They said that they wanted the Panama Canal to be neutral and we said we entirely agreed with them. Differences then arose only in what they understood by neutrality and what we understood by neutrality. They proposed that Panama and the United States declare that the Canal was neutral and that the United States would guarantee that neutrality. Panama was opposed to this concept, explaining that we did not want the United States to maintain a guarantee over the State of Panama, using the neutrality issue as an excuse. This was another source of debate that kept the negotiations stalled until the United States gave up the idea of its guaranteeing the Canal's neutrality.

Another of the positions they presented was that Panama must agree to maintain the Canal permanently neutral and permanently open. We told them that Panama could commit herself to maintain the Canal permanently neutral because that was her wish. Panama has no interest in having anything other than a neutral Canal, the Panama Canal, because otherwise the Isthmus of Panama could become a battlefield. But we said Panama could not promise to maintain the Canal permanently open because of three circumstances that might arise. One, because of natural causes; we explained that an earthquake could take place, for instance, which would close the Canal, and, in such a situation, Panama could not be under an obligation to keep it open. Another possibility was temporary disruptions—landslides could take place and the Canal would have to be closed to carry out clean up operations. The third possibility was that the Canal could become unprofitable for Panama; in such a situation, Panama could not be tied down to keeping open a canal which was not earning revenues. They (United States negotiators) accepted the first two reasons—natural causes and temporary disruptions—but they did not accept the third reason, lack of profits. This, too, kept the negotiations stalled for a long time.

They argued that if the Canal was not profitable, Panama could obtain money from the United States or the other countries that use the Canal to keep it open. We told them that when the new treaty with the United States ended, we did not want Panama to be under either direct or indirect obligation to turn to the United States or any other country to request money to keep the Canal open. Our respective positions remained unchanged until we reached the agreement I am about to describe. They said, we can't present to our Congress an article that states you will close the Canal because of insufficient revenues. And we said we could not present an article committing us to operating the Canal permanently when we have no way of knowing if the Canal someday will yield no profit. We finally agreed to eliminate that article, and so Panama was freed of the obligation to maintain the Canal open permanently. The negotiations then went exclusively to the issue of neutrality.

The United States then proposed that there be a neutrality treaty between Panama and the United States and no one else. Because they did not want for either the Russians, the Cubans or the Chinese—they said so exactly—to intervene in the neutrality of the Panama Canal. Our position was that neutrality didn't make any sense if limited to two countries as a result of a treaty between the United States and Panama and that we opposed the other countries not having the right to join in that treaty. They changed their position and agreed to allow the countries of the American continent (except for Cuba), but no others, to join. We said no, that this was meaningless, because in case of a war between the United States and Russia or China, those countries not being a part of the neutrality agreement would be under no commitment to respect the Canal or the Isthmus of Panama. That was another reason for long delays, until they finally accepted the idea that all the countries of the world could join the neutrality treaty.

Later, there arose the problem of choosing a forum for all the nations of the world to join the pact. We said it had to be done in the United Nations. They answered that they did not much like the idea of the United Nations because of their problems with the non-aligned countries, the Third World, the Arabs, etc. They proposed the O.A.S. We agreed, provided that this body only serve as a depository, as the physical location where all the nations of the world would sign the treaty, and that O.A.S. would have no say in determining which countries would sign. This was another cause for discussion. It was solved through a protocol of neutrality—that famous protocol which has been attacked as giving the United States the right to intervene in Panama by some who apparently read such a description in a Miami newspaper. This protocol is only a note* indicating the existence of the neutrality pact. It summarizes the agreement and sets down that country such-and-such agrees to abide by it. That is the famous protocol. It is the same thing as the neutrality treaty but in the form of a protocol (that is what it is called), and the O.A.S. is the depository.

Another issue was preferential right of way through the Canal for American warships. The Americans said that they had two problems. First, they had to please the Pentagon—they had to present it with something it liked so it would support the treaty; and second, that as they would be leaving Panama as soon as the treaty ended, they should be allowed at least that much, if nothing else, because they built the Canal. We pointed out that we recognized they had indeed built the Canal, but that writing in the neutrality pact that the United States warships would have preferential right of way over the rest of the vessels violated the neutrality treaty and that was contrary to the objective of the treaty we were negotiating. This was another cause for lengthy discussion and much analysis. They searching through their books and we searching through ours; they invoking their treaty writers and we invoking ours. This is how these discussions are carried out. Changing their position, they asked for preferential right of way during times when the United States was at war—originally they wanted it in times of peace and war—and that this right be granted only when requested by the ship's captain. We said no—that war time was the least appropriate moment to grant preferential passage right since it would be a violation of neutrality. After long discussions they accepted that U.S. warships could not be granted preferential rights. Then both countries set about looking for a formula which would not involve preferential rights, and we came to the agreement that the warships of the United States, in times of peace or in times of war, and the warships of Panama—we still don't have any now, but maybe by the year 2000 we will have some—will have the right to speedy passage through the Canal. This means that they will have the right to as rapid a passage as possible. We were able to agree on this because it's not in any country's interest to have another nation's warships delaying for long in its territorial waters; so the faster they go through, the better.

Another of the issues in the neutrality pact that we were—I should explain that I am giving you the true picture of what the neutrality agreement will consist of. We did not give in either to the American's insistence that the United States and Panama jointly declare the neutrality of the Canal. We said that the declaration of the Canal's neutrality was an act relating to Panama's sovereignty, and that it would have to be a unilateral declaration. After long discussion, they accepted that the declaration would be made by Panama alone, in other words, that Panama be the one to declare the Canal permanently neutral. They proposed that in our declaration we say that the state of neutrality was intended to prevent the Canal from becoming a theater of war. We answered that we were declaring the Canal neutral so that neither the Panama Canal nor the Isthmus of Panama would become a theater of war. They wanted to separate the Canal and the Isthmus. We told them that we could not do that, that the Canal was part of our Isthmus, and that our neutrality only made sense if it covered both the Canal and the rest of the country. We wouldn't be any better off if, rather than dropping a bomb in the canal, they dropped it, for example, on Ocu or Santiago. They accepted that the declaration of neutrality be worded in such a way that neither the Canal nor any part of the Isthmus of Panama could be the object of reprisals in the course of another nation's conflict.

The other point we made in relation to our concept of neutrality is that it is not a neutrality which will allow the United States ships to transit peacefully, but rather one which will allow ships flying all the flags in the world to transit peacefully, notwithstanding what country may be involved, its being a communist country, a fascist country, or a monarchy—that we were not insistent on its being a democratic country to allow it peaceful passage. And finally, that the pact was to be made between the two countries, and it is stated there that Panama declared the neutrality of the Canal, in the manner that I already explained to you, following the establishment of a neutrality pact with the United States and a commitment being made on the part of both nations to maintain that neutrality. This concept of maintaining the neutrality was that which replaced their original position of guaranteeing the neutrality. The upholding of the neutrality is indicated within the treaty and in the protocol all other countries are committing themselves to this protocol.

Later came a discussion on their proposal that the two countries commit themselves to upholding this neutrality under all circumstances. We said that if the phrase "under all circumstances" was included, two important exceptions would have to be made. The first was that this would apply only so long as internal order was not involved, since these are problems for one country or our national guard to address; and second, in the case of an attack on the Isthmus or the Panama Canal by a third country. This was cause for much discussion, and in the end, they preferred to leave out the phrase so that we would not include the exception. We also pointed out that the neutrality pact must indicate clearly that after the 31st of December 1999 at 12 o'clock noon—or at 12 noon as Edwin (Edwin Fabrega) says or at 12 midnight as Ahumada (Adolfo Ahumada) says—that from that date on, the American troops could not be in Panama. After much discussion, they said, "We don't like that phrase—that there can be Russian troops or Cuban troops." Then a proposal was made to change the phrase to read that from the 31st of December 1999 on only Panamanian troops could be stationed in Panama. We were in perfect agreement with them. They were happy, because they had been half-thinking that we are going to call in the Russians, and we were happy because one of our aspirations was precisely that our troops be the only ones here.

So this is the "problem" with the neutrality pact. (Sarcastic) The criticisms made of it—some that you have heard or have read—indicate that we give the United States the right to intervene in our country after the year 2000. These critics think that rights of intervention are granted in the treaty. To the great powers, no one gives the right of intervention; they intervene whenever they feel like it with or without a treaty. When they (the Americans) landed in Santo Domingo, they had no military treaty with Santo Domingo, nor had any right of intervention in Santo Domingo, and they landed anyway. But there are people here who think that it is in the articles of a code (law code) that tell a country if it has the right to intervene or not, and they don't know that it is the bayonets, the guns, and the atomic bomb that gives a country the strength to intervene. And so a country like the United States can land in Panama whenever it feels like it after the year 2000 with or without a neutrality pact. But it cannot land, for example, in Russia, even if Russia tells it to land. Those are the facts of the matter so that with the neutrality pact, we are not giving the United States the right of intervention. What we are giving is an assurance that the Canal will be permanently neutral, that we are not going to close the Canal so that their ships or this ship or that ship cannot go through. Why this neutrality pact? Because they are thinking, "By the year 2000 this country (Panama) may have gone socialist and become our (U.S.) enemy and we now want to make sure that even if they become socialist, they cannot close our passage."

And, frankly speaking, they do not need this neutrality pact to intervene or not intervene. They need it to present it to their Congress, to tell their Congress, "Look, we are giving the Canal to those Panamanians, but we retain the right to watch over it so that they behave themselves." That's the truth. It's an internal political problem; they are trying to solve an internal problem with a Congress intensely opposed to these negotiations and one which, in addition, includes members who have not been elected by the American people but rather who have become members of Congress of their own accord—these are certain Panamanians living here and others in Miami. (n.b. Referring to exiled people opposed to Torrijos' government.)

So about the neutrality pact, these are its real contents, distinguished Representatives. It was very carefully thought out, as you can see from my description of how its final form was arrived at. I might add that we feel very proud of the way the matter has been resolved. You should have seen the original draft they presented along with the military treaty. Agreeing totally to that would have been shameful; I would not have dared to sit at this table now to give you any kind of explanation if I'd brought with me their original draft for the military treaty and the neutrality treaty.

The other problem concerned the option for the construction of the sea level canal. Two months ago, almost on the day of the opening of the Alaskan pipeline, President Carter delivered a speech in which he said that his government was deeply interested in the construction of a sea level canal either through Panama or through another point in Central America, and right after President Carter's speech the American negotiators brought the question of the option to the negotiating table. During the earlier negotiations of 1966 and 1968 this issue had been intensely debated by the negotiators of that time, Doctor Diogenes de la Rosa and other since it was at that time that they (the Americans) were making the studies which they later completed and they wanted to speed up the time-table for possible construction. But in the present round of negotiations it appears they had put the problem aside until now, with President Carter's speech and the Alaskan oil.

And so the discussion of the option began. We talked about this option approximately two times and we arrived at no conclusion. Then came the Bogota conference.

There, the problem of the option truly made for a crisis, because there a very complete proposal was laid out for agreement by all the presidents, with Carter working through negotiators Linowitz and Bunker, and our side being represented by our Chancellor, Gonzales Revilla, and our negotiating team. The (U.S.) proposed that Panama have an option to build a sea level canal at an unspecified time, and second, that Panama commit herself to the idea that no other country could construct a sea level canal. They presented that proposal in Bogota, and we read it to the presidents. It was the proposal that the negotiators had brought and we read it to them, and as a result the negotiations between the two countries were broken off.

The General said in his statement that we had come to this Bogota conference to celebrate a new treaty only to find that we had come to a wake. There, the struggle between the two countries began, with Bogota taking part also, since the other presidents were meddling as if they were Panamanians too.

There was no way to reach an agreement on what they proposed. Panama's delegation wrote a proposal which met with general approval. Read word for word, it is more or less like this:

Article 3—The possibility of constructing a third set of locks or a sea level canal.

1. The Republic of Panama and the United States agree that a sea level canal could be important in the future or in the context of international relations.

Consequently, after its approval, the question of construction will be dealt with. There isn't even an option. The option relates only to studying the matter. We will sit down and analyze with the United States if it is feasible. If it is, the two countries will build it, maybe during the next 10 or 15 years. The generations of the future will be much more prepared. We do not give you a copy of the treaty because its release is pending on the announcement of President Carter and of General Torrijos, and its becoming an official document. We will publish it wholly when it does become (official), and we will debate it publicly.

The ones who cannot prove that this treaty is better than the one of 1903, that perpetuity is better, will have the problem. That the two million dollars a year is better than what is proposed now. We don't care if they say that General Torrijos is a dictator; those who are opposed and say that we are not revolutionaries—let them grab their knapsack and their grenades and go prove it with deeds.

CONTINUATION OF STATEMENT BY GARY L. JARMIN

In his speech, Dr. Escobar made eleven points about the Neutrality Treaty and its Protocol but, reduced to basics, four items stand out. First, the U.S. will not have any defense rights past the year 2000 and will not be the guarantor of the neutrality of the Canal. Second, U.S. warships will not get preferential treatment in terms of transiting the Canal, even in time of war, after the year 2000. Third, the Panamanians think that it will not be necessary for them to abide by the Neutrality Treaty in cases of foreign attack or internal disorder. In short, from the Panamanian standpoint, the U.S. role in Canal affairs will be very limited until 1999 and virtually non-existent thereafter, which is a far cry from what we have heard about how the Canal will be kept open and that adoption of this treaty will make it easier to defend our interests.

The question of interpretation is extremely crucial with respect to any treaty and, especially, with regard to this one. But just as important, what actually transpired during these negotiations, i.e., what original proposals were offered by both the U.S. and Panama, what was rejected by either side, why it was rejected and what was compromised, is something that must be fully disclosed in order to clearly understand the intentions, interpretation and strategic outlook of the respective parties (fortunately, Senator Howard Baker had the wisdom to request this information from Secretary Vance on the opening day of these hearings). For example, when he made his speech before the Panamanian National Assembly, Dr. Escobar stated: "You should have seen the original draft they presented along with the military treaty. Agreeing totally to that would have been shameful; I would not have dared to sit at this table now to give you any kind of explanation if I'd brought with me their original draft for the military treaty and the neutrality treaty." (emphasis added)

The question that must be answered is: What was the United States' original draft for the military and neutrality treaty and why did we compromise? It seems clear from Dr. Escobar's statements, and, those of other Panamanian officials, that they consider it absolutely intolerable for the United States to have the right to intervene to defend the canal. It should be equally intolerable for the United States Senate to agree to such an outrageous prospect. If the United States does not have the clear, legal right, under the terms of this agreement, to defend the Panama Canal, so vital to the protection of our commerce and national security interests, then how can we justify or have the right to defend our interests anywhere in the world?

The United States and Panama are now attempting to resolve these differences by issuing some statements to satisfy opponents of the treaties in their respective countries. But watered down, generalized agreements of interpretation to satisfy opponents of the treaties will not suffice. Whatever actions are necessary should be taken by the United States Senate in order to clarify in the neutrality treaty precisely what our (U.S.) rights are. We cannot, and should not, leave it up to anyone's "interpretation," now or in the future, as to exactly what the United States' rights and privilege are under the terms of this treaty.

Should the U.S. Senate ratify these treaties in their present form, we will be risking, down the road, a major confrontation with Panama over whether or not the United States can intervene militarily to defend the neutrality of the canal.

On the neutrality issue, it is clear that Articles I and II of the Neutrality section are unilateral statements of neutrality by Panama alone. Neither article mentions the United States in conjunction with a declaration of neutrality; they are simply a unilateral declaration by Panama. The fact that Panama alone makes the declaration of neutrality is crucial for one important reason: It simply means that only Panama can declare when the neutrality of the canal has been violated. This means the United States could not legally take any action to defend the canal, if it thought the neutrality of the canal was being violated, without Panama first declaring a violation of the neutrality.

For example, in his August 19th speech, Dr. Escobar stated that Panama could not agree, in writing, that it be obligated to keep the canal open if it was not "making money" or in the case of "internal disorder." Refusal by Panama to oblige itself with maintaining the openness of the canal under these circumstances is very important for several reasons. First of all, it must be understood that the Panamanian government is basically Marxist in orientation and outspokenly aligns itself with Cuba and other "pro-socialist" countries. In an international crisis, such as occurred in Cuba in 1962, can we be assured that riotous students, in sympathy to Cuba, would not attempt to disrupt the operation of the canal to prevent the passage of U.S. warships? Could not the Panamanian government conveniently declare during such a crisis that the canal was not making money and, therefore, have to close it indefinitely?

In addition, given the heavy communist influence in Panamanian labor unions, could not one day, in a similar crisis, the pilots who move ships through the canal suddenly declare a strike and, thus, paralyze the transit of U.S. warships.

There is also one other provision that would provide for the Panamanians a perfectly legitimate (legal) excuse to hold the transit of U.S. warships. Under Article III, section 1, subsection (e), the treaty provides that warships can be "required to certify that they have complied with all applicable health, sanitation and quarantine regulations." Obviously, the Panamanians could, in an international crisis, declare that all U.S. warships transiting the canal be stopped indefinitely to undergo a health and sanitation inspection. And what could we do about it? Send in the Marines? It makes no sense that this provision be listed under the "vessels of war" section to begin with. Yet, it provides a convenient excuse for the Panamanians to violate the "principle" of neutrality.

MAINTAINING ADEQUATE DEFENSE OF THE CANAL

From the outset, it should be clearly understood that the Panama Canal is still and always will be vital to the defense of the United States. We do not have a two-ocean navy. We have instead a one-ocean navy with two-ocean responsibilities. The transit of warships and war material, troops, etc., from one ocean to another, as during the Cuban missile crisis and Bay of Pigs invasion, is still critical to our national security in moment of international crisis.

There is only one way to guarantee the adequate defense of the canal: The United States should continue, in perpetuity, to maintain a military presence in the Canal Zone. By the year 2000 all U.S. military troops are to be withdrawn and the defense of the canal will be entirely in the hands of the Panamanians. However, the Panamanians are poorly trained and equipped to adequately defend the canal. If 100,000 U.S. troops cannot completely defend the canal, as the Pentagon has stated, then how can 10,000 soldiers of the Panamanian National Guard defend it?

Today we have only 10,000 U.S. troops defending the Canal Zone and, thus far, they have been able to defend it without any major problems. The major reasons for this success is quite simple: They are U.S. troops, not Panamanian. This deterrent role is validated by the same reason our troops in Guantanamo protect it from attack by the Cubans. After all, if we accept the Defense Department's argument that we cannot defend the Panama Canal with 100,000 troops, then how can 5,000 U.S. troops in Guantanamo defend it against 300,000 Cubans? We can and do defend Guantanamo primarily because of the deterrent of a U.S. military presence. It is obvious that the United States military presence in the Canal Zone serves as a deterrent to any potential foe whether it be foreign or domestic. Once U.S. troops are withdrawn, the deterrent is removed. Under these circumstances the canal will become more vulnerable, not less. There is only one way to guarantee an adequate defense of the canal and that is to insure a permanent U.S. military presence.

The United States should have insisted on the right to keep U.S. troops in the Canal Zone indefinitely and not agree to any termination date. Ambassador Bunker told this committee that there is no country with which Panama maintains a "closer" relationship than the United States. If this is true, then why shouldn't the United States be allowed to keep troops in the Canal Zone? The U.S. has military forces in many countries throughout the world. There are few that would argue that Germans, Greeks or Koreans feel their national sovereignty and integrity are threatened by the presence of U.S. troops. And neither should the Panamanians. Yet the U.S. capitulated on this very crucial issue. Obviously, the best way to keep a military presence in Panama would be to reject these treaties and keep control of what is rightfully U.S. territory. However, at the very least, the U.S. and Panama could have agreed to lease military bases to the U.S. after the year 2000. If the U.S. had insisted on such a provision in these treaties, then the question over whether or not we have the right to intervene would not exist. The United States Senate can and should insist that the treaties be altered to provide for a continuing U.S. presence in Panama. The Canal is too vital to the commerce and defense interests of the United States to entrust that only the Panamanian National Guard (which can barely tame a mob of rioting students) will have the sole defense responsibility. The crucial aspect of deterrence must be maintained, and that can only be accomplished by guaranteeing a continued U.S. military presence in the Canal Zone.

VIOLENCE AND LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Two of the central arguments that proponents of the treaties have given for their ratification are: (a) that if we don't give up the canal we will increase the prospects for violence and sabotage from the Panamanians, and, (b) that we will irreparably harm our relations with Latin America. Both are spurious arguments at best.

The United States has been able to adequately defend the canal against sabotage in the past and there is no reason we can't continue to do so in the future. But more importantly, it is the Panamanians who would want to prevent any sabotage since they benefit most from the Canal. Approximately 13% of Panama's GNP, 20% of its jobs and 3% of its foreign exchange comes from the Canal Zone, none of which the Panamanians are going to want to lose. If there is to be any substantial amount of violence, however, this will largely be the result of the U.S. raising the expectations of the Panamanians to an unrealistic degree and by allowing ourselves to be blackmailed by the threats of violence from Panamanian officials. Frankly, it is quite intolerable that our U.S. negotiators continued bargaining with the Panamanians when these threats were made. No nation should negotiate with another under such circumstances. We should have instead cut off negotiations immediately when such threats were made and told the Panamanians that, until they acted more reasonably, we would never discuss a new treaty.

The real issue we are facing is a decision between the most acceptable and least acceptable risks. Certainly we do run the risk of some violence if we reject these treaties, however, this risk is much less than taking the chance of one day finding ourselves having to send in Marines to protect the canal from external or internal threats. This risk of violence or sabotage is also far less of a risk than taking the chance of having Panama become a totally communist state or even a procommunist state (which many argue it already is), firmly allied with Cuba and the U.S.S.R.

Israel's problem with regard to the West Bank serves as an excellent example of confronting a similar "risk" scenario. Many argue that Israel must give up the West Bank to the Palestinians or risk a new war with the Arab powers and continued guerrilla attacks by the PLO. However, Israel considers the prospect of a hostile Palestinian state next to its belly a far greater risk than holding on to the West Bank which is very strategic to Israel's defense. For Israel there are risks either way. Once again, it comes down to what is the most versus the least acceptable risk. When looking at the potential risk of violence from wild-eyed Panamanian students, it is certainly far less than the enormous risks the U.S. will be taking in giving up the canal to a Marxist dictatorship while having no guarantees of our right to protect the canal in the future.

There is one final point that should be made regarding the violence argument. If there is any violence because these treaties are rejected by the Senate, the fault for this should fall squarely on the shoulders of the Executive branch. The White House and our negotiators allowed themselves to be blackmailed by the threats of violence and, now, they are using the same tactics to pressure the Senate into ratifying the treaties. Had our government not negotiated such a terribly vague and unreasonable agreement in the first place, the Senate would not have to face such a difficult decision. In essence, the White House has attempted to place the onus of any future violence on those who conscientiously refuse to support such an unacceptable agreement. The White House is simply trying to avoid any political fallout by "passing the buck" to the Senate.

Perhaps one of the major reasons these treaties are basically unacceptable in the first place, comes as a result of the failure of the Executive branch to consult and advise the Senate during the negotiations. By totally ignoring the Congress, these treaties were presented as a fait accompli. Obviously, much more acceptable treaties could have been negotiated had the Senate been consulted. The Senate should not allow itself to be used as a "rubber stamp" by the White House but, instead, properly exercise its authority by insisting on the best treaty, not a document of capitulation to a cabal of Marxist dictators.

LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Perhaps the greatest myth promoted by supporters of the treaties is that the Senate's rejection of them will severely harm our relations with other Latin American countries. The support among Latin American nations for these treaties is not nearly as widespread as is believed. Privately, many of our Latin American allies will state that they are extremely worried over the prospect of a Marxist, pro-Cuban government having control of the Canal Zone. One has to remember that many of these nations have been threatened by communist subversion, from both Cuba and the Soviet Union, and they are not terribly excited over having Soviet influence increase, or appear to increase, so dramatically in the Western Hemisphere.

The lack of enthusiasm by our Latin American allies for the Panamanian position was clearly demonstrated by an almost totally unnoticed event that occurred only two months ago. Panama called a conference in Bogota, Colombia, on August 5th and invited 25 Latin American nations to attend. This conference was to provide a demonstration of solidarity with Panama's position on the treaties. Only five nations, Colombia, Costa Rica, Jamaica, Mexico and Venezuela bothered to attend.

In addition, if threats of violence are deemed the best way to get concessions from the U.S., we should expect more unfriendly demonstrations from Latin American countries, rather than improved relations.

In conclusion, it must be understood, as the past has shown us, that Latin American respect for the U.S. goes up when we take a tough stance and goes down when we capitulate. The United States' stock in Latin America went up after the missile crisis of 1962 and the Dominican crisis of 1965, but we suffered a severe loss of prestige after the Bay of Pigs debacle. Ratification of these treaties will only signal to our Latin American allies that the U.S., once again, is capitulating to the Marxist advance in our hemisphere. Ratification will gain us few new friends but will only undermine even further the respect and credibility of the U.S. throughout Latin America.

In summary, these treaties pose graver risks than the United States and any of our Latin American allies can afford. It is particularly dangerous that we should turn control of the canal over to an oppressive regime that is ideologically aligned with our chief adversaries. Concluding a vague and unreasonable agreement with an irresponsible government is nothing more than a blueprint for disaster. Perhaps the time has come for a new treaty, but not this agreement with this Panamanian government. The American Conservative Union urges the Senate to act accordingly and to vote against the ratification of these treaties.

STATEMENT OF DR. HERMINIO PORTELL-VILA

Honorable Chairman, Distinguished Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Much has been said in recent days about the manner in which the United States established its presence in the Panama Canal Zone. It is alleged that the U.S. "stole" the territory in order to build the Canal.

As a one time Cuban Ambassador, and as a former professor of history at the University of Havana and at a number of institutions of higher learning in the United States, I have had occasion to study the historical origins of the Panama Canal. And I must submit that the facts do not correspond to many of the popular conceptions now advanced in many quarters.

Let us begin at the beginning, for to understand the present, we must know the past.

The Republic of Panama (28,783 square miles and 1,670,000 inhabitants), came into being in 1903 as a result of the plans of President Theodore Roosevelt for the United States to build an inter-oceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama after the French had tried and failed. The French rights were bought by the United States. Panama had up to then been an integral part of Colombia, although there had been some unsuccessful secessionist attempts. The first American dealings with the Republic of Colombia for an agreement regarding the canal ended in a deadlock, and not much foreign prodding was needed for a revolutionary movement leading to the proclamation of independence, as the separatist feeling was there and Colombian rule was ineffective.

The Panama Canal has been in operation since August 15, 1914, open to peaceful international traffic and with a continuous increase in the number of the ships using it and their total tonnage. For more than sixty years, it has functioned efficiently and peacefully, rendering most important services to world shipping, helping the economic life of the Republic of Panama, and being very useful to the security, the trade and the economy of the United States as well.

There can be no question that the security of the Panama Canal is vitally important to the United States. Neither can there be doubt that the Canal is in more danger now than at any time before because of Soviet bases and garrisons in Cuba and Soviet domination of the Castro regime. The Castro regime itself is an avowed enemy of the United States; the regime in Panama is only slightly less hostile.

Arnulfo Arias, the last constitutionally elected president of Panama, was inaugurated on Oct. 1, 1968, and ten days later had been deposed by an uprising of the Panamanian National Guard, led by its top officers. They in turn were deposed almost immediately by another officer, Colonel (now General) Omar Torrijos-Herrera. He has been the leftist dictator of Panama for the past 9 years, behind a caricature of constitutional government in which the nominal chief of state is "President" Demetrio B. Lakas.

Torrijos was barely 39 years old when he seized power. The son of school teachers, he climbed through the ranks by regular promotion, a stern but skillful military officer who had not opposed repressive measures against the Panamanian rioters in 1964.

In the first months of his dictatorship, Torrijos was considered something of a "playboy." However, in 1969, while visiting New York City, Torrijos told a reporter for the local periodical "Tiempo" that he would like to return to Castro "the visit" that an invading Cuban "guerrilla" had made to Panama in April, 1959. He added that in fact the "first revolution exported by Castro had gone to Panama and that in just reciprocity he ought to return that blow." In the remarks, Torrijos indicated he favored granting the anti-Castro Cubans a base in Panama for their attacks against Communist Cuba, even if his Foreign Minister did not like the idea.

The Castro-controlled press in Havana exploded against Torrijos, and the official newspaper "Granma" said that "The abominable canal man, the gorilla Torrijos, who promoted himself to general and has his chest covered with embroidery and medals, did not surprise anybody with his effrontery." From then on, "Radio Havana," "Prensa Latina" and "Granma," called Torrijos a "gorilla."

All this changed when the Panamanian leftist lawyer Romulo Escobar-Bethancourt (no relative of Venezuelan's ex-President, Romulo Bethancourt), gained influence over Torrijos because of his close contacts with university students, workers and some demagogic elements surrounding Torrijos. Soon, the Torrijos regime helped organize excursions to Communist Cuba so that Panamanians might observe a communist dictatorship in action. As Torrijos began leaning more to the left, the Castroite press stopped calling him a "gorilla." The Panamanian political police, under the command of Col. Manuel Noriega, now lists anti-Communist Cuban exiles among the people to be watched and persecuted.

In 1972, Castro sent delegates, posing as students, to attend the VIII Congress of the Federation of Panamanian Students. Actually, they were specialists in propaganda, political repression and socialist "reform." That was the year in which Panama voted in favor of diplomatic relations with Communist Cuba at a meeting of the Organization of American States. But it also was the year in which the rubber-stamp National Assembly of Panama proclaimed Torrijos "The Maximum Leader of the Revolution." By mid-1974, Communist Cuba and Panama had restored diplomatic relations. Meantime, in Panama, agitation increased for new treaties with the United States regarding the Panama Canal. A massive propaganda campaign was launched to arouse and mold international public opinion against U.S. control of the Panama Canal. Government officials, diplomats, students, professional people, labor bosses, newsmen and others, also were enlisted in the campaign at home and abroad. Torrijos himself played an important role by travelling abroad and attending several international gatherings, some in Africa and Asia.

In Latin America, Venezuela's President, Carlos Andres Perez, became an enthusiastic supporter of Torrijos. So did Mexico's Echeverria, Chile's Allende, Peru's Velasco-Alvarado, Argentina's Campora and Peron, and Colombia's Lopez-Michelsen, the latter conveniently forgetting the millions of dollars Colombia had received from the United States in exchange for its endorsement of the original Panama Canal Treaty.

With Torrijos winning ever more international support, the U.S. government abandoned the psychological contest over the Canal and allowed itself to be cornered in a fight it chose not to continue.

In the early 1970's, neighboring Costa Rica opened its doors to Soviet agents, first for trade and later on for regular diplomatic relations. Soviet-Panamanian contacts increased via border crossings from Costa Rica. Panamanian leftists thus had the cooperation of both the Cuban communists and Soviet agents.

The controlled Cuban press now praised Torrijos. In April, 1973, Raul Roa, the Cuban Foreign Minister, while attending a meeting of the U.N. Security Council, formally gave Panama the backing of Communist Cuba in Panama's claims to the Panama Canal. Torrijos reciprocated with a statement that "each hour that Cuba is kept isolated are sixty minutes of Latin American shame." On August 20, 1974, Cuba and Panama announced that they were re-establishing diplomatic relations and that they had much in common as to international goals. From then on the two countries worked together in attacking the United States.

More government-financed and sponsored trips to Communist Cuba by Panamanian leftists were conducted. On January 10, 1976, it was dictator Torrijos himself, accompanied by scores of newsmen, diplomats, policemen and military, who visited Castro. He went from Havana to Santiago de Cuba for a spectacular gathering, followed by a special tour of Cuban military installations around the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay. The idea was to link the Panama Canal and Guantanamo as "terra irredenta" to be rescued from the United States.

In April, 1978, Torrijos visited Jamaica and Prime Minister Michael Manley, already at work to impose a socialist dictatorship there, urged that the negotiations for a new Panama Canal Treaty be intensified so that Panama "should have absolute control over that interoceanic waterway." Torrijos, meantime, continued his travels to all Latin American countries, trying to get direct, personal commitments from the other rulers.

The United States, outmaneuvered on all sides, soon resigned itself to tolerate attacks, insults, threats, slanders and protests until it finally approved the drafts of two new Panama Canal treaties. The ceremonial signing in Washington brought most heads of governments in this hemisphere, including those accused by the United States for dictatorial excesses. By all appearances, most came not to honor the United States for its concessions, but to celebrate its humiliation.

The Administration failed to recognize that it was helping dictator Torrijos consolidate the hold of his oppressive regime over the Panamanian people, now in its ninth year. Torrijos now emerged as a hero, statesman, redeemer, even a "reformer."

Panamanian exiles in the United States, and throughout the hemisphere, considered themselves betrayed, and said so. The Christian-Democratic Party of Panama, at considerable risk, issued a protest against the help being given to the Torrijos dictatorship by the U.S.

But Panama's leftists are not yet satisfied. They want the United States out of Panama NOW, without waiting for a new date, and they are saying it. Torrijos' leftist adviser, Romulo Escobar-Bethancourt, now advises Panamanians to be patient—for the time being, because, he says, there will soon be another round of national and international pressure against the United States.

Already, there are ill omens for the U.S. Cuba now serves as a powerful Soviet military base, less than eight hundred miles from the Canal. Cuba itself has demonstrated a military capacity to transport to Angola, across the Atlantic, twenty thousand soldiers with military equipment supplied by the Soviet Union. Last July 22, the Republic of Panama and the Soviet Union signed a treaty of trade and friendship that has had little publicity in the United States. Under the accords, Moscow would have its own stores in the Free Trade Zone at Colon harbor, in Panama, and a branch of the Soviet bank in Panama City. The Russians also are interested in developing the harbor of Vacamonte, on the Pacific Coast, a few miles from the U.S. Howard Air Force Base, and are reported ready to build a hydro-electric plant at Bocas del Toro, on the Caribbean coast of Panama. When the new round of pressure comes, the Soviet Union already will be established in Panama.

Let's look at the record of Torrijos himself. By seizing power, setting up a military dictatorship, and then veering to the left, Torrijos has shown time and again that he is a political opportunist not to be trusted. What he promises today, he will renege on tomorrow. Why should he respect the new Canal treaties any more than he respected the previous ones, or abide by the Constitution of his country, for that matter?

Panamanian citizens in great numbers have fled their country to save their lives or to avoid being put in prison, where torture, and ill-treatment are the rule. Ezekiel Muhtar, a Panamanian citizen now living in exile in Miami, Fla., has described the atrocities at the Island of Coiba, on the Pacific Ocean, where Torrijos keeps his political prisoners, in his book "La Mordida," now in its second edition.

The Panamanian Committee on Human Rights in September 1976 issued its first report on the violation of human rights by the Torrijos regime. It begins with a list of 28 citizens who have been murdered during the political persecutions there. Three of them, Encarnacion Gonzalez, Dorita Moreno and Marlene Mendizabal, were women. The list included the name of Father Hector Gallegos, a Catholic priest who was arrested by the Torrijos police in Santa Fe, Veraguas Province, and has not been heard of since. There is reason to believe he was tortured and killed, and his body was dumped into the sea, weighed down with concrete blocks.

There is a partial list of Panamanian political exiles compiled by the Committee on Human Rights, and it comprises the names of 94 people: men and women, prominent citizens and humble laborers, businessmen, priest, lawyers, newspapermen, farmers, students, military officers and professors.

In January, 1976, while Torrijos was visiting Communist Cuba, a group of businessmen met and drafted an appeal for guarantees to agricultural and industrial production, and also as to tax collections and trade regulations. They were immediately rounded up and expelled, some as far away as Ecuador. They were not allowed to take with them money, valuables or even spare clothing.

The "G-2" of the political police in Panama, copied even to the name from the Cuban "G-2", terrorizes the people of Panama. Its boss is Col. Manuel Noriega, an admirer of Cuba's Secret Police Chief, the notorious Maj. Manuel Pineiro. Both meet with a certain frequency, in Panama or in Cuba. Pineiro has sent special groups of his agents to be stationed in Panama, among them Maj. Anselmo Martinez, who arrived in Panama by way of Belize in May, 1977.

Half a dozen broadcasting stations in Panama City and elsewhere have been taken over by the Torrijos dictatorship. All others are very much controlled, as is the case with periodicals and wire services—"Prensa Latina," the Castro propaganda organization, excepted.

The game played with the university and high school students is very clever. Their control is in the hands of communist leaders among the professors and student body. They can easily and quickly fan passions, pushing the youngsters into violent activities with different degrees of virulence, especially as to the Panama Canal. They are given limited leeway, followed by beatings and persecution if they go beyond a certain limit.

Economically, Panama is very heavily indebted. The money spent by Torrijos and his friends in propagandizing the Panama Canal issue runs into many millions. The foreign debt is staggering and few know where the money goes or what is done with it. The economic crisis is part and parcel with political and administrative corruption.

Nepotism is rampant. One of Torrijos' brothers, Moises, who became wealthy as a trader and trafficker, is ambassador to Spain. Several nephews, after undergoing training in subversion and "guerrilla" warfare in Castro's schools for the foreign youngsters, now have important positions in the Torrijos dictatorship and they are known to work with the communists. Torrijos' brother-in-law, Marcelino Jaen, handles foreign relations and was the Panamanian official who signed the recent trade and friendship agreement with the Soviet Union.

"Panama will be the next 'Cuba,' under Soviet domination." This is the sad conclusion of those who know what is going on in Panama and the role that Communist Cuba plays in all of this in the service of Soviet imperialism.

Regardless of assurance to the contrary, the stage is set for a round of new pressures on the United States, designed to force it out of the Panama Canal Zone long before the year 2000. The Soviets and their Cuban and Panamanian followers are waiting.

It should be noted that General Torrijos has just completed another tour of Europe, with a final stop in Finland. Very little is known about the contacts Torrijos had while in Finland, which as we know, borders on the Soviet Union.

But it is well known that Torrijos admires Castro and approves his brand of a communist dictatorship. In an interview on Channel One of the French TV September 2, Torrijos said, (and I quote): "I greatly admire Fidel Castro because he changed his country's social structure despite the risks this entailed." (unquote) Does Torrijos want to change the social structure of Panama for a Communist one? What will happen then to the Canal treaties?

While Torrijos was flying back to Panama City from Washington, D.C., on September 9, after the ceremonial signing in Washington, he sent the following message to Castro: "As I fly across Cubas skies on my return to my fatherland, I greet you with friendship, as always. It is my wish that the Cuban people, under your skillful leadership, may continue on their march toward Latin American progress. In Latin America your name is associated with feelings of dignity linked to the elimination of all remnants of shameful colonialism."

That was the real Torrijos speaking!

SPEECH OF HON. HAMILTON FISH

I am honored to appear before this distinguished committee of the United States Senate in opposition to the surrender and giveaway of the American canal in Panama to the Communist existing government there.

I served for almost 25 years on the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and for approximately 10 years was its ranking Republican member and was ranking Republican member of the Rules Committee for 4 or 5 years. I was also chairman of the first Congressional committee to investigate Communist activities, policies, principles and ideologies back in 1930 and believe I know as much about the aims and purposes of the Communists as anyone in the United States today. I have written several books on the subject.

I am convinced that the Communist tyrannical government at Moscow is the most monstrous form of government that has existed anywhere since Lenin seized power by force and violence in Russia 60 years ago.

The surrender and giveaway of the American canal in Panama to the Communist government of that nation might just as well have been given to Cuba or the Soviet Union and it is time the American people knew the truth of this aspect of this infamous blackmail treaty. If adopted it would be a day of infamy, playing directly into the hands of the Communist dictators at Moscow.

For years the leading Communists at Moscow have been endeavoring to encircle and surround the United States. The take-over by the Communist party and government in Panama would be the greatest victory the Soviet Union has achieved since our surrender to them at Yalta. Our committee back in 1930 did not persecute any liberals or radicals, as its main purpose was merely to find out the definite policies, principles and objectives of Communism at home and abroad. Those who testified such as the Communist candidates for President, minced no words—they hated our form of government. They hated both our religion and freedom. They preferred the red flag to an American flag and they favored a dictatorial, tyrannical government with a world capital at Moscow. There has been absolutely no change in their plans and objectives. The Communist hierarchy hates the U.S., our freedoms and human rights, the religion of our people and above all, because we are the only powerful nation with a limited arsenal of nuclear weapons and submarines that prevents them from Communizing the entire world. They have only one God and his name is Lenin who told them they must Communize the world and in doing so, if they exterminated three-quarters of the people and one quarter remained Communist, that would solve the problem.

This is the reason why they have built up an enormous arsenal of huge nuclear weapons and have a superiority over us for 2 or 3 to 1 in almost every category of nuclear weapons. That is the reason that they are going deeply underground to protect the Russian people whenever they get ready to attack us. They know as well as we do that we have no quarrel with the Russian people and have no desire for additional territory and will not turn on the nuclear button unless attacked. On the other hand, the Communists at Moscow who killed 30 million of their own people and Solzhenitsyn places it at 60, would not hesitate whenever it is to their advantage, to destroy between 100 and 130 million Americans in one night. The whole world would then go Communist within ten days time.

It is simply playing Russian roulette by trying to maintain that the Soviet Union and I don't mean the Communists of France or Italy, have changed their tactics or strategy. They are our enemies, and they are preparing to destroy the United States whom they regard together with the Chinese, as their bitterest enemy.

I want the American people simply to know the truth—and I have tried to convey that message to my old friend George Meany, President of the American Federation of Labor-CIO, who has been one of the most consistent opponents of Communism in this country and throughout the world, by the following letter.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1977.

MR. GEORGE MEANY,
815 16th St., NW.,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MEANY: I am writing to you as one of my old friends whom I have always admired for your strong stand against the spread of world Communism and for human rights. I confess that I was shocked to learn of your support of the surrender of the American canal to the Communist government of Panama. Not only is the president of Panama an avowed Marxist, but is the virtual head of the Communist People's Party—the only party that exists in Panama. I am informed that both his father and mother were Communists. We might just as well turn the canal over to the Soviet Union. This is nothing but a blackmail scheme by the Communists in Panama to get the equivalent of 700 million dollars from the United States along with the canal or twice the cost of the canal.

To me it is almost reasonable, aiding and abetting our enemies and in case of war, it would amount to treason. I hope when you have a chance to read the contents of the treaty, in which we agree not to build any other canal and in which we have no right to defend it after the year 2000, other provisions affecting adversely the interests of our own American wage earners in Panama, that you will consider, or at least not be active or use your influence for it with the Senators. Polls show that 2 or 3 to 1 are opposed to it everywhere and I believe as soon as the truth is known, that it will become ten to one.

I have always been on the side of peace—I opposed World War II until the attack on Pearl Harbor. I opposed the war in Vietnam and I am still opposed to war with the Soviet Union unless attacked. For that reason I urge strengthening our nuclear defense so no nation would dare attack us.

I honestly believe that if the Senate ratified the treaty, it would be the greatest Communist victory since Yalta and start an epidemic of sequestration of American property throughout the world. And that even the NATO will lose faith in our reliability to keep our commitments to them if we surrender the American canal to a Communistic government in Panama.

Mr. Kissinger, who prevented President Ford from seeing Solzhenitsyn, the greatest freedom fighter in the world and opposed Ford's three defense recommendations in his last speech to Congress is now more responsible than anyone else in aiding and abetting our enemies.

With kind regards and best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

The veteran organizations; the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, non-partisan organizations composed of Democrats, Republicans and Independents, have taken a very outspoken stand against the surrender of the American canal. Why? Because it is against our own security and strengthens the power of the Communists. I take the position openly and without any apologies to anyone, because this is a free country and I believe in the rights of all people to that freedom that does not exist in the Soviet Union, to say to this distinguished Senate committee that to turn over the canal to the Communist government of Panama is aiding and abetting our enemies and verges on treason. If it was in time of war it would be treason. Furthermore, I believe politically that 75 to 90 percent of the American people are unalterably opposed to this surrender to the Communists. If the treaty is adopted, Watergate would be a mere mosquito bite. If elected public officials, supposed to represent their people back home, defy them and surrender this canal, built by Theodore Roosevelt and the American people 68 years ago, and run efficiently ever since, to the Communists, that is their privilege.

There is probably not a single state that in any referendum, would support this blackmail treaty, aiding and abetting our enemies. No wonder that the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and at least two-thirds of the members of the Democratic party, which control this Administration, are bitterly opposed to the surrender of the canal.

Any Senator, naturally has the right to vote any way he wants and to give his reasons. I am not here for the purpose of trying to prevent any Republican or Democrat from committing political suicide. I am not here even in behalf of my own party, for if I were, I would remain silent and hope that the treaty be adopted and that would bring back the Republican party in the biggest landslide that ever occurred. But I am here as an American who loves our country and wants to see its nuclear defense weapons strengthened immediately so no nation would ever dare attack and destroy the United States. And in conclusion I quote a statement made by Max Eastman, a well known former pro-Bolshevik radical and Socialist who said: "One thing, one thing only can save freedom and democracy and that is a clear and bold understanding. Freedom and democracy must have from its leaders incisive and uncompromising exposures of the barbaric nature of the Communist society and the devious methods of the Communist attack. The closer our military and economic cooperation may be, the more pitiless must these exposures be. You cannot save democracy by shutting your eyes to the horrors of dictatorship. You cannot stop the night from falling by turning the lamps down."

In case any supporter of President Carter when a candidate for office a year ago pledged never to surrender "actual control of the canal," should take exception to my criticism of the President or members of his administration, let me quote what former President Theodore Roosevelt said: "To announce that there must be no criticism of the President or that we are to stand by the President, right or wrong is not only unpatriotic and servile, but is morally treasonable to the American people. Nothing but the truth should be spoken about him or anyone else, but it is even more important to tell the truth—pleasant or unpleasant—about him than anyone else."

President Theodore Roosevelt was the most courageous and popular President in the last 100 years and if he had lived one year longer, he would have been nominated by acclamation for President by the Republican party, and would have been overwhelmingly elected. He was the sponsor for the building of the canal and as a great admirer and supporter of T.R. having left the Republican Party to be elected three terms on the Progressive or Bull Moose ticket to the Assembly, I knew him politically and personally, probably better than anyone alive today except his own family. The very attempt to undo what he considered one of the most constructive acts in his great career is like impeaching him or sticking a dagger in his back in his grave at Oyster Bay. I would be derelict to the memory of this great American President if I did not raise my voice to defend his honor, integrity and patriotism.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 16

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am going to count this my speech No. 16 on the Panama Canal since the treaties were signed by the two heads of state.

Mr. President, I read today in the Washington Star a very interesting article touching on a matter about which perhaps all Senators should become knowledgeable. The article reports that U.S. Department of Justice sources have confirmed that there is a sealed narcotics indictment in the eastern district of New York against one Moises Torrijos, brother of the present Panamanian Dictator Omar Torrijos. The Washington Star newspaper story does not state the substance of the indictment, but it does report that the indictment has never been disclosed allegedly, because Moises Torrijos has not returned to the United States since the time the indictment was issued, apparently some time during 1972.

You know, Mr. President, I wondered at the time of the signing of the Panama Canal treaties why Moises Torrijos was not in attendance inasmuch as he is currently Ambassador to Spain and presumably would have wished to share in the celebrations held down at the Pan American building. At the time, it did seem strange that since diplomats from every Spanish-speaking country in the world did seem able to attend, yet the brother of the present head of the Panamanian Government found it inconvenient to share in the festivities.

Sometimes, Mr. President, I am slow to get the full picture, but I am beginning to understand the answers to some of the questions that have been troubling me, and there have been plenty of questions, Mr. President, about these treaties. Since reading the article in the Star, I have had brought to my attention certain other bits and pieces of information which perhaps should be further highlighted or recalled. Apparently, Mr. President, back some time in early 1972 or perhaps late 1971, Rafael Richard, the son of the Panamanian Ambassador to Taiwan—I believe the correct date was July 8, 1971—was arrested in New York carrying luggage containing some 150 pounds of heroin. Mr. Richard, who was fairly young for a diplomat, was traveling on a diplomatic passport signed by Mr. Juan Tack, whom Senators will recall negotiated with then-Secretary of State Henry Kissinger for the Kissinger-Tack agreement which formed the framework for subsequent negotiations leading to these proposed treaties now being considered in the Senate. But Mr. Richard was not on his first visit to the United States; he was instead on his fifth visit. And according to a New York Times article by Benjamin Welles, dated March 15, 1972, Mr. Richard had brought into the United States 150 pounds of heroin each trip. But, Mr. President, let us see what happened to Mr.

Richard. According to the New York Times—and, of course, that is the only information I have to go on as to this particular item, the information available in the newspapers—Mr. Richard was given the full privileges of diplomatic immunity and apparently allowed to leave the United States without further question.

Mr. Richard's uncle was not quite as lucky. As reported in the Times, his uncle, Guillermo Gonzalez, and I quote, "an intimate and former bodyguard of Moises Torrijos," was convicted of a felony charge related to heroin smuggling and sentenced to seven years in prison. If Mr. Gonzalez is in prison, perhaps he would know more about this matter, but I do not know whether he has been required to serve his full term and is, therefore, still incarcerated.

About this same time, Mr. President, three American narcotics agents were ordered expelled from Panama by Mr. Juan Tack on 24-hours notice. Mr. Tack asserted that the men, who were agents of the U.S. Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, were interfering with "the internal affairs of Panama." Some internal affairs, Mr. President, I might say, and some diplomats.

So, Mr. President, today we learned that there is a sealed indictment waiting for Mr. Moises Torrijos, Ambassador to Spain, waiting for Mr. Moises Torrijos up there in the eastern district of New York, waiting up there for some 5 years now with no public disclosure whatsoever that Ambassador Torrijos was being sought by our Government. Mr. Moises Torrijos may have known he is being sought by our Government. He found it convenient not to be in the United States over a 5-year period on any occasion. But, Mr. President, the American people did not know and the American people have got to have sharp eyes to pick this story up off the fifth page of the Washington Star to try to piece together just what is going on.

Now, there has been another recent sealed indictment, not 5 years old, but a fairly new sealed indictment which has recently been made entirely public. That indictment involves one Mr. Tongsun Park. Tongsun Park has shown no great inclination to return to the United States either, and quite properly the citizens of the United States have been advised that Tongsun Park is under indictment. Yet, Mr. President, Moises Torrijos is treated differently.

I hold no brief for Mr. Tongsun Park, but it does seem he received one type of treatment and Moises Torrijos another.

On Wednesday, I talked to some extent about the ironclad language used by our negotiators in securing the Panama Canal Treaty in 1903. I pointed out that our negotiators back in those days could and did draft a document which reflected a meeting of the minds, a document without ambiguity, and a document which could be enforced. I am pleased to report to the Senate, Mr. President, that the year following the negotiation of the treaty of 1903, our Government took the prudent step of negotiating with Panama a document entitled "A Treaty for the Mutual Extradition of Criminals." This extradition treaty of 1904 is also an ironclad document without ambiguity. The preamble reads this way, Mr. President:

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama, being desirous to confirm their friendly relations and to promote the cause of justice, have resolved to conclude a treaty for the extradition of fugitives from justice between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama.

So, they set forth the purpose of this treaty pretty clearly there in the preamble. Article I of this treaty reads this way:

The Government of the United States and the Government of the Republic of Panama mutually agree to deliver up persons who, having been charged with or convicted of any of the crimes and offenses specified in the following article, committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, shall seek an asylum or be found within the territories of the other: Provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of Criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his or her apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense has been there committed.

We have been advised by the Washington Star that there is a sealed indictment handed down by a grand jury in the eastern district of New York against Ambassador Moises Torrijos, but we do not know what the charges are, we do not know what the evidence is. So, Mr. President, we are left to speculate whether this treaty of 1904 would apply. Presumably, the crime charged would be a felony. Presumably, the crime charged would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense charged had been committed in Panama. Mr. President, I do not know where Ambassador Moises Torrijos is located today. Perhaps he is at his post in Spain, and perhaps the Department of Justice ought to see if we have an extradition treaty with Spain as we do with Panama. But one thing is certain, Mr. President, when I have referred to the regime in power in Panama as a gangster dictatorship, I have not used the term lightly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Washington Star and an article from the New York Times be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

UNITED STATES INDICTED BROTHER OF TORRIJOS, SOURCE IN JUSTICE DEPARTMENT SAYS

The brother of Panamanian chief of state Omar Torrijos was indicted in New York five years ago on federal narcotics smuggling charges but U.S. authorities have never been able to arrest him, Justice Department sources have confirmed.

"There is a sealed narcotics indictment in the Eastern District of New York" against Torrijos' brother Moises, a knowledgeable department official said yesterday.

"It has never been unsealed because we have never found him back in this country to arrest him," this source said.

The Miami Herald reported yesterday that Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell told President Carter about a variety of allegations that members of Torrijos' family have been involved in smuggling drugs to the United States.

Department spokesman Robert Havel confirmed that Bell discussed the matter with Carter on October 3.

After inquiries from members of Congress, Bell briefed Carter on the situation. The President agreed with Bell's recommendation that the Justice Department provide the same briefing to congressional leaders, Havel said.

HOUSE MEMBER CHARGES NARCOTICS SMUGGLING INQUIRY TOUCHES "HIGHEST LEVELS" OF PANAMA GOVERNMENT

(By Benjamin Welles)

WASHINGTON, March 15—Representative John M. Murphy charged today that an investigation into heroin smuggling into the United States had touched the "highest levels" of the Government of Panama.

Mr. Murphy, Democrat of Staten Island, who is chairman of a House subcommittee on the Panama Canal, named Juan Tack, Panamanian Foreign Minister, and Moises Torrijos, Panamanian Ambassador to Spain, as the officials allegedly involved in narcotics. Mr. Torrijos is a brother of Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos, ruler of Panama.

José Antonio de la Ossa, the Panamanian ambassador here, issued a statement vigorously denying the charges. He suggested that Mr. Murphy was reviving old charges because he had been "cold-shouldered" by Panamanian officials during his recent inspection visit to the Panama Canal.

He suggested too that Mr. Murphy was using the drug charges to impede progress toward a new Panama Canal treaty which if negotiated, would restore "sovereignty" over the Canal Zone to the Panamanian Republic.

Late yesterday Mr. Tack ordered the expulsion of three American narcotics agents from Panama within 24 hours. He asserted that the men, agents of the United States Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, had "intervened in the internal affairs of Panama."

The expulsion followed initial reports two days ago in the syndicated column of Jack Anderson linking Mr. Tack and Mr. Torrijos with narcotics smuggling. The first hint of the development came a week ago in a brief allusion by the Panama Canal subcommittee to "confidential" information passed to the subcommittee by the Bureau of Narcotics.

United States officials involved in the treaty negotiations, which have been under way here since June, declined to speculate whether the flareup would jeopardize the talks. Panamanian diplomats, who denied recent reports of an "impasse," said that they thought the talks would not be fundamentally affected.

Mr. Murphy said in an interview today that he and other subcommittee members had been briefed here on Jan. 24 by Customs Bureau agents placed at their disposal by Myles Ambrose, then Director of the Treasury's Bureau of Customs and now President Nixon's special consultant for drug abuse enforcement. The subcommittee was then preparing to visit Panama and the Canal Zone.

A passage from the unpublished report of the subcommittee dated March 8 and entitled "Overview of the Narcotics Problem in Panama" cited a recent drug-smuggling case involving Panamanians and stated in part:

"The [customs] briefing team concluded that based on the customs investigation this case reached into the highest levels of Panamanian officialdom and included Moises Torrijos, the brother of Gen. Omar Torrijos and the Panamanian Foreign Minister, Juan Tack."

The subcommittee report also asserted that this involvement "was confirmed by B.N.D.D. officers in the Republic of Panama on Feb. 23 during the subcommittee briefing in that country."

The State Department said that the bureau had denied "in writing" that its agents had implicated Mr. Tack or Mr. Torrijos in its briefings of the House subcommittee.

A spokesman for the Customs Bureau said that it had nothing to add to what it had told Mr. Murphy and his subcommittee colleagues.

Charles W. Bray 3d, the State Department spokesman, said that the department considered the expulsion of the three agents, Wilbur Plase, Ruben Monzon and Charles W. Cecil Jr., as unwarranted.

Mr. Murphy, a graduate of West Point and a decorated infantry commander in World War II and the Korean war, cited growing drug abuse among American servicemen and dependents in Taiwan, Okinawa, the Philippines, Vietnam, and, especially, Panama.

The subcommittee recalled details of two recent drug-smuggling cases that, it contended, involved Mr. Tack and Mr. Torrijos.

One concerned the arrest in New York last July 8 of Rafael Richard, son of the Panamanian Ambassador to Taiwan. Mr. Richard, who was 23, was travelling on a diplomatic passport signed by Mr. Tack, which gave him immunity from prosecution.

At the time of his arrest he was on his fifth visit to the United States, during each of which he had brought about 150 pounds of heroin, the report said.

He was with Guillermo Gonzales, his uncle, an intimate and former bodyguard of Moises Torrijos.

Mr. Gonzáles, who was believed to be the ringleader, was convicted and sentenced to seven years. The report said United States sources believe that Mr. Tack and Mr. Torrijos were not only sanctioning but were abetting this smuggling.

The other case involved Joaquin Gonzáles, former international transit chief of Tocumen International Airport at Panama, who was indicted in the smuggling of 1 million dollars' worth of heroin to Dallas.

Mr. Gonzáles was arrested by the United States authorities Feb. 6, 1971, when he entered the Canal Zone to attend a baseball game. He was flown to Texas to stand trial and was sentenced to five years. Mr. Tack exerted strong but unsuccessful diplomatic efforts to have him released, the subcommittee said.

THE PANAMA CANAL AND ALLEGATIONS OF DRUG TRAFFICKING

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, Panamanian strongman Gen. Omar Torrijos will be in Washington tomorrow to meet with President Carter. Reportedly, they will discuss the proposed Panama Canal treaties, and the recent controversy circulating around differing interpretations of treaty language. There is another serious matter which has just come to my attention, which I hope will also be clarified during Torrijos' visit, or soon afterward. This involves allegations of direct involvement by General Torrijos and other members of his family in drug trafficking in the United States and elsewhere, that the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) alluded to with regard to one incident.

Now, obviously the President of the United States cannot select the individual with whom he conducts his negotiations in international affairs. By the same token, however, our executive branch does have some choice in what is hidden or revealed to the public, which could bear upon those negotiations. It is my understanding that a number of documents now in the possession of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration have been "classified," which bear directly upon allegations of drug trafficking by General Torrijos. Those documents should be immediately turned over to the U.S. Senate for examination.

I am told that there is presently within the files of the Drug Enforcement Administration a large volume of materials bearing upon this matter. I have been given a list of 44 specific file codes containing information on the subject.

I am especially troubled to learn that an overt attempt was reportedly made to keep this information out of public purview by moving the intelligence files to another location for temporary safekeeping. I am advised that, just recently, perhaps to avoid embarrassment, these files were returned to the Drug Enforcement Administration's central office.

Mr. President, I do not like to jump to conclusions, and I do not necessary believe everything I am told. However, I do consider the source of this information to be sufficiently reliable to give me deep concern about the nature of the Panamanian leader with whom we are dealing. Suggestions that he—perhaps in conjunction with Fidel Castro—is involved in an illegal international drug operation is cause enough for concern. The allegation that these drugs are being funneled directly into the United States, and that General Torrijos himself may be profiting directly from drug sales, makes the matter all the more serious.

SENATE SHOULD HAVE INFORMATION

At the very least, I believe the Justice Department—and the Drug Enforcement Administration in particular—should make its findings on this matter known immediately to the appropriate Senate committee or committees, which can then decide what effect the information might have on ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties. I believe the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, of the Senate Judiciary Committee, would certainly be entitled to take a look at this material, along with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and perhaps others.

Mr. President, I am calling upon the administration to address this serious matter immediately. I believe that President Carter should discuss these allegations with General Torrijos and request a full explanation. There is no better time for this than tomorrow.

In addition, it would be useful for the President himself to examine the files in possession of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and approve their release to appropriate Senate panels for full investigation. If any portion of these allegations are found to be accurate, I hope that the necessary information will be made available to all Members of Congress, and to the American public before the Panama Canal Treaty ratification process is completed.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Kansas indicated, the list containing DEA file references contains about 44 different references. In an effort to be totally cautious, and after making investigation as to whether or not the numbers themselves were classified, and being told that perhaps they were not, but to be on the safe side, after having experienced just last week with the State Department, the Senator from Kansas will not make public the reference numbers, but the Senator from Kansas does believe it is appropriate, at the proper time, to turn these references over to the proper committee, and I would hope that, based on the information available, the files could be subpoenaed or otherwise brought before the appropriate committees in Congress, perhaps in executive session, and looked into very carefully.

But it seems to me that if someone were to ask, "How does this bear on the ratification of the treaties," the Senator from Kansas might state that if these allegations were true, it would have a great bearing on the ratification of the treaties, because it involves one of the principal participants and that individual's integrity.

So I would hope, based upon the statement that, come tomorrow, the President will discuss this matter, if he checks with the DEA and finds the information to be accurate, with General Torrijos.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I once again commend the Senator from Kansas for his diligence and care in pursuing aspects of this matter which is of so much interest to us. The remarks made by him today, and earlier by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, are in excess of the information available to me, but I would like to add to the record that part that I know, so that he will be seized with what I know, and can determine where to go from here.

The majority leader is present and can corroborate what I am about to say, but I see no reason for not reporting to the Senate that the Attorney General briefed us in connection with certain matters in this respect, and he briefed the chairman and the ranking Republican member of the committee in certain respects. I have suggested to the Attorney General, and it is my understanding that he agreed, that the appropriate jurisdictional committees of the Senate be briefed on such matters as might be relevant to the subject of their consideration.

Mr. President, the only reason I say this is to let the Senator from Kansas know that there has been a contact with the administration, and that it has been my insistence, and I believe that of the majority leader as well, that the Senate be informed on whatever aspects may be relevant, if any. I do not know the details of the transactions or the allegations. I cannot speak for their truthfulness. But I thought, in view of the interest and importance of the matter, the Senate ought to be kept fully informed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the minority leader has correctly stated the situation as to our being briefed, and we have been assured we would continue to be briefed as to any further information which comes to the attention of the Attorney General upon this matter.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would only reiterate one part, to make sure it is entirely clear: It was at our insistence that the Department of Justice make sure that the relevant committees of the Senate be fully apprised of whatever information might be relevant to our consideration of relevant matters.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I appreciate being informed that the matter is moving along. Does that include information as to the allegation that the files may have been removed and then returned?

Mr. BAKER. No. I prefaced these remarks by saying that the Senator from Kansas had more information than I had, and it was to that that I was referring.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I want to say that I have full confidence in the intention of the Attorney General of the United States to bring to our attention the full relevant information, as he has done, and I have no doubt that he will continue to bring to the attention of the joint leadership and Senate committees any information that he has bearing on this matter.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the able Senator from Kansas for bringing this information to the Senate. It would be my hope that the files referred to by him, that contain such information, would be made available by the administration to the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. I feel that these charges are too serious to be passed on lightly. I feel that this matter should be gone into carefully, and that there should be no action on the part of the administration to withhold files. I do not predict that they will, but I feel very strongly that the information in these files should be made available to the Members of the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as ranking minority member of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee, I also would like to thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas for his enlightenment of the Senate, and I think the country, today.

I have had a lot of reports from various sources that the Torrijos regime has been participating for a number of years in drug trafficking. I have, for the most part, chosen to carefully watch those reports, but have not had any particular source that I was willing to rely upon, until today, to give me any indication or information that would lead to reliable or verifiable proof of such trafficking.

We have held some extensive hearings in the Separation of Powers Subcommittee, and we have tried to do everything in our power to bring out a variety of matters concerning the Panama Canal on both sides. I commend the distinguished Senator, and I do believe that the administration ought to provide us with these files, ought to provide us with the appropriate people who can testify, and let us know who they are, so that we can once and for all get this matter out in the open, and determine exactly what type of regime we are dealing with, and above all, what kind of a person we are dealing with in Omar Torrijos.

The chairman of the committee is here on the floor, and I do not mean to usurp his function by making this particular request, but let me just say this, for myself personally: I feel that it is a very reasonable request, and we ought to be able to look into the matter. I think for the benefit of all Members of the Senate, and certainly for the benefit of the country as a whole. As everyone knows, this Panama Canal problem has become one of the paramount problems of our day. There are differing viewpoints and differing sides to this question, but I would like to see both sides brought out, and not just one side. I am not sure we have had enough brought out on the impact of the treaty side to keep people properly informed.

I think the people should know if there is evidence of drug trafficking, and if the evidence you have indicated can be obtained, I think we ought to see it.

I thank the Senator from Kansas for his statement on the floor of the Senate, and certainly want to give any support I can to the committee and to the American people.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Oct. 17, 1977]

TREATY AMENDMENTS WOULD CONFIRM JOINT STATEMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am today submitting two amendments to the "treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal" which is now pending before the U.S. Senate. My amendments are based upon the joint statement issued by President Carter and Panamanian Gen. Omar Torrijos last Friday concerning American defense and passage rights to be guaranteed under this treaty. The Carter-Torrijos statement was intended to reconcile differing interpretations of our rights to defend the canal and to transit the canal quickly in time of crisis. My amendments are intended to clear up the ambiguities in the treaty itself which caused those differences in interpretation. In so doing, I am using virtually the same language contained in the joint statement of October 14.

A POSITIVE STEP

I think that the joint statement issued on Friday by President Carter and General Torrijos was a step in the right direction in clearing up confusion over our defense and passage rights under the Panama Canal Treaty. This had become a source of extreme concern to myself, and to many other Members of the Senate. The Carter-Torrijos statement indicates that there is, at least, some agreement between the two heads of state about U.S. rights under the treaty. But it does not end there. The solution is not that simple.

Since the leaders of both nations have agreed upon this more specific language, it should be incorporated into the treaty itself. There is no longer any justification for leaving the treaty language ambiguous. In fact, it is essential that the treaty itself be modified to reflect the agreement.

AGREEMENT MUST BE WRITTEN INTO LAW

It is important to remember that the joint statement, by itself, is not binding. It has no legal effect. In fact, General Torrijos announced on his return to Panama that he did not sign anything while he was in Washington. So I would suggest that he may not think it is even binding at all. Neither Carter nor Torrijos will occupy positions of authority when the treaty provisions becomes significant in the year 2000, so there must be some basis in law to insure that their pledge will be honored.

It is for that reason, that I am introducing these two amendments to the treaty on permanent neutrality, containing language which is virtually identical to that in the Carter-Torrijos statement.

Because my amendments seek to incorporate the same language used in the statement, I trust that the administration will have no objections to their adoption by the Senate. For several weeks now, the administration has argued that any amendments or reservations to the Panama Canal treaties would be unacceptable because they would require renegotiation of certain portions of the treaties.

But the Carter-Torrijos agreement disproves the notion that renegotiation of certain parts of these treaties is impossible. It disproves the notion that the present proposal is necessarily "the best treaty we can get."

In fact, improvements in both the basic treaty and the treaty on permanent neutrality are both possible and practical. I believe that Congress has a responsibility to continue to press for direct clarifications and improvements in both treaties. Certainly, the joint statement issued last Friday would never have been made if congressional pressure for clarification had not been exerted during the past several days.

Previously, I introduced amendments and reservations bearing on other aspects of these treaties as well. Each of them is based upon genuine concern about significant portions of the treaties. I do not undertake these modification efforts lightly. But I do think that this recent instance has demonstrated just how important it is that all of us in the Senate continue to carefully analyze this treaty for possible defects or omissions. And if we find them, we must seek to correct them. This is our constitutional responsibility and our duty to the American people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the amendments be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMDT. No. 7 (EXEC. 95-1)

At the end of article IV, add the following: "Each of the Parties shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to such regime of neutrality, and shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal. Any United States action shall be directed at insuring that the Canal shall remain open, secure, and accessible, and such action shall not be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of the Republic of Panama."

AMDT. No. 8 (EXEC. 95-1)

At the end of the first paragraph of article VI, add the following: "The provisions of this paragraph are for the purpose of, and shall be construed as, assuring the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, assuring that such vessel go to the head of the line of vessels awaiting transit of the Canal, in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, during the previous 3 weeks beginning September 26 and running through October 14, the Committee on Foreign Relations held a series of hearings on the proposed Panama Canal agreements. During that 15-day work period, the committee devoted 11 days to the consideration of these agreements, hearing a total of 68 witnesses, including 16 executive branch witnesses, 15 witnesses from Congress, and 37 outside experts and public witnesses. Regrettably, neither President Ford nor Governor Reagan was able to accept the committee's invitation to testify on this matter, despite our best efforts to accommodate them.

I believe, nevertheless, that the committee has compiled a full and complete hearing record, both pro and con. We will further endeavor to get these hearings printed just as quickly as we can for the information of the Senate, the Congress, and the public-at-large.

In view of the clarifying statement issued last Friday, the committee will meet Wednesday morning to go over this matter with the conegotiators, Ellsworth Bunker and Sol Linowitz. While nothing further is scheduled beyond this meeting, the committee in the days ahead, I am sure, will be discussing how it wishes to proceed. The necessity for further hearings, it seems to me, will depend in very large part on any gaps that may be uncovered in reviewing the hearing record established thus far.

I want to thank all the members of the committee for their diligence and cooperation throughout the committee's hearing process on the proposed treaties and I ask unanimous consent that a complete list of all the witnesses heard by the committee be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

REMARKS BY DEAN RUSK

Mr. Chairman and distinguished Senators.

I am very glad to be here this morning to express my views on the Panama Treaties now pending before you. I am especially glad to be here with my distinguished friend Mr. Henry Kissinger. The fact that we are here together is a reminder that four Presidents and four Secretaries of State, of both political parties, have been closely involved in the negotiations which have led to the documents now before you for your consideration under the Constitution. Other Presidents in this post-war period have also felt the pressures for a change in the status quo originated by the Treaty of 1903.

My remarks will be relatively brief and will consist of the two or three main considerations which led me to support the proposed Treaties with Panama. Since you are exercising a solemn constitutional responsibility, you will necessarily go into every aspect of these Treaties in great detail but as a private citizen, I propose simply to point to those aspects of the problem which seem to me to be decisive in forming my own opinion.

I begin with the conviction that the Treaty of 1903, as amended, offers a very fragile platform on which to try to stand in these closing decades of the 20th Century. In the mid-1960's, during and after the tragic riots in Panama, it became apparent to us that history had overtaken the status quo in Panama and that a new relationship would have to be found if our vital interests in the operation and safety of the Canal were to be assured. Here I do not rest upon the murky circumstances surrounding the secession of Panama from Colombia and the conclusion of the Treaty with Mr. Bunau-Varilla, a citizen of France with uncertain credentials as a representative of Panama. It is a fascinating story with a colorful cast of characters. But I see little point in our now wearing sack cloth and ashes over what our grandfathers did in another historical era, when what happened in most of the world was determined by decisions made or not made in a handful of western capitals. We should not, however, be under the illusion that those events could stand the test of modern standards of treaty making.

The 1903 Treaty seemed to me to take its place alongside the so-called "unequal" treaties which certain western powers imposed upon China in the Nineteenth Century and the Capitulations which gave certain powers extraterritorial rights in the Ottoman Empire. Even if we had acquired absolute title to the Canal Zone, which we did not, the general international policy and practice of decolonization would have rendered the status quo in Panama untenable.

The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is now pending before your committee and your action upon it has been delayed for reasons well known to you. I would suppose, however, that the contents of that Convention already apply to the United States and to other nations since the Convention simply codifies established rules of customary international law.

It seems to me that the 1903 Treaty with Panama is vulnerable to the doctrine of "fundamental change of circumstances" (rebus sic stantibus) found in Article 62 of the Convention. In my view, the United Nations Charter contains the overriding statement of international law and policy—despite our occasional irritations over the conduct of Members in some organs of the UN organization itself and the many failures of Members of the world community in giving effect to Charter precepts. The Charter insists upon the "sovereign equality of all its Members" (Article 2, paragraph 1) and calls for respect for "the equal rights . . . of nations large and small" (Preamble). I have already mentioned decolonization, well established both in principle and practice by the Charter and by the history of this post-war era.

Treaties are the primary source of international law partly because they are drafted in relatively precise terms of legal obligation and, more importantly, because they represent the consent of the sovereign parties who agree to them. We can not seriously suggest that the 1903 Treaty represents the consent of Panama or of its people. It would be accurate to say that if the United States were a party to a treaty which became obnoxious to our public policy and repugnant to our people, we would move to denounce it and relieve ourselves of its burdens.

Article 64 of the Convention on the Law of Treaties states, "if a new preemptory norm of general international law emerges, any existing treaty which is in conflict with that norm becomes void and terminates." Lawyers have debated at considerable length this doctrine of "jus cogens" and the identity of the norms which can be said to be preemptory in character. They are probably few in number. I would suggest to you that, in the modern world, one nation can not maintain a presence within another nation without the consent of the second nation. If the situation in Eastern Europe is different, the contrast merely emphasizes the general rule and provides no precedent for the United States. We have withdrawn from valuable bases and installations in Libya, Ethiopia and Pakistan; we have seen the use of bases in Turkey sharply restricted by that Government; we withdrew our forces from France on the demand of President de Gaulle. I can imagine the astonishment on President de Gaulle's face had I been instructed to tell him that we could not withdraw our forces from France because their presence was covered by an agreement between our two countries. We know that such bases and personnel as we have in other countries require the consent of the governments concerned and that some of them have charged us very high prices for that consent. The 1903 Treaty with Panama is not an adequate substitute for such consent: it is not an arrangement which could be negotiated in this latter part of the 20th Century. I do not know whether President Theodore Roosevelt was accurately quoted in a remark about Panama: "We wanted it; we took it." But let us be under no illusion—an attempt to maintain our position in the Panama Canal Zone on the basis of the 1903 Treaty would be an act of force—as in Eastern Europe. We can choose that course if we are prepared to pay the heavy political, economic and military costs involved.

In concluding my comment on the status of the 1903 Treaty, let me add that I do not believe that we could afford to allow the validity of that Treaty to be tested in the International Court of Justice. I am glad that that Treaty has not been pursued in the General Assembly of the United Nations where I would suspect we would be almost alone in the voting. Some of our closest friends would leave us because of considerations of general policy. When the United Nations Security Council met in Panama in 1973 and had before it a resolution on Panama, hostile to United States interests, it was necessary for our representative to exercise a veto, with no Member of the Council voting with us. There were 13 "yes" votes, the U.K. abstained, and the United States cast the only negative vote. Close friends such as France, Australia, Austria and Kenya voted against us.

An alternative is to try to safeguard our interests in the Panama Canal by agreement between ourselves and Panama in a modern setting. There are very strong feelings among the peoples of our two countries, feelings which make it very difficult for governments to find agreement with which all can be satisfied. These feelings will be further acerbated during the present debate in both countries about the new treaties; already what is said in one country is being used to inflame feelings in the other country. Opponents of these treaties object to our making such agreements with a dictator. Having been involved with this problem before the present regime in Panama came to power, I would suggest that the more democratic the government in Panama, the more insistent they would be on a prompt and fundamental change in the arrangements regarding the Canal.

Our national interest lies in access to and the safety of the Panama Canal itself, not in a continuation of our special position in the Zone. I believe that our interest in the Canal includes a residual responsibility to the maritime nations of the world and to certain nations of our own hemisphere for whom the Canal is a life line. But surely we should attempt to satisfy these interests by agreement and should seek to engage the friendship and cooperation of the Panamanian government and people in the decades ahead. We can give ourselves a chance to repair the injuries we have inflicted upon national pride and individual dignity and proceed in the future on the basis that we and the Panamanians need each other in these matters.

We must take into account, however, the possibility that events will not work out as we now hope. Under the new treaties, we shall have 23 years to test the ability of Panama and ourselves to proceed on the basis of agreement. The responsibilities which we would have until the year 2000 clearly make it possible for us to insure the operation and safety of the Canal. Beginning with the year 2000, questions regarding passage and safety of the Canal would be governed by the provisions of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. Under Article IV of this Treaty, "The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty." The joint responsibility of the United States and Panama for that "regime of neutrality" as spelled out in the Treaty gives us, in my judgment, all that we need to maintain our essential interests in the matter, namely, passage and the security of the Canal itself.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, of the discussion which has occurred about whether Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty is understood in the same way by both ourselves and Panama and that discussions have been going on between Senators, the Executive Branch and Panama on that point. It would be inappropriate for me to inject myself into those discussions at this point. I might offer one observation, however, which may be relevant. I hope that we and Panama would not get tangled up with each other over the word "intervention". That is a word which has accumulated many barnacles over the years and carries with it memories which we ought to try to forget. What we are interested in is access to and the security of the Panama Canal. Measures to assure its passage and safety do not mean interference in the internal affairs of Panama.

In any event, I do not believe that we should approach such matters in terms of the worst cause imaginable but rather through a genuine desire and expectation to work things out on an amicable basis. Providence has not given us the ability to pierce the fog of the future with accuracy and the year 2000 is a long way off. Perhaps we should not, today, try to answer every problem which might be posed to some future President and Congress. I must confess, however, that Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty played a major role in my own decision to support these two Treaties. If, God forbid, it should ever become necessary for a President and a Congress to take strong measures to keep the Canal functioning and safe, they would be in a far stronger position to do so under the Treaties of 1977 than under the anachronistic Treaty of 1903.

Thus, whether we are thinking of the principles upon which we hope to see a cooperative community of nations move into the future or are thinking about a hard headed approach to adverse contingencies which may lurk in the future, it seems to me to be to our advantage to give effect to these two new Treaties. The consequences of not doing so could be very severe. I see no point in inviting these consequences upon ourselves now when we have a good chance to avoid them altogether.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE HENRY A. KISSINGER

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to express my views on the proposed treaties with Panama which are before you. Over a period of years I participated in the negotiations and have given much thought to the question of how we can best assure in the decades ahead our interest in the free, neutral, and efficient operation of the Panama Canal.

You have already heard from the Secretaries of State and Defense from Ambassadors Bunker and Linowitz, from the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other officials of the Administration. You have had an opportunity to assess the detailed provisions and background of the two new treaties and the Administration's reasons for urging that the Senate advise and consent to ratification. In supporting ratification I want to address not the detailed clauses of the agreement but some fundamental issues raised by the treaties.

Our nation's foreign policy must be based on a conception of enduring national goals and permanent responsibilities, not on the accidents of personality or change for the sake of novelty with the advent of each new Presidential Administration. The future well-being and security of this country can never be a partisan issue. They affect every American, and, given our central role, every human being concerned with the preservation and strengthening of the cause of freedom.

Our substantial stake in the Panama Canal is a case in point. The United States has a vital interest in the free, neutral, and efficient operation of the Canal. This interest cannot be compromised; we cannot foresee the day when it will be inconsequential.

Up to now this interest has been identified with the precise treaty relationship we established in 1903 under vastly different circumstances. But four successive Presidents and their Secretaries of State, representing both political parties, have been persuaded over a period of thirteen years that a new treaty relationship with Panama is more likely to serve the long-term security and foreign policy of the United States; above all that it would best assure what is the essence of our interest: the efficiency, neutrality, accessibility, and security of the Canal. All four Presidents come to the view that the Treaty of 1903 no longer adequately assures that interest. The present arrangements include provisions which are no longer essential and which could over time actually make protection of our vital interests more difficult by forcing us into actions increasingly in conflict with our traditional allies in the Western Hemisphere.

It is my conviction that the two treaties recently negotiated with Panama do indeed protect our long-term interest in the Canal more effectively and under conditions more in keeping with present-day realities than is possible under the 1903 Treaty.

We must recognize that however we in the United States may view that Treaty, the rest of the world and especially the nations of the Western Hemisphere do not regard it as an equitable and freely negotiated agreement. It was reached in ambiguous circumstances and no Panamanian ever signed it. Some even question its legality. To insist on these arrangements would mean that over time we would be compelled to fall back on the use of force as the ultimate basis for our presence. This we should be prepared to do when our vital interests can be defended in no other way. But this is not the case here because the treaties give us a clear, and on balance a better, alternative.

Under the terms of the new Panama Canal Treaty, nothing of real significance to us in the existing arrangement for management and defense of the Canal will change during the remainder of this century. The United States will continue to control operation of the Canal; United States military forces will continue to provide for defense of the Canal from within Panamanian territory. At the same time, the new treaty arrangement establishes a cooperative working relationship with Panama which will enhance our ability to ensure the Canal's security and efficient operation, provide for an orderly transition, and increase Panama's stake in the long-term secure and neutral operation of the Canal.

After the year 2000, when management of the Canal passes to Panama, Article IV of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal will become controlling. The Neutrality Treaty not only establishes the legal obligation of both Panama and the United States to maintain a permanently neutral Canal, it also defines neutrality clearly in terms of concrete standards for the operation of the Canal which both parties are pledged to maintain. Article IV makes the United States a guarantor of that permanent neutrality. It thus gives the United States the continuing right, unilaterally if necessary, to defend the Canal and its operation against threats to the neutrality of the Canal—and thus, the ability to defend the Canal for the indefinite future. And this same regime of neutrality, and our right and responsibility to underwrite it, will apply as well to any other international waterway that might be built in Panama in the future.

Furthermore, under Article V of the Neutrality Treaty, Panama would relinquish the right to invite or accept foreign military forces or foreign military installations anywhere in the Republic. This would bar Panama from engaging in an alliance with any other power in a way which involved the presence of military personnel on its soil. By the same token, Panama's breach of that commitment would entitle and oblige the United States to take appropriate action to ensure the Canal's neutrality.

We would not, in short, have a general right of "intervention" in Panama's internal and domestic affairs. Nor would we want such a right. But we have under the new treaties the right and obligation to take such action as is required to ensure that the Canal remain permanently neutral—free of the threat of foreign military presence and forever open to the ocean-borne commerce of the world on a non-discriminatory basis.

The new treaties will establish a far stronger legal underpinning and political environment for the protection of our interests in the Canal while retaining all the essentials of assuring the Canal's security. Their ratification is thus an opportunity to advance fundamental American foreign policy interests. Their rejection, on the other hand, would be read by the nations of the Hemisphere as a demonstration that this nation stands on force as the final arbiter even when a constructive alternative is available. Such a course would be unnecessarily costly to many other of our interests, particularly to the solidarity and alliance of the Western Hemisphere nations that has been central to our foreign policy for generations. And I am convinced that we shall not again be given the opportunity to safeguard and advance our interests on terms as favorable as those which have just been negotiated. The moment when we are clearly strong enough to defend our rights in the Canal and while the Canal is free of immediate threat and menace provides the best opportunity to preempt a potential crisis and to secure the future of the Canal on mutually beneficial terms.

Let me turn now to some of the concerns and questions that have been raised with respect to the new treaties.

First, some have asked what would happen if Panama were to abrogate the treaties. There is no question that this is a possibility. But it must be viewed against the near-certainty that the 1903 Treaty will not be accepted any longer either by Panama or by the other nations of the Hemisphere. The question therefore is which arrangement puts us in the best legal, political, and military position to protect our rights and interests if we are forced to do so by the unilateral action of Panama. I believe that the new treaties will significantly reduce the risks of abrogation, and will also create far better conditions in which we could defend our rights if abrogation should occur.

By establishing a relationship of shared responsibility and benefit, the new treaties make Panama a partner in a successful Canal enterprise. They increase Panama's stake in safeguarding the vital interests we wish to assure—a free, open, safe, and well-run Canal. The new arrangement accords with the reality that consent and cooperative endeavor are the only bases for secure operation of a canal which is located within Panamanian territory and even now is run by a predominantly Panamanian labor force. But if, despite everything, we have to act to defend the Canal, we would be in a far stronger position to do so in the name of a 1977 treaty freely negotiated and signed in the presence of the heads of government of most of the Western Hemisphere nations than in the name of an agreement concluded seventy five years ago and which every Latin American nation in every recent meeting of the Organization of American States has repeatedly urged us to replace.

One of the strongest arguments in favor of ratification is in fact its impact on cooperative Western Hemisphere relationships. Our decisions on these treaties will testify to them whether or not we are willing to resolve disputes with them on the basis of negotiation. This does not mean that ratification of the treaties will resolve all differences between us and our neighbors to the south. Our capacity for cooperation, understanding, and imagination will be tested in this Hemisphere long after the Panama issue is resolved and for as far into the future as one can see. There will be many who do not wish us well in the area even if we ratify the treaties. But failure to ratify will provide hostile forces with a permanent issue of incalculable value around which to rally and encourage a vast new tide of anti-American sentiment and make it politically impossible for our friends to rally to our side.

I find it significant that no Hemisphere leader, regardless of what his private feelings on this issue might be, feels able publicly to take, any position other than that of strongest support for the modernization of the 1903 Treaty. This reflects the depth of public sentiment on the issue. No government and no public opinion in any of the countries of this Hemisphere would be willing to support us if we now refuse to modernize the Canal relationship. We would witness a gradual deterioration of our relationships even when some leaders might prefer to retain constructive ties. If the treaties are accepted, on the other hand, our many friends in the Hemisphere will be enabled to cooperate in the development of a constructive Western Hemisphere policy.

Another question which has been raised is whether the neutral status of the Canal would mean that hostile warships could transit the Canal and, in effect, benefit from U.S. protection. I can only comment that the United States has and must continue to have at its disposal other means to defend its vital security interests in any such situation. The United States must have the capacity to control the sea lanes; hence we must be able to prevent hostile ships from reaching the Canal. If we do not maintain that capability, we are in a perilous condition indeed and the provisions of a legal document will be precious little help.

I recognize the deep feeling of many Americans who wish, after the Vietnam tragedy, to see an end to yielding and retreat by the United States. No one can appreciate such concerns better than one who strove for an honorable outcome during the Vietnam period. But the Canal is not the issue to select to demonstrate that we remain strong and resolute. Panama is the smallest and weakest of nations. We are not "giving" the Canal to Panama; we are, rather, ensuring our ability to protect it. By taking constructive action now to revise our relationship with Panama in an atmosphere free of physical pressure, while we are still able objectively to assess the long-term risks and benefits, we will be demonstrating fundamental strength, not weakness. It is just this ability to distinguish between symbol and reality, to plan for future needs and to take timely action to advance our basic interests that is the essence of a strong and effective world policy.

Firmness in the defense of essential national interests is vital. But a nation assures its international position by understanding and defining clearly what its interests are and taking the precise appropriate and necessary action to safeguard those interests. Unreasoning adherence to the status quo has never been the mark of an effective and vigorous foreign policy.

We have demonstrated ourselves capable of meeting the challenge of the unprecedented on many occasions in the past. At the end of World War II, we embarked on a number of new initiatives—the Marshall Plan, the North Atlantic Treaty, Point Four, to cite a few—that constituted a dramatic change from the course we had followed in the past. We did so because we realized that the new circumstances of the post-war era required new responses—that we could not assure the security and prosperity of our nation by adhering to the isolationist policies of the past. To cling to outmoded approaches was to allow ourselves to be overwhelmed by future events.

And there are many more recent examples of constructive response to changing world conditions. The efforts to control the arms race, the opening of relations with China, our efforts to modernize the institutions of international economic cooperation are cases in point. In each case, we did not hesitate to modify old policies and arrangements when we felt that our national interest would only be preserved by doing so.

The new Panama Canal treaties should be viewed in the same light. They mark a step forward, an improvement over the present situation. They present you and the people of this country with an opportunity to modernize an outdated arrangement that has itself come to threaten the very interests it was designed to protect.

Beyond the immediate issue with which they deal, these treaties represent the most important and serious international undertaking formally submitted to the Congress by the Administration of President Carter. Thus you have a doubly grave responsibility: a rejection of the treaties would not only cause a crisis in our relations with the nations of the Western Hemisphere; it would in addition weaken the President's national authority at the beginning of his term. It would thus be a demonstration of national weakness, which would be taken by friend and enemy alike as evidence that we are systematically incapable of recognizing and pursuing our international objectives because of domestic division, doubt and conflict. This would be all the more so because we have every reason to consider that the new treaties in fact advance our interests and are seen as such throughout the world.

In supporting both the concept of a new treaty arrangement and the essential structure of what has been negotiated I do not mean to imply that the Senate's role in the ratification process should be that of a mere rubber stamp. On the contrary I believe that the Senate can and should make a constructive contribution clearing up ambiguities in the current texts and assuring the American people that our vital interests are indeed being safeguarded.

My support of the treaties is based on my reading of two key provisions—a reading which coincides with the Administration's interpretation:

First is our right to "maintain the regime of neutrality" under Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, and Second is the meaning of our right to "expeditious transit" under Article VI of the Neutrality Treaty.

With respect to our right to defend the Canal, I concur in the Administration's interpretation that we have the right and obligation to act, if necessary unilaterally, to defend the Canal's neutrality. It is unfortunate that the word "intervention" has been injected into the debate to characterize that right; this word conveys implications with respect to interference in the domestic affairs of Panama that we neither need nor claim, and which are provocative throughout Latin America. With respect to expeditious passage, I consider that it must mean "priority passage" in wartime and speediest possible passage at all times.

The fact remains that these interpretations have been drawn into question—partly by ambiguous statements of Panamanian officials understandably concerned with their own ratification process and subject to attacks, which are the mirror image of the opposition in this country, that they have yielded too much to the US. Ambiguity is, of course, the essence of diplomacy; it often permits each side to maintain its domestic position while safeguarding essential international interests. I have resorted to it in negotiations on several occasions.

I have never considered ambiguity of language acceptable, however, if it masked a true difference of interpretation. Whatever the words of an international instrument may say, it is vital in my experience that both sides share the same understanding of the intent of that instrument. In this particular case, ambiguity or lack of public understanding could sow the seeds of future crisis if in fact the parties are not of a single view as to the central provisions of the treaties.

I believe, therefore, that the Senate can play its constructive role by explicitly and formally endorsing the interpretation of Article IV that has been put forward by the President and the Secretary of State: that the new treaty confers upon the United States the right and obligation unilaterally to defend neutrality of access to the Canal, and to defend the Canal itself should that ever become necessary. I see no need at this juncture to renegotiate the treaties. Nor do I favor a Senate reservation which implies a split between the Congress and the Executive on a matter which calls for national unity.

The Senate interpretation should be reduced to formal and explicit language with the Senate's advice that it be submitted by the Administration as an integral part of the instrument of ratification either by protocol or some other method which would ensure that it becomes the authoritative and mutually acceptable explanation. Another way of dealing with the interpretation would be an agreed minute between Panama and the United States which would then be endorsed by the Senate as part of the ratification process. Either course would ensure that there could be no question or ambiguity in the future.

The same procedures could be followed with respect to the meaning of "expeditious transit." Either the Senate or an agreed minute with Panama should state that in time of war United States naval ships and auxiliaries should be given priority passage and at all times the speediest passage possible. In either case the full Senate should approve the interpretations by a two-thirds majority.

I wish to express my strong hope that these steps be taken in harmony and cooperation with and not in repudiation of the Administration. They are fully consistent with the Administration's interpretation. They reflect our necessities; they take nothing away from Panama's dignity. The ability of the two branches of government to work out a constructive solution to this problem is a great service they could render to America's position of continued leadership in the world. I can think of no event more reassuring to our friends and allies around the world than the positive resolution of this difficult debate in cooperation between the Congress and the President after all the divisions of the last ten years.

This is now the real issue of the Panama Canal treaties and their ultimate significance. I am confident that statesmanship on the part of all concerned will bring this debate to its proper, positive conclusion. For thirty years this country has borne a vital responsibility for international security, for the health of the world economy, and for the cause of human freedom. To fulfill this historic role we must be a united people; Congress and the President, Republicans and Democrats, must all have the sense that we are engaged in a shared enterprise. It is in this spirit that the Panama Canal treaties must be considered, and it is in this spirit that I respectfully urge their ratification.

STATEMENT BY ROBERT CHARLES SMITH

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: It is a distinct pleasure for me to appear before you today representing The American Legion. Needless to say, we are each aware of the thousands of inches of newsprint and the hours of television coverage which have been devoted to the proposed Panama Canal Treaty in the past month. My reason for appearing before you is two-fold: first, to represent the viewpoint and position of The American Legion as adopted by our recently concluded 59th National Convention, and to spell out—objectively and dispassionately—what our concerns are and why we object to this specific treaty.

With me this morning is our Chairman of The American Legion's Foreign Relations Commission, Dr. Robert P. Foster, who for the past 14 years has served as President of Northwest Missouri State University located in Maryville. Dr. Foster has visited Panama and, along with Commission members, has examined the Panama situation for quite some time. During this time, he has discussed the matter with treaty proponents and opponents, including both U.S. and Panamanian negotiators. He will be available for questions from the Committee following my statement.

Today, I have come to speak for our four million members of The American Legion and the American Legion Auxiliary. We represent miners in West Virginia; grain growers in Illinois and Iowa; energy producers of Texas; machinery manufacturers in New York; and shipping industry of all states where rivers and harbors open to the sea . . . altogether we represent a composite and microcosm of the United States. For most of us in The American Legion and all our citizens are either buyers or sellers of commodities passing through the Panama Canal.

Moreover, all of us are dependent on the protection of the U.S. Navy to control the seas surrounding our country in the center of the Western Hemisphere. Quite frankly, the main thrust from every Legion Post has been the same deep apprehension about the proposed Treaty with Panama. Not the least concerned were our Legion Posts in the U.S. Canal Zone. Did the United States really intend to abandon its citizens to a dictatorship? If so, what did the United States stand to gain from such a giveaway?

What our Legion people do not understand is why is it necessary to have a new treaty. Have we, the people of the United States, been unfair, unjust or dishonorable with the Panamanians? I think not. We have lived up to our agreements of 1903, and subsequent revisions of that Treaty. No one has accused the U.S. Government with inefficiency. In fact, the contrary is true.

There are suggestions that the discovery of Alaskan oil by our space satellites in the early '60's brought about sudden realization by the oil industry that the U.S. Canal Zone, a U.S. Government reservation, was not the ideal type of property for the shipment of large tonnage of crude oil. Perhaps some type of commercial arrangement, even with a foreign country, was preferable for a booming international business.

Witnesses before this Committee from the U.S. Canal Zone told our staff that one major oil company is already building a large oil pipeline across the Republic of Panama. The tree line is cut and the pipes are being unloaded. One of the Canal pilots told us he was on board the S.S. Pennsylvania Sun and S.S. Cove Trader when bargaining was going on inside the U.S. Canal Zone between Panamanian customs officials and the ships officers. The Canal pilot, Capt. Leonard E. Bell, heard the full story and it sounded like tales from the Barbary Pirates of another century.

There are suggestions that a few large international bankers saw the possibility for placing large loans with Torrijos, either because Torrijos offered high interest rates, improved Panamanian management with lower labor costs, or some of the profits from the crude oil flowing from the north slope. In any case, the bankers must have seen the possibility of profits. We know that numerous U.S. and international banks have loaned billions to the Torrijos government and to Panamanian addresses.

There have been suggestions that Communist subversion started in the mid-50s from Prague inciting people to oppose U.S. ownership in the Canal Zone. This may have had a profound effect. The Washington Evening Star ran a story from Bonn, Germany on September 13, 1956 that "international communism has opened an agitation campaign in Latin America against U.S. control of the Canal Zone." Of one thing we can be sure. It was not U.S. national security interests that abet these new treaties.

There are political considerations and military considerations to this treaty. There are economic and environmental problems of considerable magnitude for the United States, the Western Hemisphere and the entire world.

From a political standpoint, I think our firm consideration must be the beliefs and convictions of the people of the United States. Within the last two years, we have seen numerous polls to determine the attitude of U.S. citizens. Those polls have shown that from 50-90% Americans oppose the proposed Treaties which were signed on September 7, 1977 by President Carter and Gen. Omar Torrijos.

We in The American Legion believe under our system of government that the will of the people is very important. The knowledge, the will and the dedication of our people provide the amperage to our national life.

At the Legion National Convention in Denver, we heard the pros and cons of the proposed Treaty. We heard from Ambassador Sol Linowitz as pro-Treaty, and we heard anti-Treaty viewpoints from expert witnesses, including those of Senator Hatch. In our American Legion Magazine, we invited Panama's Foreign Minister Gonzalez Revilla's pro-Treaty and Congressman Daniel Flood's anti-Treaty to give their positions. When it came time to vote on our Foreign Policy resolution at the Convention, we deliberately set the Panama Resolution, No. 445, aside so we could offer each Department from each State the opportunity to vote. The pressure to vote was so strong from the thousands of convention delegates that we could not take a roll call vote by state. Support of The American Legion's Resolution 445 which opposes the Treaty was unanimous. The silence of pro-treaty support seemed even more persuasive than did the unanimous vote against the Treaty. (A copy of this resolution is attached for your perusal.)

I will now discuss the reservations and objections which we have to this proposed Treaty. The first is the strategic and military importance of continued U.S. control of the Canal and the Canal Zone. At the onset, we realize that the United States has a one-ocean Navy with a global responsibility.

Today all but 13 of the ships in the U.S. Navy—the exception being the large aircraft carriers—can pass through the Canal. Moreover, we, along with the Congress, must be "forward looking" and long-range prognosticators regarding the true effects now and in the future of the proposed Treaty. As each of you are aware, we have made a national commitment to the "mini-carrier" concept. And, when they come on line in 3-5 years, I have been assured by the Navy that they can transverse the Canal, making the Canal even more important in a military sense in the years ahead.

Hanson Baldwin has recently written: "It is ironic, indeed, that in an era when the U.S. Navy needs the Canal to a greater degree than at any time since the end of World War II, Washington is considering its abandonment. The Navy today is in the same strategic bind it was in prior to World War II: It is a one-ocean Navy (in size and power) with two-ocean responsibilities. We are outnumbered in submarines and surface ships by the Soviet Union, and, more than at any period since 1945 the Navy must have a quick transfer capability between the Atlantic and Pacific in order to meet sudden crises.

"General V. H. Krulak, USMC (Ret.), writing in the summer 1975 issue of Strategic Review, summarized the Canal's naval importance: 'In truth the Panama Canal is an essential link between the naval forces of the United States deployed in the Atlantic and in the Pacific. It is only because of the waterway that we are able to risk having what amounts to a bare-bone, one-ocean Navy.'

"During the Vietnam War about 98 percent of all supplies for our forces were shipped by sea; of this total, approximately 33 percent were loaded in East and Gulf Coast ports and transited the Canal. The volume of military-sponsored cargo in the four years from 1964 to 1968 increased for dry cargo, by some 640 percent and for petroleum products by about 430 percent. And the number of U.S. Government vessels (chiefly naval) transiting the Canal increased from 284 in 1965 to more than 1,500 in 1968."

Within the military community, and among the retired and active military, there is great diversity of opinion. In addition to the letter of four distinguished Chiefs of Naval Operation, including the former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Admiral Thomas H. Moorer, saying that the proposed Treaty is contrary to the security interests of the United States, we are hearing from many military leaders and the majority of these opinions, like the majority of our citizens, are opposed to the give away of the Zone and the Canal.

As you are aware, Admiral Moorer forcefully reaffirmed his views to this Committee earlier this week and clearly stated the indispensable strategic importance of the Canal.

From a military viewpoint, a commander never gives away strategic territory which he may have to fight to regain. The U.S. Canal Zone is strategic territory. All the military, both active and retired agree on that point.

From an economic perspective, the Canal is vital to United States interests. In 1975, approximately 14,000 ships transited the Canal of which 45 percent originated in the United States and 23 percent were bound for the United States. No other nation even approaches the invaluable, economic stake which we have in the Canal. However, the Canal is important to all maritime commercial nations since 96 percent of the world's merchant fleet can transit it.

The Canal is just this year assuming an additional commercial importance to the United States as Alaskan oil begins to flow. When the Alaskan pipeline reaches its full capacity, it will yield 1.2 million barrels of oil a day. The west coast of the United States can accommodate only 700,000 barrels a day. This means that approximately 500,000 barrels a day cannot be used on the west coast, and must be transported to the east. No pipeline has yet been constructed across the United States, and the trip around the Horn, as has been demonstrated, is not economically feasible. Unhindered use of the Panama Canal is critical until an adequate pipeline can be constructed.

From an over-all economic perspective, should the tolls go up another 25-30% as projected by Ambassador Sol Linowitz, and the tolls since 1973, have already gone up about 50%, many of our exports will be priced out of the world market. The grain producers and dealers, for example, frequently depend on a fraction of 1% as their profit margin.

You may have read in the Journal of Commerce, September 20, 1977, where the New Orleans Port Director, Mr. Edward S. Reed stated: "Since grain exports are the United States' best source of balance of payments loans, I think it is incumbent upon the Federal Government to closely scrutinize the possible effects of canal toll increases on the farm commodities exported from the United States." Mr. Reed's comments would pertain to all farmers, farm commodities, shippers and port facilities involved in our U.S. agricultural exports.

In the same Journal of Commerce article, the President of Lykes Brothers Steamship Company, Mr. W. J. Amoss, Jr., expressed his opposition to the Treaty because of its adverse impact on Canal users. Mr. Amoss, who had previously supported the Treaty, said the proposed Treaty spelled sheer disaster for operators east of the Canal and going westbound through the canal.

I stress the economic impact that United States commercial interests will suffer because this starts the day the Treaty is ratified, Ambassador Linowitz has stated the tolls will immediately go up 25 to 30 percent. And just what are the economic facts for such port and shipping centers as Boston, New York, Baltimore, Hampton Roads, Charleston, Mobile, Houston and New Orleans?

I mentioned New Orleans last because Louisiana is my home state. People living along the bayou are genuinely concerned about the ramifications of this proposed Treaty on our trade, jobs and general economic conditions.

I do not wish to overstate the dangers we foresee for Louisiana and the Gulf States but 38% of all water-borne commerce, over $30.0 billion in world trade, move from the Gulf ports. Over one-half of all the grain exported from the United States moves from the Gulf ports and about one-third of these grains pass through the Panama Canal. The Port of New Orleans is the nation's number one importer of iron and steel products. Eighty-seven percent of these products arrive via the Panama Canal.

We could spotlight other ports and jobs threatened by toll increases. Hampton Roads for example is the world's largest coal port. Over half of the 32 million tons of coal leaving Hampton Roads goes through the Panama Canal. It is my understanding that over 300,000 jobs in Virginia are either directly or indirectly affected by the Hampton Roads port complex.

I noticed in a letter to the Editor of the Washington Post on 7 October 1977 that the Port of Baltimore has a vital interest in the Panama Canal. Seventeen percent of all Baltimore's foreign commerce utilizes the Canal. The letter also stated that Maryland's State Senate and House of Delegates had by unanimous vote supported Resolution 34 calling for the United States to retain sovereignty over the U.S. Canal Zone and the Canal.

Moreover, at the present time, the United States has an over-all investment in Panama of $7 billion. By the year of our total evacuation under the terms of the Treaty, that interest will have grown to $9.3 billion. To add insult to injury, the Treaty proposes that we pay some $50.0 million per year, plus about $350.0 million in economic and military aid to have the Torrijos group take over the territory and property.

In short, all these elements of economic benefits which I have mentioned in structures, payments and loans for development will in 23 years amount to the sum of $2.262 billion. This is compared to what Panama would receive under the current Treaty during that same period, which would be the ridiculous amount of $52 million.

Contrary to popular argument, control of the Canal by the United States serves the best economic interests of the people of Panama. In 1976, U.S. agencies purchased over $29 million worth of goods in Panama, and we paid over $108 million in wages to non-U.S. citizens. United States private investments amount to 50% of the capital investment in Panama; and U.S. employees spent $39 million there.

In the Preamble to The American Legion Constitution, we pledge to "safeguard the principles of justice, freedom and democracy" in 1977 terms this translates into human rights. As this Committee is aware, Panama is a dictatorship, or in the words of Ambassador Bunker before Congressman Murphy's committee, an "authoritarian" government.

The aspect of the Torrijos government which is most significant, is that it is a repressive dictatorship. Freedom House, the respected organization which ranks countries on the basis of human rights, gives Panama the lowest rating in Latin America. Panama received the same 1977 rating on political and civil liberties as the Soviet Union and was rated even lower than Cuba.

Gen. Torrijos came to power in Panama by a coup and is governing without the consent of the people. The truth is that since Gen. Torrijos participated in the overthrow of Panama's constitutional government by gunpoint in 1968, 1.6 million people have lost their human rights. There is no recognized party except the Communist Party, called the People's Party, El Partido del Pueblo. Furthermore, the monies from Panama Canal annuities do not go directly to the people, the money goes to the Torrijos power group.

As we are all aware, the Panamanian constitution requires a plebiscite vote of the people for ratification of any new Treaty, which will be held on October 23. The sad irony is that the controlled and censored Panama press—"guided" in the terms of our chief negotiator—will never give a full and objective account of the Treaty to the Panamanian people.

Another concern which we have is the political association and economic stability of the government in Panama. On the economic side; under Gen. Omar Torrijos, Panama's national debt has grown from $167 million to $1.5 billion. The debt service alone will consume 39% of that country's budget this year. Panama's Department of Planning indicates that to refinance loans coming due, together with the $139 million deficit, a total of $323.6 million will be required. Obviously, Panama cannot financially afford to have the Treaties rejected either.

Politically, Torrijos has also busied himself with making closer political and commercial ties with the Soviet Union. Again, according to the U.S. Information Agency, top officials from the Soviet Politburo and Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party visited Panama last June. Almost immediately after the Soviet Politburo team left Panama, a Soviet commercial delegation headed by Nikolai Zinoviev arrived and concluded a major Soviet-Panama commercial agreement with the Torrijos regime. This agreement, according to news reports in the Torrijos-controlled newspaper Critica, could result in the opening of a Soviet bank to run Soviet commercial activities throughout Latin America as well as a series of other multi-million-dollar-trade and construction projects with Panama.

Whether it was a Treaty of intent or a pact of infinite promise, we don't know. The treaty was signed by Omar Torrijos' brother-in-law, Marcelino Jaen, and Soviet leader Nikolai Zinoviev who is also listed as a KGB agent. After the signing, Panama's Jaen declared the Soviet treaty "... is an event of deep historic signing, not only for our country, but for the American continent as well, who are always facing strong forces that represent a philosophy that is contrary to the destiny of Latin America."

Of deepest concern is Torrijos' close ties with Fidel Castro and Cuba. Cuba under Castro continues to aggressively export and pursue communist domination and control of other nations. Several weeks ago, the New York Times reported that 4000 more Cubans were sent to Angola recently to "stabilize the nation's most serious crisis since the 1976 civil war." The 4000 Cuban troops would increase Cuban troop strength in Angola to 19,000. This to me clearly indicates that Castro hasn't backed off one inch from his declared goal of communist domination of the Western Hemisphere and the world.

Also of concern is the reliability of the Panamanian dictator to live up to what he signs. Panama has violated the present Treaty at least 11 times during the past two years. These violations included such militant acts as the Panamanian National Guard taking up positions in December 1975 within the U.S. Zone; attempting to arrest and actually shooting a citizen in the U.S. Zone in January 1976; setting off bombs and explosions in the U.S. Zone in October 1976, and capturing a vessel, the Sea Wolf, which was operating inside Canal Zone waters and burning and desecrating the United States flag.

Our Ambassador, whose official car was shamelessly destroyed several days ago, has protested such lawless Treaty violations, but one must question the wisdom of appeasing and making further concessions to a government whose recent history is pockmarked with deliberate violations of the current Treaty. If our current Treaty with Panama is being violated on a routine basis, where is the logic that such attitudes and behavior will improve between 1977 and 1999, the magic year when Torrijos is supposed to get everything, lock, stock and barrel?

I would like to turn now to the question of United States sovereignty. Many of the arguments for the switch in sovereignty and much of the conscious or subconscious motivation for it stem, in part, from ignorance or distortion of the manner in which the Panama Canal territory was acquired by the United States and of the wording of the original Treaty of 1903.

Contrary to these assertions from public officials who should know better, we did not steal the Canal, nor does Panama have residual, titular, or any other kind of sovereignty over it. The United States bought the Canal territory—a strip across the Isthmus of Panama some 50-miles long and 10-miles wide—at a cost to the American taxpayer that far exceeded the cost of the Louisiana Purchase, the Mexican cession, the Florida Purchase, the purchase of Alaska, or any other territorial acquisition.

Despite current contentions by the State Department that the 1936 Treaty revisions recognized Panama's sovereignty over the Canal Zone, it is clear that in both wording and intent the Treaty actually re-emphasized the sovereignty, in perpetuity, of the United States.

History and the law appear to indicate in no uncertain terms that there is no merit whatsoever to the concept that the Treaty of 1903 vested so-called titular sovereignty or residual sovereignty in Panama. The wording is clear and unequivocal: "The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control" of the Canal Zone. "The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power and authority within the zone mentioned . . . which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign . . . to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority." One cannot transfer sovereignty unless one has it. The United States has, and will retain until Congress decides otherwise, complete sovereignty and control over the Canal Zone in perpetuity.

Even Gen. Torrijos in his remarks following the formal signing acknowledged United States sovereignty and I quote: "What nourished the hopes of Panamanians for the recapture of their sovereignty was the feeling that the North American people fundamentally harbored no colonial aspirations," [emphasis added].

I will now turn to the Treaties and the accompanying Annex and Protocol. This analysis is based upon the limited time in which these Treaties have been available to the layman and I urge each member of this Committee to scrutinize these documents.

(1) Sovereignty is the crucial factor in the new Treaties. Both the Prologue to the Canal Treaty, and at least six other times in the document, Panamanian sovereignty over the U.S. Zone and the Canal is acknowledged. As I stated earlier, once Torrijos is granted sovereignty all other questions are irrelevant.

(2) According to our analysis of the Treaty, should Panama abrogate the Treaty, the United States would have no legal basis in international law to maintain its position in the former Canal Zone.

(3) Article II, Section 1, of the Canal Treaty specifies that it should "be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two parties." However, it would appear that the Executive Branch is seeking ratification of the treaties without seeking enabling legislation from the House of Representatives to transfer real properties, appropriation of funds and perhaps other legislation which is not spelled out, as required by the Constitution of the United States. This bypassing of the House of Representatives appears to be an usurpation of legal powers which is clearly conveyed to the House by the Constitution.

(4) Article XII, Section 2(b), states that "during the duration of this Treaty the United States of America shall not negotiate with third states for the right to construct an inter-oceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two parties may otherwise agree." In plain terms, the United States has surrendered its rights to negotiate for a competing canal elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere unless it has Panama's consent.

(5) Article V of the Canal Treaty directs that employees of the Panama Canal Company, their dependents and other American nationals should "abide by the laws of the Republic of Panama and abstain from any activities in competition with the spirit of this Treaty." This Article also directs that they abstain from any political acts in the Republic of Panama. As I stated earlier, there are American Legion Posts in the Canal Zone and I am deeply concerned about forcing American citizens to submit to a dictatorship and their surrender of rights as Americans.

(6) Article XIII relates to payments to Panama for the right to operate the Canal. One such payment of $10 million per year from profits is cumulative which means there is a possibility that we could, over the 23 year period of the Treaty, end up owing the Panama government $230 million.

Additionally, I have strong reservation and objections to the Neutrality Treaty: (1) Only Article IV of this Treaty bears upon U.S. responsibility concerning the neutrality of the Canal and the entire document is so vague as to be virtually meaningless. In my lay reading of the entire Neutrality Treaty, I find no assurance that the United States can intervene to assure the neutrality of that vital area.

(2) Article III(e) states that "vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of all nations shall at all times be entitled to transit the canal." This statement assures the passage of warships through the canal of nations which may be at war with the United States.

(3) Article VI, Section 1, states that vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and the Republic of Panama "will be entitled to transit the canal expeditiously." The exact meaning of the word "expeditiously" is vague at best. Even more confusing is the interpretation place on the word "expeditiously," by the Chief Panamanian negotiator, who said that the United States would not be given "preferential rights."

In Louisiana we regard a contract as no better or no worse than the intent and interpretation of the contracting parties. Treaties are actually a form of international contracts where nations agree to abide by the terms specified. As this Committee knows, we are getting a wide variety of interpretations on such matters as the right of intervention, the right of priority passage for U.S. warships. Escobar Bethancourt has recently told Panamanian audiences that the United States wanted but did not get "priority or privileged passage." This information was later authenticated in a "confidential" cable released by Senator Dole which quotes Lopez Guevara that Article IV on neutrality urges U.S. officials to stop using the word intervention. Intervention is prohibited by international law.

It would be unwise at best to even further consider ratification of any treaties in any form until the serious differences in U.S. and Panamanian interpretations are closely and unquestionably resolved.

In brief summary, an evaluation of the facts about the Treaty have brought us to the day of the signing, September 7, 1977 . . . a bad day for the United States.

United States military and national security losses alone are sufficient to reject the treaty. We are giving up our naval fleet flexibility at a time when we have fewer than 400 ships in the entire United States Navy. Economic losses of the United States are difficult to calculate, but logic dictates that U.S. consumers and exporters are going to pay the toll increases. Additionally, the cost to the U.S. taxpayer is in the billions. The Torrijos government is living on borrowed money and borrowed time.

Politically, human rights under Torrijos are no better than they were under Hitler during the 1930s and yet by supporting this Treaty, our United States Government is propping up a dictatorship. Worse yet, our government is forcing Americans to live under totalitarian rule and abide by its laws and decrees. That's what World War II was all about.

The pressures the White House can bring are enormous as all of us know. The resources at the President's disposition almost defy our collective imagination. The Treaty signing festivities on September 7 were an example of Presidential style and substance. We in the Legion, whole recognizing the awesome power of the Presidency and the Executive bureaucracy, also believe that the ultimate power in the United States resides with the people . . . with people like our members.

I will close with one question: if this Treaty is basically good for the United States, why does the Administration have to make such an effort to prove to Americans that it is in our national interest? Those of you in the Senate must know what the people are thinking. You know the Legion Posts and grass roots opinion runs about 80% against the giveaway.

We believe this proposed Treaty will ultimately be decided by the people. We believe this is one defeat the United States can avoid. It is a loss we need not accept and you can count on The American Legion Posts to stand firm.

PANAMA CANAL

Whereas, the United States is the rightful and legal owner of the U.S. Canal Zone and the Panama Canal, having acquired this U.S. property through court tested treaties and agreements and mutually agreed upon payments to Colombia, Panama and the individual land and property owners; and

Whereas, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that the United States is legally entitled to sovereignty and ownership of the U.S. Canal Zone for the purpose of building, operating, protecting and maintaining a canal across the Isthmus; and

Whereas, the United States has lived up to its obligation under the Treaty to the letter of the law; and

Whereas, the political, economic and the military factors offer conclusive evidence that it is in the vital national interest of the United States to retain sovereignty and ownership of the U.S. Canal Zone and Canal; and

Whereas, over three-fourths of our American citizens consistently voice their opposition to any kind of "giveaway" or dilution of U.S. sovereignty over this territory; and

Whereas, the United States as leader of the free world has a moral obligation to remain fair, firm and strong when faced with political blackmail; and

Whereas, surrender of the U.S. Canal Zone would be tantamount to a major military defeat with enormous consequences for evil; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the American Legion in National Convention assembled in Denver, Colorado, August 23, 24, 25, 1977, that we reiterate and reaffirm our continuing and uncompromising policy in opposition to any new Treaties or Executive Agreements with Panama, relating to the U.S. owned Panama Canal and its protective frame of the U.S. Canal Zone as expressed and set out in separate resolutions adopted consecutively at each annual American Legion National Convention since the Miami Convention in 1960; and, be it further

Resolved, that we strongly urge all elected members in the U.S. Congress to oppose any new treaty with the government of Panama which: (a) in any way dilutes full U.S. sovereignty, ownership and control; (b) cedes U.S. territory or property; (c) surrenders any jurisdiction and control which would threaten the economic and security interests of the United States; and, be it further

Resolved, that The American Legion rejects the actions of the Executive agencies of the federal government in attempting to by-pass the Constitution of the United States, and we fully support Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2, of the Constitution which provides that only the Congress has the authority to dispose of U.S. Territory.

STATEMENT OF AMVETS NATIONAL COMMANDER FRANK D. RUGGIERO

Mr. Chairman and Honorable Members of the Committee:

AMVETS is grateful for this opportunity to present the views of our organization on such a vital issue as the much publicized and highly controversial Panama Canal Treaties. It is our opinion that few matters in recent history have held the importance or portentousness of this fateful issue.

In concert with our great brother organizations, AMVETS speaks to this matter in the sense that we, the veterans of our Nation's wars, are of a right and necessity deeply concerned with the future of the U.S. defense posture in general and in the Western Hemisphere specifically. As do other concerned Americans, we address ourselves also to those issues which affect international and hemispheric commerce and embrace our national economy. Therefore, the issues involved here are directly germane to our concerns and activities, for what segment of our society has more right to oppose that which we believe threatens the United States' defense and economic position on the "American land mass."

The Administration and some Members of Congress have challenged the term "sovereignty" as that term pertains to the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903. They claim that the United States was never granted sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the legal sense. We do not argue that point. The dictionary definition of the term "sovereignty" is of little importance in this issue as we see it. The fact remains that any reduction in American military forces on the Isthmus of Panama and the loss of United States control over the Canal Zone could be disastrous. The U.S. defense posture, south of the Rio Grande would be virtually non-existent. The Canal, regardless of its inability at present, to accommodate the super-carriers and super-cargo vessels remains as the single most important water-way on the western half of the globe. The Isthmus itself, the Canal notwithstanding, serves as the roadway between all of the Americas and is, in our opinion, the "crossroads" of the hemisphere. This demands American presence and control to ensure that Communistic or otherwise adverse influences will not "choke off" North America from South America. The President's concern over "human rights" can best be served by maintaining our strong position in Panama and preventing the influence of Castro Cuba and other elements from establishing a toe-hold.

Furthermore, we are not convinced that the people of Panama, and we refer to the common people, not the pseudo-intellectuals, are desirous of having the United States pull out of the Canal Zone. Indeed, we have reason to believe that is the last thing they want to see happen. In this regard, we quote from an article which appeared in the Chicago Tribune of March 25th by Mr. Ronald Yates:

"Incredibly, and in spite of an almost daily diet of government inspired anti-American rhetoric in the Panamanian press, the poor and the unemployed of this Nation of 1.7 million say they are not ready to run Americans out of Panama but rather are prepared to fight to keep the Canal in United States hands." And Mr. Yates found this to be a typical remark of a Panamanian-on-the-street: "You see, the only people in Panama who have ever given the United States trouble are Communists, rich university students, and parasitic intellectuals who live off the blood and sweat of people like us," he continued. "We have nothing against America or the Canal Zone because we know as long as America has control of the Canal, there will be jobs for Panamanians. But as soon as you (America) give it back to Panama, it's going to go all to hell and nobody will have jobs."

We fully appreciate that the passage of seven decades would necessitate adjustments in monetary considerations commensurate with today's values. We do not oppose any reasonable arrangements in this connection. Our sole opposition is to any Treaty which would dilute or compromise U.S. control of the Canal Zone now, or in the future.

General Torrijos was reported to have said "in the event that peaceful negotiations for a phasing-out of United States control were closed, a campaign of violence against the 15,000 Americans in the Zone would be inevitable." "Two options would be open to me," he continued. "To smash it or to lead it—and I am not going to smash it." If we give in to this "threat," how could we guard against "sabotage" by subversive elements of Panamanian military forces? This prompts other questions:

1. If we (the United States) grant the desired concessions to Panama, what guarantee will we have that Panama will live up to its end of the bargain?

History should have taught us that treaties with dictator forms of government are not worth the paper they are written on. One has but to remember the "Munich Pact" between Nazi Germany and England, inter alia to realize the value of such agreements. We are informed that, notwithstanding the Torrijos' Government, every Government of Panama since the creation of the Republic in 1903 has expressed the desire for a new treaty. It occurs to us that to turn over the control of a facility such as the Canal, which requires great financial sustenance and technological expertise, to a nation whose governmental foundations are so weak as to allow dictators to take over, would be a great disservice to all nations whose commerce rely to a large degree on the Panama Canal.

2. If Communist influences prevail, such as those we suspect exist currently in the Caribbean area, how will we defend the Canal Zone should Panama succumb to these influences?

The interpretation by American proponents of the Treaties is that the United States will be entitled to intervene to protect the Canal and that United States warships will be entitled to expeditious or privileged passage through the Canal. This has been their strong argument in favor of the Treaties. Yet, on August 24th of this year, Panama's chief treaty negotiator, Dr. Bethancourt, stated at a press conference that "the pact does not establish that the United States has the right to intervene in Panama, nor does it provide the United States with the right to determine when (that) neutrality is violated."

The right to expeditious or preferential passage is also a matter of interpretation. According to Dr. Bethancourt, the Panamanian interpretation differs from the American dramatically when he said "if the gringos with their warships say 'I want to go first,' that is their problem. We cannot go that far." In view of these statements it would seem that closer examination is in order.

A strong stand must be made if we are ever to regain the "image" we once projected abroad. Some would say that by granting the Panamanian demands the United States would gain the respect of the "Third World nations." We think not. We believe that the opposite reaction would take place and that we would be looked upon as a "pushover." Respect is given to the strong, the assertive, the fair. Again, we do not oppose a fair financial arrangement, but not in the form of tribute.

We are asked if we were in the position to make the decision: "Would we be willing to go to war in order to retain United States control of the Canal Zone?" We ask, in turn: war with whom? Are we to believe that Panama by herself or all of the Latin American nations collectively would wage war against the United States over this or any other issue? Or, do we believe that the Third World and/or Communist nations, including Red China and the Soviet Union, would join forces in such an adventure? We believe the possibilities of such an occurrence are too remote to merit consideration.

It has been further suggested that should the Treaties not be ratified, the veterans' organizations and other anti-Treaty groups would share collectively the blame for whatever "reprisals" are taken against American personnel in the Canal Zone. That, in effect, "their blood would be on our hands."

It is, and would be, the responsibility and solemn obligation of the Commander-in-Chief of the U.S. Army, Navy and Air Force to take whatever measures necessary, including armed force, to ensure the defense of the Canal Zone and the safety of its inhabitants.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, we offer no alternatives to the current status of the United States on the Isthmus of Panama except in the area of more financial equity, and, indeed, recognize no need to enter into any further negotiations with the Republic of Panama which would attempt to eliminate or phase-out United States control of the Canal Zone.

Again, and finally, Mr. Chairman, we thank the Committee for this opportunity and will attempt to answer any questions the Members may wish to ask at this time or we will be happy to respond in writing, for the record.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. J. MILNOR ROBERTS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I wish to thank you for the opportunity to testify before your committee and in such distinguished company. The Reserve Officers Association is a professional association of officers of all the armed services, regular and reserve, but primarily consisting of citizens who dedicate extra time and effort to the national defense over a full time civilian career in your local communities. Twice in the last four years, these reservists have expressed their opposition to any arrangement which would result in diluted control, operation, and defense of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone. We believe that this particular treaty that is before you today is appeasement in phases which can only whet the appetites of those who would disrupt the peace and freedom of the nations of the Caribbean and Central and South America, as well as disrupt the defense of the United States.

We recognize that the Panamanians are less than happy with the 1903 Treaty. It is not hard to see why. The Panama Canal cuts through their country like an interstate highway through your home town. It is a highly visible barrier and while it is a major source of the Panamanian national income it is not like Arabian oil or a Chinese port. We built it and we paid for it three times. We paid off the French Company, the Panamians and the Colombians. It is ours in any real sense of the word, and the Panamanians have profited greatly from our management of the Canal.

The question is therefore one of giving it up or sharing it. The proponents of the treaty ask, why keep the Canal? And say that there is no good reason to keep it. We would rather ask, why should we give it up? And we say, there is no good reason to give it up.

We have been told, in essence, that the Canal is not vital to our economy or our national defense, and that we cannot defend the Canal against a presumed Panamanian Viet Cong. The evidence used to substantiate these allegations is presented in a manner which classically illustrates the old propaganda trick called "card stacking". Much of the evidence is misleading, flimsy, even irrelevant. For example, for what earthly reason would a submarine officer desire to submerge his submarine while in the Canal? All warships are vulnerable while in the Canal and always have been.

In a more serious vein, it is alleged that we have a two ocean navy and therefore we do not need the Canal. It is also pointed out that very few naval ships have used the Canal in recent years and several ships such as the super carriers and super tankers are too large to use the Canal.

In response to this seductive but spurious argument, we point out that we have had a "two ocean Navy" since the Canal was built, a Navy which is dependent on the Canal for wartime logistical support. Heavy bulk cargoes such as ammunition, fuel, food, and vehicles are used in prodigious amounts in a combat zone. Ninety-six percent of the tonnage that went to Vietnam went by ship, over seventy percent of which went through the Panama Canal. A peacetime force uses less than one-tenth of the wartime tonnage requirements, much of which is procured locally, hence the smaller number of ships.

We also point out that there have been serious discussions of making the Navy a "one-ocean Navy" because of the high cost of ships which also would be of smaller size.

The risks and costs of a 6,000-mile detour around South America in the event of the denial of the Canal to U.S. shipping would be devastating to overseas military combat operations, particularly in the Pacific. First, the increase in mileage would cut the amount of tonnage received in a combat zone by half or require a doubling of the size of the cargo fleet. Secondly, the detour itself would increase the vulnerability of the shipping lanes to submarines, commerce raiders, land based aircraft, and missile armed fast patrol boats. This in turn would require more naval assets to be spent on sea control missions in lieu of missions related to the strategic projection of national power.

The fact that many of the super tankers and super carriers cannot use the Canal is more a liability of the ship than of the Canal. We would also point out that a super tanker of 100,000 tons is both a lucrative and vulnerable target for military action.

In addition to the naval and shipping aspects of the Panama Canal, the Canal Zone also features the only major U.S. airbases for ready access to Central and South America. These facilities are significant not only for the defense of the canal, but for the defense needs of the Southern Hemisphere. We may have need for the Panama Zone air facilities that are related to problems in areas outside Panama. At the same time, we may lose the fields themselves or have restrictions on their use resulting from renegotiations of our military presence in the former Zone such as has happened in Italy, Libya, and Spain.

On the economic side, we find it hard to believe that the Canal is not vital to the national economy at the very time that Alaskan oil is being shipped to a fuel hungry Northeast. We should also note that as much as three quarters of the shipping of some of the Central and South American nations goes through the Canal.

We believe that there can be no doubt that the Canal is vital to both our national economy and particularly our national defense. The administration has used the Joint Chiefs of Staff to present evidence of the Canal's non-essentiality and indefensibility. What you hear from the Joint Chiefs is what the administration wants you to hear and should be viewed as evidence of the discipline and obedience of the Joint Chiefs to their civilian bosses.

The Joint Chiefs tell us that it will take 100,000 U.S. troops, the equivalent of an Army Corps with supporting Naval and Air Forces, to defend the Canal against a determined guerrilla threat. The annual operating costs of an Army combat division in a Vietnam style war is approximately one billion dollars; therefore the costs of defending the Canal, according to the JCS estimate, is approximately two or three billion dollars a year.

We must also examine the nature of the internal threat to the Canal. By internal we mean, from Panama by largely Panamanian forces. It must be conceded that many of the key ingredients of another Vietnam are there. The high school students form a vocal, articulate, and influential nucleus with widespread popular support. There are outside groups who would be more than happy to fund, train, and equip Panamanian guerrilla forces. There is a visible symbol of what some consider "colonialism," the Canal itself.

One major ingredient is missing, however. It clearly is not in the Panamanian national interest to destroy the Canal. Forty percent of the national income comes from the Canal. Destruction of the Canal would be an unparalleled disaster to the Panamanian economy outrivaling crop failure, drought, or a drop in the price of bananas.

A more likely threat to the Canal by Panamanians is a threat of selective interdiction or blockade of American shipping by a threat to the ships in the Canal. This threat can be accomplished by relatively conventional landbased forces using short range combat weapons including tanks, anti-tank systems, light artillery, and small arms. The size and shape of the Zone as a buffer around the Canal prevents this type of action short of actual invasion of the Zone itself.

Selective interdiction may also be accomplished by guerrilla forces equipped with anti-tank weapons and special demolitions. This military capability will exist regardless of who runs the Canal and must be regarded as a constant threat to guard against. We must take into consideration the fact that as long as Old Glory flies over the Canal in any capacity, there will be those in and out of Panama who will desire to use the threat of closing the Canal to achieve political leverage over the U.S.

It is against this latter threat that the friendliness of Panama is extremely important. On the other hand, placing Panamanian military forces in close proximity to the Canal interdiction by unfriendly Panamanian interest. World public opinion might cause us to hesitate to move against Panamanian troops blockading the Canal if those troops were there by treaty right.

The Canal Zone, as a military buffer area, is affected the most by the treaty. If the Zone is abolished, most of the military installations and Canal facilities under the control of the U.S. or the U.S. Canal Corporation until the year 2000 will be left in an exposed position. We note that the Canal Zone is unique in the sense that not only is it U.S. territory, an agency of the U.S. Government holds the title to the land. This is clearly illustrated by the fact that no one may own his own home in the Zone. All those who live in the Zone live in government owned housing and are either Panama Canal Company employees or U.S. military personnel and their dependents.

Much has been said about the Americans who live in the Zone, Proponents of the treaty say that these citizens have caused considerable unrest by their so-called colonial privileges of low cost stores, housing, etc. It is ironic to note that the status of those who live and work in the Zone will not change substantially in this regard as they will be covered in a Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) like American military and civilian government employees are in places all over the world.

We are also concerned over the financial arrangements of the treaty. We note that some $50-70 million will be paid to Panama from the proceeds from the Canal. This increase is allegedly to come from an increase to tolls of thirty cents a ton. With ships weighing many thousands of Canal tons, the increase in tolls is expected to be substantial. An upper limit on Canal tolls is placed in the fact that the tolls must be less than the cost of a trip around the Horn. Since the Canal runs at a $7 million deficit, we ask whether the American taxpayer is going to pay directly into the coffers of the Panama Canal Commission that replaces the Panama Canal Company? If such is to be the case, we have a case of a direct payment to Panama using the treasury of the Panama Canal Commission as a laundry or conduit.

We should also examine the inflationary impact of increased Canal tolls on our own economy, which needs no inflationary pressures, and those of our neighbors to the South who need inflation even less.

Absolute neutrality of the Canal, as envisioned by the Treaties, is not in the best interests of the United States nor of the nations of the Western Hemisphere. Economically, the Panama Canal's customers are substantially different from those of the Suez Canal, being fewer and mostly American, North and South. Three quarters of the traffic in the Canal is related to U.S. trade, representing 16.8% of U.S. waterborne commerce. While the tonnage may be less for Latin American trade, the percentages are higher; Panama Canal traffic as a percentage of national waterborne commerce is 76.8% for Nicaragua, 41.3% for Peru, 34.3% for Chile, and 32.5% for Colombia. Clearly, Western Hemisphere interests should dominate control of the Canal.

Traditionally, the U.S., through the Monroe Doctrine, has over-watched and protected the Western Hemisphere from outside influence; this treaty opens the door for substantial outside influence. In this light it should be remembered that the U.S. had the right to "restore order" to the Isthmus of Panama long before the Canal was a gleam in De Lessups eye.

The ambiguities of key concepts of this treaty, recently highlighted by Senator Dole, remind us of the old adage, "good fences make good neighbors." When territory is being divided between two nations for defense purposes, ownership of a few yards of ground may be of great significance and substantial argument, as was illustrated in the negotiations in the Korean War at Panmunjon and in Palestine in the late forties and early fifties. We may be creating a can of worms, not a concrete treaty of lasting value.

Given a real or implied Panamanian threat of violence to the present Canal, the question of a sea level canal or third lock in Panama is not relevant to argument favoring adoption of the treaty, as any new canal construction in Panama is subject to the same threat. On the other hand, a sea level canal on route 8 in Nicaragua and Costa Rica or on route 25 in Colombia might prove to be cheaper than defending the present canal or taking it back from unfriendly hands.

Finally, we recognize that the Panamanian people want a new arrangement. We can understand and sympathize with the desire of the Panamanian people to go from one part of their country to another without going through foreign customs or without harassment from our police. Unfortunately, we have not heard enough from the Panamanian people as to what are their specific complaints against us so that the American people and this Senate can judge the merits of the treaty, or devise one more amenable to both peoples.

In summary, we find no good reason to give up the Canal and its Zone, and the pro-treaty arguments are unsound, fallacious or frivolous. Finally, we wish to point out that this treaty appears to be a form of appeasement in phases to a conjured threat of a Panamanian Viet Cong; a threat which is more spectre than substance. We know, and the world knows, that appeasement, even the appearance of appeasement is too tempting a morsel to the hungry hounds of war. It is also particularly humiliating to the American public to appease anyone so soon after our misfortunes in Vietnam and Angola.

We caution the Senate to examine carefully the exact wording of this treaty and all the multiple annexes and side agreements and the nuances of the words used therein that describe our rights to keep the Canal open, accessible, efficient, and under our control.

STATEMENT OF COL. PHELPS JONES, U.S. ARMY, RETIRED

Mr. Chairman and Members of this Distinguished Committee: My name is Phelps Jones and I serve the more than 1.8 million members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States as their Director of National Security and Foreign Affairs.

I am pleased and honored to have been invited to appear before this distinguished body to share with you the position of the V.F.W. on the proposed treaties affecting the interoceanic canal and its framework, the U.S. Canal on the Isthmus of Panama. Our National Commander-in-Chief, Dr. John Wasylik, of Sandusky, Ohio, has asked me to convey to you his appreciation for this opportunity.

Last month, Dr. Wasylik presented the V.F.W. position to the Committee on International Relations of the U.S. House of Representatives. This September 16th statement covers, in detail, V.F.W. rationale for opposing both the assumptions undergirding the U.S. negotiating position and the treaties which emerged from the negotiations.

To avoid pointless repetition, I request that the Chairman include our National Commander's earlier statement as a part of the record of these proceedings.

This earlier statement includes the unanimously passed Resolution Number 402, the heart of which reads:

"Be It Resolved, by the 78th National Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, that:

"(a) U.S. operation, control and defense of the Canal are non-negotiable;

"(b) tensions relating to the administration of the Canal Zone be resolved on the spot without disturbing present treaty arrangements;

"(c) U.S. citizens and employees in the Canal Zone continue to meet their responsibilities under U.S. sovereignty;

"(d) the foregoing position be again communicated to both the President (who in October, 1976 asserted that he would 'never give up complete or practical control' of the Canal) and the Congress;

"(e) the Panama Canal Zone send to the Congress of the United States a delegate such as is done in Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands; and

"(f) the proposed treaty being put forward by the Carter Administration be defeated in the 95th Congress."

If anything, since this resolution was passed on August 23rd, both additional reflection and events have fortified our resolve.

The September 7th White House signing extravaganza was unmistakably designed to be a "media event" which would overwhelm any serious consideration of the proposed treaties on their merits—or lack thereof. In candor, my organization was affronted by this stagey event and the inherent premise that U.S. national interest on this issue could best be discerned and advanced by polling foreign nations.

The trumpeted U.S. right to act militarily to preserve the Canal's neutrality, under Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, has been directly disavowed by two Panamanians most directly involved: negotiators Carlos Lopez Guevara and Romulo Escobar Bethancourt. Mr. Bethancourt assured the rubber stamp Panamanian National Assembly on August 19th that, not only was U.S. military intervention not permitted under Article IV, but also the Canal could be closed by Panama if: (a) no profits accrued; (b) internal disorders erupted; or, (c) there was a landslide. A few days later, Mr. Bethancourt offered some observations on the "expeditious" passage reportedly assured U.S. warships:

"Expeditious passage does not mean privileged passage. As a matter of fact, the concept of privileged passage was rejected . . . if after examining the provision, the Gringos with their warships say, 'I want to go through first,' then that is their problem with the other ships waiting there. We cannot go that far."

Mr. Chairman, we have long heard that the proposed treaties are the product of thirteen years of painstaking negotiations fully supported by four Presidents. Yet today we witness American negotiators unable properly to explain with any conviction what it is that Panama agreed to in the very elastic language of Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty. As we well know, Panamanians, with alacrity and acerbity, repeatedly tell us what they did not agree to.

I find it impossible to believe that four Presidents, their Secretaries of State, and the current Joint Chiefs of Staff could now find solid reasons to support the tragic/comic opera bouffe being played out to ascertain what it is, in fact, that thirteen years of "painstaking" negotiations have really meant.

Certainly, Mr. Linowitz missed the mark badly when he informed this body on September 29th that "in no way does (the proposed treaty) limit our ability to act," and "U.S. warships can go to the head of the line even if other ships are waiting to get in." Mr. Linowitz convinced only Mr. Linowitz on these points. His Panamanian colleagues were clearly unmoved.

We have all noted that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been assigned a key role in "educating" the presumably backward American public on the proposed treaties.

As a retired career soldier whose service included duty on the Joint Staff and in the office of the Chairman, JCS, I have an abiding appreciation of our senior military people as officers of honor and perception. They are among the most convinced Constitutionalists in our country. I do not, and will not, question their sincerity and conviction on this matter. I do, however, point out that the aggressive use of the service chiefs by the Administration makes shabby use of the JCS in what is obviously an intense domestic debate with important political overtones.

Over the 30 years since 1947, when the JCS System was formally set up, my research shows me only three occasions—one per decade—when the JCS was invoked by various Administrations in an effort to pre-empt prolonged political consideration of a national policy issue: (a) in 1951 when General Bradley supported President Truman's desire not to expand the Korean War as called for by General MacArthur; (b) the 1963 support of the JCS for the limited test ban Treaty; and, (c) the current use.

One final point on this matter of the Administration and the JCS. If the Administration truly believes the Chiefs collectively represent an unassailable source of policy wisdom on the matter of the proposed treaties the question can be fairly put: why limit the public role of the JCS to the matter of the Treaties only? The decision on the B-1 Bomber, the proposed withdrawal from Korea and a host of other defense issues could have the "wraps" removed and the JCS urged to come forward and tell-it-like-it-is. My concern is that such transparent use of the senior military will, rightly or not, decrease their credibility on some future occasion when the Chiefs, on their own, feel compelled to stand up and be counted on some issue central to our survival.

Mr. Chairman, some concluding thoughts.

As this Committee was supremely unimpressed by the argument that five American Presidents sought an outcome in Vietnam different from that which happened, I urge you to apply the same level of skepticism to the current "four Presidents have favored" argument advanced by the Administration.

As to the possibility of violence absent treaty ratification, the recent burning of Ambassador Jordan's automobile in Panama suggests that some level of violence will arise from some quarter no matter what happens. The U.S.—most certainly to include the V.F.W.—is threatening no one. We are being threatened periodically by a Panamanian regime which alternately forecasts violence or states their abhorrence of the violence they have earlier forecast. A nice trick.

I have attempted to think through formulae short of uninterrupted U.S. sovereignty which would assure the President the "practical control" he stated a year ago he never would cede. It doesn't work. So-called U.S. "Pre-eminence" or "practical control" short of uninterrupted U.S. sovereignty, equals being on the Isthmus on

Panamanian sufferance which could be withdrawn over night. When we cede sovereignty, as the proposed Treaties would have us do, we are placed on a slippery slope without a solid case under the law should Panama, for whatever reason, elect to nationalize the Canal operation. There is no way to get from the cession of "sovereignty" to "practical control" As Hanson Baldwin has pointed out, to talk as if we can is "double-talk."

One aspect of this issue has escaped notice to this point.

This body is deeply aware of the high, and increasing, level of inter-dependence between and among the nations of the world. Often this undeniable fact of growing interdependence is cited as a compelling reason for a muted American response to some event outside our borders. What has, I believe, never been emphasized is that the responsible professional 63-year American custodianship of the Canal, for the benefit of the entire world maritime community, is a practical example of the inter-dependence among nations being understood, accepted, and efficiently served.

Finally, after words and perceived symbols fade, geography endures. Along with Gibraltar (British since 1713, not just since 1903), Suez, and the Straits of Malacca, the U.S. Canal and its protective framework, the Zone on the Isthmus of Panama, will be important to the commerce of many nations and vital to hemispheric and Free World safety for as far ahead as any of us can see.

It is the considered judgment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States that uninterrupted U.S. sovereignty over the Canal and the Canal Zone is in the supreme national interest and we urge the United States Senate, as an act of enlightened and unapologetic statesmanship, to return the proposed Treaties to the President with your advice, but without your consent.

I will try to answer such questions as you choose to ask.

Thank you.

STATEMENT OF DOCTOR JOHN WASYLIK

Mr. Chairman and Members of this Distinguished Committee: My name is Doctor John Wasylik, and my home is in Sandusky, Ohio. As National Commander-in-Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, I am pleased and honored to appear before this distinguished body to share with you our views on the proposed Treaties affecting the Inter-Oceanic Canal and its framework, the U.S. Canal Zone on the Isthmus of Panama.

I am accompanied here today by two of my V.F.W. colleagues, Mr. Cooper T. Holt, Executive Director of our Washington Office and Colonel Phelps Jones, USA (Ret.), my Director of National Security and Foreign Affairs.

As you may be aware, positions in the Veterans of Foreign Wars are arrived at democratically at our annual National Conventions.

Our 78th National Convention was held in Minneapolis, Minnesota during the period August 20-26, 1977. Fourteen thousand delegates, representing more than 10,000 V.F.W. Posts and 1.8 million members were joined by delegates representing more than 600,000 members of the V.F.W.'s Ladies Auxiliary.

Our delegates gave respectful attention to arguments supporting the proposed treaty advanced by the Chief of State, U.S. Army, General Bernard W. Rogers, USA, and arguments opposing the treaty as set forth by Senator Strom Thurmond (S.C.).

Following these two thoughtful presentations by two patriotic and dedicated Americans, on Tuesday, August 23d both the V.F.W. and the Ladies Auxiliary delegates were asked by the Chair for an expression of their views. Both groups of delegates voted unanimously to accept Resolution Number 402, 'U.S. Sovereignty Over the 'United States Canal' Located on the Isthmus of Panama.'

Following this display of solidarity, the Chair gavelled the Convention into order and repeatedly asked if there was anyone there present who desired to speak in favor of the Treaty and assured the delegates that anyone who so desired would be given a courteous and respectful hearing.

No one rose to oppose the unanimous views of the delegates. With the Chairman's permission, I would like to read the "Be It Resolved" portion of Resolution Number 402, with the request that the entire Resolution be included in the transcript of these hearings.

On the Canal Treaties issue, the heart of our mandate reads:

"Be It Resolved, by the 78th National Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, that:

"(a) U.S. operation, control and defense of the Canal are non-negotiable;

"(b) tensions relating to the administration of the Canal Zone be resolved on the spot without disturbing present treaty arrangements;

"(c) U.S. citizens and employees in the Canal Zone continue to meet their responsibilities under U.S. sovereignty;

"(d) the foregoing position be again communicated to both the President (who in October, 1976 asserted that he would 'never give up complete or practical control' of the Canal) and the Congress;

"(e) the Panama Canal Zone send to the Congress of the United States a delegate such as is done in Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands; and

"(f) the proposed treaty being put forward by the Carter Administration be defeated in the 95th Congress."

This is where we stand. Now why do we hold so resolutely to this view?

In the first instance we are totally unpersuaded both by the assumptions which led to the treaty negotiations and by the proposed treaties which emerged from these negotiations.

Since August, 1914, the United States Canal on the Isthmus of Panama has been responsibly operated and defended to the benefit of the United States, the International shipping community, Panama, Central America, and Latin America.

The "payaway treaty" clique has fallen back on (1) implied blackmail ("unless we give it to the Panamanians, they may blow it up"), (2) self-fulfilling prophecy (forecasts of Vietnam-like guerrilla warfare), and, (3) self-inflicted descriptions of "colonialism."

The current ploy of much of the "prestige media" on the Canal question is, feigning more disdain than anger, to dismiss all who have stood in steadfast opposition to the proposed "payaway" (an accurate term, "sell-out" would imply the Panamanians are seeking to buy our $7 billion Canal; they are not) as jingoistic non-readers of history who are carelessly calling for war.

Nothing could be farther from the truth.

Long before the Canal and the Canal Zone turned into a political issue, the V.F.W. sought to inform the American public of the true nature of the issues involved.

There follows arguments advanced by the "payaway apologists" and the relevant V.F.W. response.

"Payaway" apologists: How can anyone in 1977 argue for a policy of "colonialism?"

V.F.W. Response: Colonialism is, definitively, an exploitative arrangement where-in a natural resource; i.e., cotton, rice, tin, etc., is farmed, harvested, or mined by an oppressed people for processing, manufacturing, packaging and sale of the finished product abroad.

Panama "oppressed?" Clearly not! Panama (a) has the highest per capita income of any of the seven countries of Central America and stands 4th (of 20 nations) in all of Latin America; (b) is dependent on the Canal and the Zone for 30% of her foreign currency earnings while 13% of her gross national product arises from the same source.

Panamanian per capita wealth is about twice that of Colombia who, until 1903, was the country of which pre-1903 Panama was a province.

Panama "oppressed?" Tell that to Cambodia!

"Payaway" Apologists: What is needed is a modern arrangement to replace a treaty (Hay-Bunau-Varilla) now 74 years old.

V.F.W. Response: Modernity, like beauty, rests in the eye of the beholder. Britain has occupied the "Rock of Gibraltar" since the 1713 Treaty of Utrecht which ended the War of the Spanish Succession. (Sensible people are thankful the British have been on the "Rock" for the past 264 years.) Unlike the Canal, Gibraltar has not played any significant role in Spanish economic growth. Like the Panamanians, the Spanish are unhappy about the status quo. Unlike our State Department, the British Foreign Office has kept a lid on the situation (to the benefit of us all) for 264 years, not 74.

Perhaps we should ask the British Foreign Office to conduct a "crash course" on how to protect vital national interests for our State Department.

"Payaway" Apologists: But the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 gave the U.S. all rights, powers, and authority "as if it (the U.S.) were the sovereign of the territory." The words "as if" indicate that it is Panama, and not the United States, which holds either "titular" or "residual" sovereignty.

V.F.W. Response: Those who so happily produce the "as if" clause conveniently forget to add what follows in this "in perpetuity" treaty; i.e., "to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

The bulk of the scholarship on the sovereignty issue supports the V.F.W. view. A family of treaties (a) with "New Granada" in 1846; (b) with Britain in 1901; and, (c) with Colombia in 1922, all undergird and extend the sovereign pre-eminence of the U.S. as clearly recognized in the 1903 treaty with Panama; a treaty, incidentally, deliberately ratified after the signing by the Panamanian Senate.

"Payaway" Apologists: Secretary of State John Hay advised President Theodore Roosevelt that the 1903 Treaty was advantageous to the United States and disadvantageous to Panama.

V.F.W. Response: Is there some natural order that mandates that most or all of the treaties entered into by the U.S. must be disadvantageous to America; the Paris Accords of 1973 bringing "peace" to Southeast Asia comes readily to mind.

Hays view notwithstanding, as earlier indicated, the 1903 Treaty has been a success story for all concerned, most specifically including Panama.

"Payaway" Apologists: How would you like to see America divided in two by the Mississippi River as the Canal divides Panama?

V.F.W. Response: Unlike the example of the Mississippi, the construction of the Canal and the birth and continued existence of a Panama, independent from Colombia, are inextricably linked. So while the U.S. Canal and the U.S. Zone, given human nature, may never be objects of popular admiration in Panama, nonetheless, the clear linkage between the U.S. presence and their national existence is there and, we suspect, most Panamanians understand this unalterable fact of their nationhood.

"Payaway" Apologists: Who wants to fight another "Vietnam" over the Canal?

V.F.W. Response: No non-institutionalized person ever wants (a) any war, or, (b) most especially a Vietnamese-type encounter in which we will the battle, but not the victory.

The war-like language about the Canal and the Zone arises from occasional flights of oratory by General Torrijos ("We will walk the Ho Chi Minh Trail. It is long and exerts a heavy toll in blood."), from various Panamanian student groups, from supportive revolutionary rhetoric from Castro, and most disturbingly, by U.S. officials who, I would judge, believed that even an allusion to our defeat in Vietnam would suffice to unnerv the American people in their natural desire to retain our preeminence in the Canal. This latter tactics has backfired badly, and, if anything, has produced an opposite effect.

The real question is: apart from the 1964 student disorders, we've had 74 years of peace, stability and progress in the Canal. Can this record be sustained or improved upon by the transparent "partnership" with Panama being advocated by the State Department? Remember, once America is meeting her responsibility as a matter of Panamanian suffrage and not unequivocal U.S. rights, we can be asked to pull out overnight.

"Payaway" Apologists: But the Canal is especially vulnerable to sabotage.

V.F.W. Response: It always has been, but it has only been in the last three years that this long standing vulnerability has been pointed out to us, often by our own negotiators. Again, how would the pullout of the U.S. garrison enhance the security of the Canal from any group or faction seeking to make some irrational Third World "point" by blowing a lock or draining Gatun Lake?

If the Panamanian Government's reply is that they are unable to control their own citizens' actions in the face of a continued U.S. presence in the Canal, the question then looms: how reliable a "partner" would the Government of Panama be in any "partnership" with the United States in confronting any non-Panamanian; ie, Cuban pressure?

"Payaway Apologists: But the Canal and the Canal Zone are Panama's most important "natural resource."

V.F.W. Response: The Canal is not a "natural resource." It was built over a 10-year period by the Corps of Engineers. It is a quintessentially "artificial" or man-made enterprise. Secondly, the weight of history, law, and logic demonstrates that it is "ours" not "theirs."

"Payaway" Apologists: But whatever the merits of the clause might have been in the past, aren't we "painted into a corner" by the February, 1974 "Statement of Principles" agreed to by Secretary Kissinger and Foreign Minister Tack and the recent Treaty signing extravaganza?

V.F.W. Response: When you're "painted into a corner," you have two basic choices: (a) keep on painting; or, (b) use whatever turpentine is on hand to "unpaint" and get out.

In 1967, Panama rejected an initialed draft of a new treaty. Our State Department can well use this earlier Panamanian rebuff as a valid precedent for re-examining the validity of the 1974 "Statement of Principles" and the resultant proposed treaties.

"Payaway" Apologists: Have you ever seen the stark contrast between the "manicured" lawns of the U.S. Canal Zone and the poverty and squalor of Panama over the fence?

V.F.W. Response: Yes. A ridiculous bit of imagery insulting to both the Zonians and the Panamanians, who are placed in the nonsensical position of favoring litter and uncut grass.

The Canal Zone is not Grosse Pointe, Beverly Hills, Tuxedo Park or Chevy Chase. It is—and it should be—a typical American community adjusted for life in the tropics.

The best way to assure Americans in the Zone have a spokesman is to have the Canal Zone send a delegate to the U.S. Congress as does Guam, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia.

"Payaway" Apologists: But the U.S. pays an annual "rent" to Panama. Doesn't this mean that Panama owns the Canal?

V.F.W. Response: It is not "rent" for land or the Canal (we bought the property four times; from Panama, from the individual land owners, from the failed French enterprise and from Colombia). It is an annuity paid to Panama (as it was earlier to Colombia) for displacing the old trans-Isthmus railroad. Not even the U.S. government is so soft in the head that it pays "rent" on land that it owns four times over.

"Payaway" Apologists: What is the matter with the proposed Treaties' goals on this issue; i.e., "to assure that the Canal is operational, secure, efficient and open, on a nondiscriminatory basis to world shipping."

V.F.W. Response: The "goals" cited above are a precisely accurate description of the present arrangement. In short, why seek "goals" that have already been achieved?

"Payaway" Apologists: Do you mean break off negotiations and thereby incur the wrath of all of Latin America, bring an abuse of America in the UN, and incur, perhaps, the public opposition of even our NATO allies?

V.F.W. Response: If we retreat when we're clearly right, we will have surrendered, in advance, all our influence on other and more ambiguous international disagreements.

Three or four (of 20) Latin American countries, not, of course, including Panama, enjoy a significant degree of democratic freedoms. Democratic or authoritarian, many need the Canal operation even more than we do. I have neither seen nor heard of any hard intelligence that even suggests an international army drawn from Latin American states would either march on the Canal or seek to infiltrate the Zone in an international Vietnam-type operation. (Cuba, of course, having tasted a "revolutionary victory" in Angola is a separate matter.)

As for NATO, as the Arab-Israeli "Yom Kippur War of 1973" so clearly underscored, our allies do not have concerted policies apart from the defense of the NATO treaty area. I would expect a resolute U.S. stand on the Canal would gain the understanding and support of our major European friends.

As to the UN, we are in a classic "no win" posture with the General Assembly and its Third World plus communist majority. Former Ambassador "Pat" Moynihan's perception that many Third World countries in wanting to rip off the wealth of others are really calling for "duly sanctioned looting." His view has relevance here.

To sum up our total opposition to the proposed treaties:

If we wrongfully "cave in" on the sovereignty issue, we are on the Isthmus at the sufferance of the volatile dictatorship of Brigadier General Torrijos. We could be asked to leave overnight. Do we then skulk out or do we stand our ground?

The Canal is much closer to Cuba than is Angola. Soviet-inspired Cuban involvement on the Isthmus could well wear a "Panamanian Cloak." We would undoubtedly agonize, but we would probably acquiesce.

The proposed "Neutrality Treaty," which we are told, would permit U.S. military action to defend the Canal, is "waffling" brought to an art form. The Panamanians have agreed to no such thing in writing or in their rhetoric. The Administration may kid itself. It should not be allowed to kid the American people.

Panama's wretched record in "human rights," as attested to by the January 30, 1977 "Freedom House" study, needs no amplification here. The Administration seems unembarrassed by this manifest hypocrisy. Our President went so far as to embrace, literally, General Torrijos following the signing extravaganza.

I mean no disrespect to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but until the late 1975 they were silent upon the Treaty negotiations. I will not comment upon their recent shift in view, but the unfettered military advice of former Chief of Naval Operations calling for continued U.S. pre-eminence makes the compelling military case.

In reviewing the Panamanian Student riots of 1964, I note the following prominent Americans were then quoted as follows:

Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker: the assault on the Canal Zone had been led by "persons trained in communist countries for political action of the kind that took place" and that "the Government of Panama instead of attempting to restore order, was, through a controlled press, television, and radio, inciting the people to attack and to violence."

Former President (then Minority Leader) Gerald R. Ford: "With Cuba under the control of the Soviets through its puppet, Castro, and with increased Communist Subversion in Latin America, a Communist threat to the Panama Canal is clearly a grave danger. The American people will be shocked by the terms of this (Johnson Administration) treaty."

Joseph A. Califano, Jr. (Currently Secretary of HEW, then an Assistant to the Secretary of Defense): "We know that some of the leaders were known and identifiable Communists, members of the Communist Party of Panama, and people who belonged to the Vanguard of 'National Action,' which is openly and proudly the Castro Communist Party in Panama."

Now, I realize that 13 years have passed and that people often change their minds over time.

My question is: what hard evidence, available to all of us in 1977, caused these three distinguished Americans to change their minds over recent years about the nature of the Communist threat in Panama? We would all profit if they would share this new information with us.

In conclusion:

What the proposed Treaties embody is a slow motion act of strategic self-mutilation.

Only 13 of our warships cannot transit the Canal today. As Navy ships get smaller, even this small number will decrease.

The Canal and the Zone (a) save 8,000 miles and 15-30 days; (b) have the only ship repair facilities within 1,600 miles on the Atlantic side and 2,500 miles on the Pacific side; (c) have, in Howard Air Force Base, the only high performance air base within 1,000 miles; and, (d) is the only U.S. logistical base south of the Rio Grande.

As to the possibility of violence should the Treaties not be ratified, no one in America, especially including the V.F.W., is threatening anybody. We are being threatened by a Panamanian strong man who, seemingly on alternate days, either threatens violence or abhors it. And this is the man with whom we seek a "partnership?"

What, then, does the V.F.W. propose?

(a) A revised U.S. position which would immediately disabuse Panama of any major territorial, defense, control or operational aspirations; ie, America is not running the Canal on Panamanian sufferance.

(b) Generosity and imagination on real life human grievances (ranging from parking places to job opportunities) where a long term U.S. administration may have needlessly chafed Panamanian citizens; and

(c) A major modernization packet to ready the Canal for ships now too large for passage and other measures all of which would combine to give a major boost to Panama's diversifying, albeit debt-ridden, economy.

To conclude:

An opinion research poll indicated that Americans favor, by 76-16%, continued U.S. sovereignty over the Canal and the adjacent Zone.

Change is an imperative when a given status quo is unworkable.

Change does not equal progress when current arrangements not only do a job, but do it superbly.

The Panamanians want very badly to have their way and far too many in the State Department see it their way; ie, reciting "Panamanian Perceptions" ad nauseam.

Our people can, should and must be brought unapologetically to defend a 74-year record America and the world maritime community have unarguably benefited from.

Thank you.

RESOLUTION NO. 402: U.S. SOVEREIGNTY OVER THE "UNITED STATES CANAL" LOCATED ON THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA

Whereas, Article II of the 1903 Convention between Panama and the United States, modified in part by the 1936 Treaty between the two Governments, states:

ARTICLE II

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of a zone of land under water for construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of ten miles extending to the distance of five miles on each side of center line of the route of the Canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea three miles from mean low water mark extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of three marine miles from mean low water mark with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described shall not be included in this grant . . .

"The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra and Flamenco; and"

Whereas, the United States has more than fully met its obligations to Panama under existing treaty arrangements and, moreover, has efficiently and responsibly accommodated a large number of transits and amount of tonnage through the canal; and

Whereas, the United States has paid for the Canal and the Canal Zone four times (1) to Panama, (2) to the failed French Consortium, (3) to private citizens of Panama, and, finally, (4) to Colombia; and

Whereas, the revolutionary government of Panama, a product of coup d'etat, has since June 1971, under the guise of seeking new canal treaty arrangements, undertaken a bitter and sustained campaign and anti-American propaganda fueled in large part by Cuban and Soviet communists; and

Whereas, given the emotionally irrational situation in Panama, a political/psychological "timebomb" is being consciously fabricated by the revolutionary government of Panama, set to explode to the detriment of the United States and the world shipping community; and

Whereas, due largely to our unswerving V.F.W. support, patriots in the United States Senate, led by Senators Thurmond (S.C.), Helms (N.C.), and McClellan (Ark.), have gone on record in opposition to the unprincipled "Statement of Principles" signed by former Secretary of State Kissinger and the Panamanians, and a parallel effort is being similarly supported in the House of Representatives, led by Congressman Dan Flood (Pa); now, therefore

Be it resolved, by the 78th National Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, that:

- (a) U.S. operation, control and defense of the Canal are non-negotiable;
- (b) tensions relating to the administration of the Canal Zone be resolved on the spot without disturbing present treaty arrangements;
- (c) U.S. citizens and employees in the Canal Zone continue to meet their responsibilities under U.S. sovereignty;
- (d) the foregoing position be again communicated to both the President (who in October 1976 asserted that he would "never give up complete or practical control" of the Canal) and the Congress;
- (e) the Panama Canal Zone send to the Congress of the United States a delegate such as is done in Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands; and
- (f) the proposed treaty being put forward by the Carter Administration be defeated in the 95th Congress.

PANAMA CANAL POLL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the overwhelming opposition of the American people to the giveaway of the Panama Canal was amply proven in a recent poll on that subject by the weekly National Enquirer newspaper which claims 15 million in circulation throughout the United States.

Ninety-seven percent of those responding said "no" to the question "Should the United States turn control of the Panama Canal over to Panama?"

The Enquirer took no position on the question, but offered to its readers arguments on both sides of the issue by two distinguished Members of this body.

The newspaper pointed out that over 4,500 replies had been received in the poll to date with 4,376 against giving up control and 140 in favor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article in the October 18, 1977 issue of the Enquirer, published in Lantana, Fla., be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLL: 97 PERCENT SAY DON'T GIVE CONTROL OF CANAL TO PANAMA

An overwhelming majority of readers responding to an Enquirer poll say the United States should not turn over control of the Panama Canal to Panama.

First results of our poll, announced in the September 27 issue, show that of 4,516 ballots cast, 4,376 or 97 percent voted "no" on the question: "Should the United States turn control of the Panama Canal over to Panama?" Casting "yes" votes were a total of only 140 readers, or 3 percent.

As usual in our polls, The Enquirer took no sides on the question, but presented the pro and con views of leading spokesmen. Arguing against the Panama Canal Treaty, which is backed by President Carter and awaiting Senate ratification, U.S. Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), warned that giving up the Canal undermines U.S. security and well-being.

Opposing this view, U.S. Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska) said that the new treaty is not only fair, it also protects American interests.

Watch for further results of this poll in future issues.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, late Friday evening, President Carter and General Torrijos issued an unsigned joint statement of understanding on differing United States and Panamanian interpretations of the treaties.

After reading press reports over the weekend, it appears the so-called understanding is a very informal diplomatic document. It is not even a signed agreement as General Torrijos pointedly said on his return to Panama when he declared in a cavalier manner, "I haven't even signed an autograph."

On the issue of intervention, the statement, in part, provides—

... each of the two countries shall in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

In addition to this language, however, the joint statement provides—

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama.

The point is that the canal becomes internal to the affairs of Panama 6 months after ratification of the treaties. Sovereignty and control pass to Panama, and any action taken by the United States will be subject to the above proscription. I am unable to determine who defines intervention or what the definition of intervention would be.

The issue of expeditious passage also remains unclear. I am unable to discern who determines priority passage and what conditions constitute emergencies sufficient to bring about expedited treatment.

This vague two-party statement has clarified nothing, and any further drafting should be approached as treaty amendments, not general statements subject to varying interpretations. The new "understanding" is merely an interpretation of the treaties by the current leaders of the two countries affected and the fact such an interpretation was needed testifies to the ambiguities in the treaty itself. Only the treaties are permanent and only the treaty documents will serve as a basis for future decisions.

Today the United States does not base its rights in Panama on what leaders of that period said it meant, but rather upon the bare words of the 1903 treaty itself. This same application will apply in future years to the Panama Canal treaties we are being asked to ratify today.

Even if the statements were clear, which they are not; even if they were signed, which they are not; even if they were in the form of amendments, which they are not; they still leave unsettled the central objection to the treaties—relinquishing ownership and control of a vital commercial and defense asset to the unstable, left-wing dictatorship of General Torrijos.

Again, the question comes to mind—Who can best operate, defend, and keep the canal open for the rest of the world—the United States or the Torrijos regime?

Mr. President, in order to share a number of news items on this matter with my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of understanding as issued by the White House, the Foreign Information Service broadcast report, and an article carried by the Washington Post, be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF UNDERSTANDING

Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

The Neutrality Treaty provides that vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly.

PANAMA: TORRIJOS RETURNS, SAYS NOTHING SIGNED IN WASHINGTON

Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera arrived back home at 1700 today, when all the world's newspapers are reporting and commenting on his interview this morning with President Jimmy Carter. He returned in a special jet which landed at the Rio Hato Air Base. He was accompanied by Agricultural Development Minister Col. Ruben Dario Paredes, Presidency Minister Fernando Manfredo and Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chief of the Panamanian negotiating team. He was also accompanied by special guard Sergeant Jose de Jesus Martinez and his private secretary, Celia De Gaswell.

General Torrijos was received by the Rio Hato garrison chiefs and by the guards which are stationed at his farallon home. Our reporters filmed General Torrijos arrival and recorded his brief statements concerning his long and positive trip.

Torrijos said that he was tired from the trip and wanted to rest before making extensive statements. He said that he considered the tour very beneficial for Panama and that we could rest assured that everything negotiated and everything discussed was in his people's favor. He added that he understands that the people are very defensive concerning their sovereignty and that during his meeting with President Carter he had not signed even one autograph. Questioned about the comments which arose after his meeting with Carter, Torrijos repeated that he had signed nothing at all and had done nothing to change the new treaties signed on 7 September. He said that the small groups which are opposed to the treaties also have their rights, but that this is nothing to worry about, that on the contrary, this provides stimulation for positive accomplishments.

Torrijos' wife, children and other relatives arrived on a special flight in Rio Hato a few minutes after Torrijos arrived. Bidding farewell to our reporter Santa Maria Llamas, Torrijos said that he will soon hold a news conference.

GEN. OMAR TORRIJOS DENIES SIGNING NEW CANAL PACT

PANAMA CITY, October 15.—Gen. Omar Torrijos, fresh from a meeting with President Carter on the Panama Canal treaties, has denied reports here that he signed a pact giving the United States the right to military intervention in the canal.

"I haven't even signed an autograph," Torrijos said yesterday when his flight from Washington landed at the Rio Hato air force base, near his beach house. He said he was too tired to make further comments.

Torrijos said Carter had been very affable and that they had talked about the process of ratifying Panama Canal treaties by the U.S. Senate and the people of Panama.

[After Torrijos and Carter met Friday, the United States and Panama issued a joint communique clarifying Washington's treaty right to intervene to maintain neutrality of the canal even after it reverts to Panamanian control in the year 2000. Neither leader signed the communique.]

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 17

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, over the past weekend the news media covered extensively the visit to the White House made by Panamanian Dictator Omar Torrijos. The dictator apparently had been called in for a conference with the President to discuss the right of priority passage for the U.S. Navy and the right of the United States to intervene to guarantee canal neutrality—two of the many ambiguous provisions found throughout the proposed Panama Canal Treaty and the proposed Neutrality Treaty. Other matters, possibly involving the indictment of Moises Torrijos, the dictator's brother, may also have been under discussion; however, press accounts did not allude to that possibility.

In any event, at the conclusion of the conference, amid much fanfare and jubilation, yet another Panama Canal agreement was announced allegedly clearing up the two problems under discussion. At first, many thought that the agreement was at least a signed document. But we soon learned that the purported agreement was, in fact, an unsigned document wholly devoid of any binding legal effect.

But, Mr. President, even assuming that this document had been signed and even assuming that this document could, therefore, be treated as an executive agreement, or a reservation to treaty—I assume that is what it is going to be called if it is ever agreed to by our negotiators and sent up to be added to the treaty—does this document clear up ambiguities or does it simply create more? Clearly, Mr. President, we are in worse shape now than we were before the dictator's visit. For example, on the question of the right to intervene to guarantee the neutrality of the canal, the document reads:

The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal.

Now, that does not sound too bad, but look at this, Mr. President, that provision is followed by this language:

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

So, the dictator is seeking here to protect and preserve his dictatorship.

So, Mr. President, here we are back at square 1—more confused than ever. Does this language mean that the United States has the right to intervene within Panama to protect the canal against all aggressors, including Panama.

That is a possible aggressor. Panama, in entering into these treaties, does not guarantee that there will not be insurrection, sabotage, violence, demonstrations. So one of the aggressors may well be Panama.

Or does it mean that the United States may take action only outside Panama against third countries violating canal neutrality? Perhaps, on the other hand, it may mean that the United States can act within Panama to defend the canal's neutrality, but only against third nations. One guess is as good as another.

Mr. President, why can we not have a document which is clear and unambiguous on its face? Do they not have any lawyers down at the Department of State who are capable of drafting a simple contract?

That is what this really is: a high level contract between nations.

Mr. President, they need to hire some lawyers down there who know that a binding contract to be performed over a period of years ought at least to be a signed document.

We do not have that at this time.

These proposed treaties are at least signed, but they themselves are obviously of no value in understanding our rights, since all these extraneous documents keep having to be drafted by platoons of lawyers at the behest of ill-advised negotiators. Certainly, this latest document does nothing but add to the confusion.

Yet, Mr. President, here is former Ambassador Linowitz telling the press at the time the document was announced, and I quote from his remarks:

There has never been any misunderstanding between President Carter and General Torrijos as to the exact meaning of the treaties. The statement is intended to put to rest any misunderstanding as to what is intended under the treaties.

There must have been some ambiguity if they had to issue a statement to clear up the ambiguity.

It would be difficult to see how there was no misunderstanding and now find the issuance of a statement to clear up ambiguity.

You know, Mr. President, I am glad former Ambassador Linowitz thinks that President Carter and Dictator Torrijos have had no misunderstanding over the exact meaning of the treaties because that at least guarantees that two people on the face of the Earth can read these treaties and make some sense out of them. But what about the rest of us? What about future Presidents? What about future dictators—or, hopefully, what about future elected Panamanian presidents—which they do not have now, of course? What are they going to have to go on? If ratified, these treaties could stay in effect for many years and would be the best and only evidence of what was actually agreed. But it is indeed comforting, Mr. President, to know that at least the President and the dictator, according to former Ambassador Linowitz anyway, do mutually understand the exact meaning of these quite baffling provisions. Many of us do wish they would let us in on the secret.

So, Mr. President, former Ambassador Linowitz says there is a meeting of minds; let us hear what Dictator Torrijos had to say no sooner than he left the room where this so-called agreement was promulgated. Dictator Torrijos summarized the meaning of this new document this way:

If a great power attacks the canal or puts the canal in danger, it is the right of the United States to go and defend the canal. But it does not have the right to intervene or interfere in the internal affairs of Panama.

So, Mr. President, already the Panamanians have got their own version of the meaning of the so-called agreement, and I am sure the Department of State will soon too have its own interpretation.

I might say Mr. Torrijos boasted when he got back to Panama that he had not signed a document, he had not even signed an autograph when he was in Washington, conferring with the President; so he is boasting of the fact that he has not signed anything.

Looking at the language of the document, I must say that Dictator Torrijos may well be correct in his assessment of this unsigned paper. As I read the document, it seems to be saying that the United States can take action away from Panama to defend the regime of neutrality which would be established under the neutrality treaty. But, of course, that right would be close to useless if the United States did not also have the right to defend in place the canal itself. In other words, if Panama—if Panama decided the canal would no longer be neutral because of an alliance formed with another nation, presumably with Cuba or with the Soviet Union, or if Panama decided that it would be convenient to impose discriminatory tolls, or if Panama decided to make difficult the passage of ships of particular nations, Dictator Torrijos or his dictator successor would be in a position to assert that, all neutrality aside, the United States had no right—no right whatsoever—to intervene within Panama or to interfere with the internal policies and affairs of Panama. Here we are, Mr. President, back at square one.

What have we actually gained, Mr. President, by this latest diplomatic triumph—and I might add, Mr. President, I do not believe the country can take too many more diplomatic coups in our dealing with Panama. What have we gained? True, we all read the headlines boldly proclaiming that the President and the dictator had agreed on canal defense rights, but once again, as the truth leaks out, we learn that the document is not even signed, that the document itself is ambiguous, that the document creates problems, Mr. President, and does not solve problems.

This latter point is particularly clear when a thorough examination is given to the language purporting to clarify the rights of American warships to rapid transit of the Isthmus. This language reads as follows:

In case of need or emergency, warships may go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly.

What this unsigned document does not say, however, is who gets to decide what is a case of need or what is a case of emergency. Panama might have one idea about what constitutes an emergency situation and we might have another idea.

Why not say it, Mr. President, in simple terms? I suggest the following, which may well be offered as an amendment to the treaty when it comes up here, in the Senate:

United States warships have the right of priority passage at any time and may at all times proceed ahead of waiting merchantmen.

No, Mr. President, I guess that is too simple so we have elected instead in this unsigned, meaningless, nonbinding, and confusing document to foment still further potential disagreement by apparently leaving to the Panamanians the right to determine what emergency or which case of need is sufficient to justify priority passage by American war vessels. I think I shall change this word that I have suggested, "waiting merchantmen" to say merely "waiting vessels" rather than merchantmen; that U.S. warships have the right of priority passage at any time and may at all times proceed ahead of waiting vessels.

But listen, Mr. President, what former Ambassador Linowitz is reported to have said on this subject:

We are hoping it will lay to rest the questions that have been raised so that we can go forward with the approval of the treaties. I don't think, personally, that any further action will be required.

Former Ambassador Linowitz does not seem to be paying too much attention to what is going on over here on the Senate floor, Mr. President, because if he did, he would know that this unsigned, ambiguous document clarifies nothing and does nothing whatsoever to address the many, many other serious—indeed, fatal—defects found throughout the proposed treaties.

I would suggest, Mr. President, that the Department of State pay closer attention to what is being said over here in the Senate because sooner or later, the Department of State has to face up to the simple fact that these treaties are so poorly drafted throughout that the Senate could not properly consent to their ratification. Even proponents of a canal giveaway recognize that fact. Even proponents recognize that both treaties must be rewritten in their entirety.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the Senate should undertake this onerous task. The Senate should, by amendment, rewrite these disastrous proposals now under study in the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senate should, acting as the Committee of the Whole, sit down to the hard work of undoing the damage and unraveling the mystery of why the Department of State was incapable of reaching an agreement with the Panamanian negotiators which could, at a minimum, protect the vital national security interests of our country.

Unsigned documents clarifying nothing, understandings of no binding legal effect, reservations of rights not agreed to by the other party, are not going to be sufficient. Fanfare and hoopla in the press is not going to be sufficient. The only course of action is extensive and thorough page-by-page, paragraph-by-paragraph, sentence-by-sentence, word-by-word consideration and amendment of each and every provision of both treaties. Both treaties, Mr. President. This process will be long and tedious, very long and very tedious, but if these treaties are not soon withdrawn, it is a duty, Mr. President, we must soon undertake inasmuch as others have not. We must unfortunately also go ahead with the painful process of resolving all of the questions surrounding the peculiar manner in which the treaties were negotiated.

Mr. President, I feel that, as time goes on, we shall see other statements to clear up other ambiguities. I feel that, in the final analysis, we are going to have to amend these treaties here, on the floor of the Senate, and send this amended treaty back to the negotiators to serve as a guideline for further negotiation.

Mr. President, I appreciate the Chair's lenience. I know I have consumed all my time. I yield the floor.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as indicated on several occasions in the past, I am opposed to the ratification of the proposed Panama Canal treaties and this position is in line with the views that have been expressed by the people of Virginia in correspondence and telephone calls to our office. In fact, roughly 96 percent of the people contacting the office are opposed to ratification. Yet, evidence continues to accumulate that the President intends to utilize the full force of his office as Chief Executive to change the views of individual Senators and to change the opinions of the American people. To my mind this will prove to be a difficult task and I would like to cite as an example a copy of a letter received from a Virginia constituent. Let me read the letter omitting the name and address of the writer and also omitting identifying portions of a telegram enclosed with the letter. The letter reads as follows:

OCTOBER 12, 1977.

HON. WILLIAM LLOYD SCOTT,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SCOTT: As a registered and active voter of Virginia I am writing to ask that you vote against ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties. I must also request that you not use my name in this matter as I have been told indirectly to support these treaties by General David C. Jones, Air Force Chief of Staff.

I am enclosing a copy of a message that General Jones sent to all commanders. Paragraph 5 makes it quite clear that we as military personnel are expected to support these treaties.

Although I can not speak out publicly against the Panama Canal Treaties, I will not speak out in support of them either. Because of my position in the military, I would appreciate it if you and your staff not reveal how you received the enclosed message.

Sincerely,

The unclassified telegram has a number of identifying features indicating the wide distribution it received within the specific command to which it was referred. These features removed, it reads as follows:

For Commanders from General Jones.
Subject: Panama Canal Treaties

1. On 10 Aug. 1977 Panamanian and U.S. negotiators announced agreement in principle on a conceptual framework for two new treaties. One, the neutrality treaty, provides for the permanent neutrality of the canal; the second, the Panama Canal Treaty, deals with the operation and defense of the canal. Both treaties would enter into effect after ratification and document exchange processes are complete. The neutrality treaty will be of indefinite duration, whereas the Panama Canal Treaty will terminate in all aspects on 31 December 1999.

2. The Panama Canal is a major defense asset, the use of which enhances United States capability for timely reinforcement of United States forces. Its strategic military advantage lies in the economy and flexibility it provides to accelerate the shift of military forces and logistic support by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and to overseas area. United States military interests in the Panama Canal are in its use, not its ownership. The proposed treaties would assure that access to and security of the Panama Canal are protected in time of war and peace.

3. As President Carter has stated, "We will have operating control and the right to protect and defend the Panama Canal with our own military forces until the end of this century. Under a separate neutrality treaty we will have the right to assure the maintenance of the permanent neutrality of the canal as we may deem necessary."

4. The Air Force actively participated in the development of all defense related aspects of the proposed treaties, and fully supports them. They would provide a basis for development of a continuing friendly relationship between the United States and Panama which would be of significant importance in insuring that the Panama Canal would be available to the United States when needed. Once the U.S. no longer operates the canal, the proposed neutrality treaty would provide an adequate basis for safeguarding our interests in the canal.

5. It is important that our personnel, particularly our senior people, understand our support for the proposed treaties.

Now, Mr. President, if the Air Force Chief of Staff, Gen. David C. Jones, has sent telegrams to all of his commanders and the President has indicated he intends to educate the American people in the Panama Canal Treaty so that they will insist that it be ratified by the Senate, is it not reasonable to assume that this telegram from the Air Force Chief of Staff is a part of the educational process and that the Chiefs of Staff of our other military services, as well as the heads of our civilian departments and agencies are also utilizing the vast apparatus of the Federal Government to influence public opinion so that it will parallel that of our Chief Executive.

I have been led to believe over the years that ours is a representative form of Government, where elected officials, whether they be Members of the U.S. Senate or President of the United States, act on behalf of the people who elect them to office and that the ultimate will or sovereignty resides in the people of the country collectively not in the Members of the U.S. Senate or in the President of the United States.

Frankly, I hope the President will have a change of heart and come to recognize that we do have popular sovereignty in this country and that he too is subject to the sovereign will of the people. They have made it very plain in their communications, both orally and in writing to their elected representatives, that they do not want this treaty ratified. A change on his part would indicate that the President himself is growing in wisdom and stature and that he too is capable of being educated.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 18

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on several occasions I have brought to the attention of the Senate the various devices and schemes proposed by our negotiators to deliver cash to the Panamanian dictator without the necessity of including those means and methods in the terms of the treaties and without the necessity of seeking, through the constitutional process, appropriations for such purposes in the form of legislation originating in the House of Representatives. In short, Mr. President, I have already previously and frequently expressed my own sense of outrage at the many and varied methods employed to circumvent the Constitution both with respect to appropriations and with respect to the right of the Senate to advise and consent to treaties without action by the House of Representatives providing for the disposition of the property of the United States, that is, the Canal Zone and the Panama Canal. But unfortunately, there is more to discover.

We have seen how soft loan agreements are proposed to be used to funnel sums to the Panamanian dictator; we have seen how the successor corporation to the Panama Canal Company would be pillaged by mandated payments to Panama; we have seen how commerce will be burdened by increased tolls levied to provide for loan repayment to the large international banks; we have seen how the present Panama Canal Company would be stripped of its most profitable assets, such as the Panama Canal Railroad and the Panama Canal refueling facilities, in order to provide ready cash direct to General Torrijos; we even have seen how U.S. taxpayers would be asked to pay $10 million per year to Panama for the privilege of being subjected to the oppression of the so-called legal system of the dictator—and certainly that is the height of irony, Mr. President, that upon our delivery up to Panama of U.S. territory and property, we would thereafter pay Panama to oppress our own 37,000 U.S. citizens now living in the Canal Zone.

Mr. President, we have seen all these things, and we have accepted the opinion of Nicolas Ardito Barletta, Panamanian Minister of Economic Planning, that the projected cash flow over the 23-year term of the Canal Treaty will be $2.262 billion in 1977 dollars. All this, Mr. President, without a single appropriation and in large measure without even Senate advice or consent.

You know, Mr. President, the principal check on the power of the executive branch, a check heretofore carefully and jealously guarded by the Congress, is the power to appropriate or, more properly, the power to refuse to appropriate from the Treasury.

I see the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church), the second-ranking majority member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He has been a strong advocate through the years of the Congress using the power to control the purse strings of the Nation to influence foreign policy. Unquestionably, the war in Vietnam was brought to a close because Congress refused to appropriate further the carrying on of that war. So we have power, which has been carefully and jealously guarded by the Congress, to appropriate, or, more appropriately, in this case, we should have the power to refuse to appropriate, from the Treasury.

The deliberate circumvention of Congress in forking over these vast sums to a reprehensible dictator is beyond the pale, cannot on any grounds be supported, and would certainly itself alone be grounds for defeat of any elected official who permitted the people of the United States to be plundered by the unthinking for the benefit of the unjust.

Mr. President, in our prior discussions of these rip-offs, we may have overlooked by accident an item amounting to some $319 million which our negotiators propose to, in effect, extract from American workers and American taxpayers. To be sure, in the grandiose schemes conceived down there at the Department of State, $319 million must look like a drop in the bucket. But frankly, Mr. President, it galls me that our negotiators must have figured we here in the Senate would not even notice this particular strategy.

Mr. President, the Panama Canal Company is a corporate entity run as a business and subject to the Corporation Control Act of 1950. At present, the unrecovered investment of the Company is $319 million. That is what the Canal Company owes the U.S. Treasury as the balance of the cost for building the canal.

This unrecovered investment is, in effect, a debt owed to the U.S. Treasury. Since the opening of the Panama Canal, this debt has produced over the years some $642,080,000 in interest payments from the Canal Company into the U.S. Treasury. Additionally, Mr. President, $40 million of the principal sum initially owed to the Treasury has also over the years been repaid. These payments of principal have occurred as follows: $10 million in 1955; $5 million in 1956; $10 million in 1960; $10 million in 1968; and $5 million in 1969. Annual interest payments have also been quite substantial, and in 1976, Mr. President, the Panama Canal Company paid to the Treasury $16,600,000 in interest on the present outstanding unpaid principal of $319 million.

So, Mr. President, the operator of the canal owes the U.S. Treasury $319 million. What we are doing under the treaties, is giving Panama this canal on which $319 million is still owed free from any indebtedness whatsoever, giving them free and clear title, not requiring the $319 million to be paid.

This is a business, Mr. President, a business which has a liability, a business which has over the years reduced its debt and has paid interest into the Treasury for the benefit of U.S. taxpayers.

Certainly, if Panama should take over the canal under these treaties, why should they not be required to pay off the mortgage, so to speak? If a person has a house on which there is a mortgage and that person gives the house to someone, would it not be proper for them to pay off the existing mortgage on the house rather than to make a gift of the house free and clear?

That is what we are being called upon to do. The Canal Company, the operator of the canal, owes the U.S. Treasury, owes the American people, $319 million. But as we give the canal to them under the treaties, we do not require this $319 million to be paid.

The operation of the Panama Canal is a profitable business. They are able to keep up their interest payments; they are able to make their principal payments. If we give the canal to them, why not give it to them subject to this indebtedness so that the U.S. Treasury could at least get back a portion of the cost of the canal?

Do not give it to them free and clear; give it to them subject to existing mortgage, shall we say.

But let us look, Mr. President, at what our negotiators have worked out with the Panamanians. Bear in mind, Mr. President, that our negotiators are proposing to give away the Panama Canal Zone, the Panama Canal, all the plant and facilities belonging to the Panama Canal Company—our negotiators are planning to more or less give away the whole operation lock, stock and barrel. Yet, Mr. President, as part of this process and in addition to the $2.262 billion in 1977 dollars already slated for delivery to the dictator, our negotiators have worked out a way to stick the American taxpayer with this $319 million debt. Our negotiators propose to set up an entirely new operating entity in Panama to carry out the present business being conducted by the Panama Canal Company. This new operating entity would be called the Panama Canal Commission. It is just a change of words, but they can start off owing no money and canceling this $319 million debt for this new company.

It would more or less spring to life upon implementation of these treaties, somewhat as Athena sprang from the head of Zeus. With no prior history and as a corporate entity unto itself, this new proposed Panama Canal Commission would get nearly all the assets of the Panama Canal but none of the liabilities.

If a person sells a business to somebody, it is sold subject to its indebtedness, or take account of the indebtedness into consideration on the price to be paid. But no price is to be paid here. It is going to be a free gift with the cancelation of the mortgage, in effect, which is now on the canal.

Of course, Mr. President, some of the assets of the Panama Canal Company would be ripped off right at the beginning and given directly to the Dictator, but the great bulk of the assets of the Panama Canal Company would be transferred to this new Panama Canal Commission; the $319 million debt, however, would remain a liability of the defunct Panama Canal Company.

It would not have any income or any assets, but they would owe the money. This debt would not be transferred to the operating company, the Panama Canal Commission.

Mr. President, there is no ambiguity about these provisions. They are very clear as to what is going to happen. This is certainly the case of a needed amendment to the treaties to at least provide that this new commission which is going to take over will assume this indebtedness of $319 million to the people of the United States.

So, really, the Panama Canal Company owes this money and it should be paid. It should be paid out of the revenue. They are making enough money to continue paying the interest and, gradually, to reduce the principal. That is not being required, though, in the treaty. I think that is certainly one basis for an amendment that I hope the Senate will adopt.

So they get the canal, Mr. President, they get the business, but they do not get the debt. The United States taxpayer—you know who he is, Mr. President. He is the man that always foots the bill; he is the man out there working on a dock trying to earn a living for his family; he is the man in a cornfield in Iowa working in the hot sun; he is the man in a steel mill in Youngstown, Ohio, sweating to produce steel so that other workers can assemble automobiles. And, Mr. President, he is the man that, every time the Department of State gets its fingers in the pie, has to pay. So the taxpayer is going to have to pay this $300 million and it is not going to come out of the revenues of the canal. They go to this new commission, which, in effect, is saying that they go to Panama.

And whom does he have to pay, Mr. President? In this case, he has to pay a repressive, petty gangster dictator. In this case, he has to pay an elitist gangster government which makes no effort on behalf of its own destitute people but which is perpetually preoccupied with the pursuit of individual personal profit by whatever means, apparently even illegal means resulting in the death and suffering of our own citizens in this country.

But I am digressing, Mr. President, from my purpose, because even though I find disgusting the suggestion that our Nation ought to give this gangster regime one of our most valuable national assets while, at the same time, paying to it billions in U.S. funds, my real purpose in speaking this morning is simply to raise the impropriety—as a matter of simple business ethics—my purpose is simply to raise the clear impropriety of delivering all of the assets of one company to another new company and thereafter saddling the stockholders of the old company with all the debts, all the liabilities, and none of the benefits.

But I do not suppose that fact ever occurred to anyone down there at the Department of State. I do not suppose they have given any thought as to what business the Panama Canal Company could go into to cover its $319 million debt to U.S. taxpayers. With no assets and no business to operate, it is going to be pretty rough to come up with that kind of money. It is going to take a real miracle worker just to come up with the annual interest of $16 million from a company with no income and no assets.

Obviously, Mr. President, the Panama Canal Company would be bankrupt if these treaties are ratified, and the owners of the Panama Canal Company, the people of the United States, would again be left holding the bag.

What did our negotiators obtain for this $319 million concession? What benefits are likely to accrue from saddling U.S. taxpayers with this unpaid liability? Frankly, Mr. President, I can find nothing whatsoever anywhere in the treaties to justify the assumption of this debt or of the payment to Panama of the other tremendous sums proposed to be paid. We have gained no concessions whatsoever from the Panamanians. We have gained no rights which we did not already possess under the existing treaty structure. Our negotiators have given in on every issue and our negotiators have even proposed that we assume the debts of the potentially profitable business we are presenting to Panama.

These treaties lack mutuality of contract; these treaties are unsupported by consideration; these treaties are, as they have been identified from the outset, a simple giveaway. One almost questions the necessity for having a treaty at all if these are the sort of proposals being advanced by the Department of State. It is all give and absolutely no take.

There is one final footnote to this particular deception which I have made the subject of my speech this morning. Inasmuch as the new Panama Canal Commission would be free from debt and would possess perhaps the most valuable commercial asset in the world, the Panama Canal, would we not very soon see demands made by our Panamanian partners that the newly acquired assets of the Panama Canal Commission be pledged as collateral for loans from the U.S. Treasury or from the always-accommodating international commercial banks, using international bond sales or other devices designed to raise capital to feed the appetite for profit of the Panamanian dictatorship and international banks.

Mr. President, in my judgment based on my study of Panama's record in the international capital market, we would expect to see dictator Torrijos knocking on the door of the large banks almost immediately, if he has not already pledged the revenues of our Canal to secure new loans to cover the massive debt owed by his bankrupt regime. In this process, Mr. President, we can expect neither the bankruptcy of dictator Torrijos nor the bankruptcy of the international banks, but we could expect further demands on the U.S. Treasury to cover the spendthrift activities of both.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the administration is currently engaging in a vigorous campaign to sell the proposed Panama Canal treaties because of threats of what might happen in Panama if the treaties are defeated. Treaty proponents are constantly pointing out that there will be violence, terrorism, sabotage, and maybe even another Vietnam if the treaties are not ratified.

I would like to call attention to an article in the Wall Street Journal by Roger Fontaine entitled, "Scare Talk and the Canal," dated August 22, 1977.

Mr. Fontaine accurately forecasts in this article the tactics the administration would use in selling the treaties. He does an excellent job of rebutting the "scare talk" reasons for giving up the canal.

In addition, I would like to point out an article in the October 20, 1977, edition of the Chicago Tribune entitled "Why Public Rejects the Canal Pact," by Louis Harris. This article indicates that according to the latest Harris survey, the vast majority of Americans in every section of the country are opposed to Senate ratification of these treaties.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these articles be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Aug. 22, 1977]

SCARE TALK AND THE CANAL

(By Roger W. Fontaine)

Negotiators for the Carter administration have reached an "agreement in principle" with Panama on the "basic elements" of a new treaty on the Panama Canal.

Although the exact language has not yet been fully drafted, the main features call for transfer of the canal and the 533-square mile Canal Zone to Panamanian control in 23 years. The military presence of the U.S. would end by the year 2000, after which we would continue to have the unilateral right to insure an open and neutral canal. This latter provision clearly implies the right to military intervention, although the Carter administration does not like to use that term. A major controversy will undoubtedly flare up over this point.

But what is interesting about the proposed treaty is not its novelty but its utter familiarity to those who have had the patience to follow the negotiations over the last few years. The supporting arguments are also familiar, and they will now be echoed by most of our foreign policy establishment, including Gerald Ford and Henry Kissinger. Yet these arguments are still open to serious criticism, not, as our pro-treaty pamphleteers would have it, the criticism of the uninformed, the jingoistic and the merely nostalgic.

Three scare arguments are especially prominent, and need especially to be reviewed. First, that the canal is vulnerable to sabotage. Second, that a full-blown guerrilla war might break out in Panama. And last, that in such an event the United States would be condemned by all of Latin America, if not by the entire Third World.

The Carter administration, facing a suspicious Senate and public opinion, will probably rely on these arguments in its campaign for ratification. Suggesting that the U.S. is being subjected to extortion by tiny Panama is accurate enough, but the truly important part of the equation is that we Americans are engaging in acts of self-extortion. We are frightening ourselves with disaster scenarios which although superficially plausible have never been thoroughly dissected.

FEAR OF SABOTAGE

First, the fear of sabotage. Although the canal is and always has been vulnerable, wrecking it is obviously to no one's advantage, and least of all to that of the Panamanians. Since North American capital would be required to restore operations, Panama would remain as dependent as ever on the United States. Furthermore, a treaty which delays full control until the year 2000 seems unlikely to stay the hand of the young and impatient saboteur.

Second, guerrilla warfare. The specter of another Vietnam is an effective weapon, no doubt, in persuading a war-weary American public to surrender its rights on the isthmus. But the extent of the problem remains to be analyzed properly.

The potential does exist for small urban terrorist squads, recruited from Panama's large student population, to make lightning raids into the zone. They might stage robberies, kidnappings and assaults on police or civilian functionaries in the zone as well as in Panama itself. U.S. military and police units would find it tempting to chase these raiders back into Panamanian territory, thus provoking nationalist outcries.

Yet a truly serious insurgency is unlikely. Panama is not Vietnam in size or resources, nor does it have a nearby neighbor willing to aid the "liberation struggle." Furthermore, the Panamanian chief, General Omar Torrijos Herrera, is unlikely to provide the training and logistical support necessary to transform urban terror squads into full-fledged rural insurgents. Declaring war, even sub rosa war, on a superpower is still a dicey business.

Moreover, Gen. Torrijos may well find it more in his interest to stamp out, than to encourage insurgents. The regime remains extraordinarily dependent on foreign investment, foreign banks and, yes, foreign tourists—none of whom would enjoy working and playing in Belfast-style surroundings.

Finally, Gen. Torrijos is even less likely to enlist outside material support, even from such friends as Fidel Castro and Muammar Khadafy. The risks are too great and these gentlemen have too many other preoccupations. The Cuban leader, moreover, knows very well that Latin American guerrillas have an extraordinary rate of failure. Their only hope would be to wear down U.S. public opinion through a sustained campaign of terror, not a wholly irrational hope, but far from the worst case scenario of the treaty's supporters.

The third major pro-treaty argument is the fear of alienating world opinion, a familiar scenario which arises whenever there is a question of using force to insure American interests. Ambassador Sol Linowitz, one of the treaty negotiators, has even stated that the new treaty will "prove" us magnanimous to a skeptical (third) world. Yet if this world is not convinced of U.S. benevolence after our rebuilding of post-war Europe and our billions of foreign aid dollars to scores of underdeveloped countries, one more act of charity will not convince it. This treaty might just as well reinforce the notion that America is acting, not from generosity but from weakness.

To criticize this argument is to question the notion that what others may think must control our policy. No serious man should be concerned with critical opinion of Panama emanating from Conakry or Kampala, or much less Moscow.

Yet Latin America is a somewhat different case since, with the exception of Cuba, none of its countries are our sworn enemies. The depth of our ties with this region is matched only by those with Western Europe. Yet even though no Latin American regime publicly supports the United States, the depth of pro-Panamanian feeling varies considerably from country to country. It is strongest in Venezuela, Colombia and possibly Mexico; it is weakest in the southern cone of South America. For example, Brazilians, heavy users of the canal, have privately expressed deep misgivings over Panamanian control.

ONLY FIVE NATIONS

Despite Gen. Torrijos's numerous meetings with regional leaders, the last one held in Bogota early this month, he has managed to get the collective support of only five other nations.

Moreover, a surrender of the canal is not likely to gain us lasting respect or affection. And why should it when the obvious way to deal with us is to make more demands in an unfriendly a fashion as possible?

Beyond these arguments, our reluctance to hang on the canal reflects a sense of uneasiness, of guilt at maintaining what is so glibly described as a "colonial enclave." Our presence simply can't be squared with the radical anticolonial (to wit, antiwestern) sentiment that is now the common intellectual coin of the globe.

Yet it must be pointed out that Panama has benefited mightily from a resource that it alone could not exploit. It is a fact of life that the canal is a major international waterway that simply cannot be operated, much less defended, by one of the smallest countries in Christendom. That it would strike many as arrogant to state these facts is a mark of the extent to which we have absorbed the doctrine of international egalitarianism. National duty is not easily transferred nor fundamental geopolitical facts altered by political bombast.

The United States must retain the major role in running and defending the canal. It is still open to question how precisely to define that role, as well as the nature and extent of Panama's contribution. What should not be open to debate is the right of this country and the other users to an open and secure passageway between the planet's two principal oceans.

In spite of the attempts to secure ratification through scare arguments, this treaty does not fit these requirements.

HARRIS SURVEY: WHY PUBLIC REJECTS THE CANAL PACT

(By Louis Harris)

By 51 to 26 per cent, Americans are opposed to the United States Senate approving the treaty with Panama that President Carter and the Panamanian government recently signed. The treaty is rejected by a wide margin in every section of the country: by 49 to 31 per cent in the East, by 54 to 25 per cent in the Midwest, by 52 to 22 per cent in the South, and by 49 to 31 per cent in the West. However, among college-educated people, opposition to the treaty is a much narrower 45 to 39 per cent.

According to the latest Harris Survey of 1,536 adults nationwide, here are some of the reasons people give for opposing the treaty:

A 65-to-22 per cent majority feels that "the U.S. was given ownership of the Panama Canal in return for our building it there originally, so it is perfectly proper for us to keep owning it."

A 65-to-17 per cent majority believes "it is wrong for the U.S. to give up the Panama Canal under the threat of guerrilla warfare against our troops there."

By 64 to 11 per cent, people also think that "the present ruler of Panama threw out the elected government, and it is possible that a new dictator will take over there and say he will not agree to the treaty after we have agreed to give up control."

By 53 to 29 per cent, a majority feels that "if the U.S. gives in to pressure to give up the Panama Canal, Castro and the Communists will take it as a sign that we can be pushed around in other parts of Latin America."

By 67 to 17 per cent, a sizable majority believes "it adds insult to injury by making the U.S. pay $50 million a year until the year 2000 in addition to them giving up control of the canal."

In addition, several of the key arguments put forth by the Carter administration in behalf of the treaty are also rejected by the public:

By 61 to 24 per cent, a majority disagrees with the contention that "it is wrong for the U.S. to own the Panama Canal, which goes right through the middle of another independent country, Panama."

By 52 to 24 per cent, a majority also disagrees that "times have changed, and throughout Latin America, continued U.S. control of the Panama Canal is pointed to as an example of this country wanting to have unfair control over smaller countries in this hemisphere."

By 53 to 26 per cent, a majority objects to the idea that "the Panama Canal is not as important as it once was, since big supertankers and aircraft carriers can't go through it, so it is a mistake to make such a fight over our keeping control of it."

There are two general arguments favoring the treaty that meet with public approval:

By 62 to 15 per cent, people are reassured that "the U.S. will still have complete access in the future for its ships to go through the Panama Canal."

By 52 to 28 per cent, a majority also feels that "by agreeing to give back control of the canal to Panama, we are sending a message to the rest of the world that we can be fair and generous to much smaller nations."

Ironically, despite their general disapproval, Americans do not find the chief provisions of the treaty objectionable:

A 60-to-64 per cent majority supports the idea that "the U.S. will maintain control of the Panama Canal until the year 2000."

A 61-to-21 per cent majority favors "the U.S. having military troops stationed in the Panama Canal Zone until the year 2000."

A 63-to-17 per cent majority approves the provision that "Panama guarantees that, after the year 2000, the Panama Canal will be kept 'neutral,' open to every country, including the U.S. to use for its ships."

By a 55 to 24 per cent, a majority approves the provision that "the U.S. will be allowed to defend the Panama Canal after the year 2000 to be sure that all nations can send their ships through it."

By 51 to 28 per cent, a majority favors the clause providing that "the Panamanians will be trained to run the canal and given increasing responsibility for running it from now to the year 2000."

By 61 to 18 per cent, a majority also approves the provision that "Americans who live and work in the Canal Zone will continue to enjoy full American rights, and if they break Panamanian law, they will serve sentences in American prisons."

However, one key provision of the treaty meets with definite disagreement:

By 64 to 17 per cent, a majority disagrees with the provision that "each year until the year 2000, the U.S. will pay the government of Panama $50 million for the right to control the Panama Canal."

All of this lays bare the pressure points of the Panama Canal Treaty controversy. But we have here a case where the overall feeling of the American people is more important than the sum of the parts. Most Americans oppose the treaty for a simple reason: They remain unconvinced that it is really necessary for this country to give up control of the canal.

PANAMA CANAL NEWS COVERAGE IN WASHINGTON POST

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, It is disappointing to me that the largest circulation newspaper in our Nation's Capital, the Washington Post, has apparently allowed its editorial support of the Panama Canal Treaty to influence its news coverage on this important issue.

As the Foreign Relations Committee conducted its hearings on the canal treaty each day, I have noticed that comments by proponents of the treaty always received greater play than the views of opponents. The Post has appeared to consistently follow a biased and uneven policy in its news coverage of the treaty hearings.

This slanted coverage came to a head last Friday, October 14, when testimony by former Secretaries of State Dean Rusk and Henry Kissinger in favor of the treaty was headlined without one single word that other important witnesses even appeared that day in opposition.

On that same day, October 14, leaders of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Veterans of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, and the Reserve Officers Association all testified against the treaty.

Further, Maj. Gen. Milnor Roberts, director of the ROA, revealed in those hearings, that 309 retired generals and admirals had notified him of their opposition to the treaty.

Consistent with their one-sided coverage of this issue the Post totally ignored this impressive list of treaty opponents which included Gen. Lyman Lemnitzer, Adm. John McCain, Brig. Gen. John Eisenhower, and other respected military leaders.

Mr. President, a newspaper has an obligation to inform its readers about both sides of an issue irrespective of its editorial policy. The Post is wrong when it ignores arguments on the other side of this issue, and I believe the Congress and the people of this area are too smart to be misinformed or misled by such tactics.

In closing, I ask unanimous consent that the ROA news release titled "309 Generals, Admirals Against Panama Canal Treaties, ROA Survey Shows," a story the Post totally ignored, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

309 GENERALS, ADMIRALS AGAINST PANAMA CANAL TREATIES, ROA SURVEY SHOWS

WASHINGTON, D.C., October 18.—Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer, former NATO Commander; Adm. John C. McCain, the former Commander in Chief, Pacific; Gen. Charles L. Boite, former Vice Chief of Staff, U.S. Army; Maj. Gen. Earnest L. "Mike" Massad, former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense; Maj. Gen. Kenneth O. Sanborn, former Commander, U.S. Air Forces—South, Panama; and Brig. Gen. John S. D. Eisenhower, USAR, son of the late President Eisenhower, are among the 309 flag rank officers who have gone on record opposed to Panama Canal Treaties signed by President Carter on September 7. Only 7 expressed their support.

Included are generals and admirals of all the services—regular, Reserve and National Guard—who voiced their opposition through the Reserve Officers Association of the United States (ROA), chartered by Congress to advise on matters of national defense.

Their position—free of political constraint—was cited Oct. 14 by Maj. Gen. J. Milnor Roberts, ROA Executive Director, in testimony before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

"We had asked our members who are not 'muzzled' to speak up so that our fellow citizens are not misled into the conviction that all military leaders think the treaties are the best thing since landing on the moon," General Roberts said. "Regardless of their personal opinions, what you hear from the current Chiefs of Staff is what the Administration wants you to hear. They could not possibly object publicly with their civilian bosses, including President Carter who signed the treaties," Gen. Roberts said. "In supporting the treaty, the joint chiefs have differed from the great majority of their military colleagues who are free to express their opinion."

Among other military leaders in opposition to the Panama Canal treaties were: Lt. Gen. Robert W. Colglazier, Jr., AUS (Ret.), former Deputy Chief of Staff—Logistics.

Lt. Gen. Stanley "Swede" Larsen, USA (Ret.), former Deputy Commander-in-Chief, Chief of Staff, U.S. Army—Pacific.

Vice Adm. J. F. Bolger, USN (Ret.), former Deputy Chief of Naval Personnel.

Maj. Gen. Glenn C. Ames, AUS (Ret.), nationally recognized leader, also, in the National Guard Association, Association of the United States Army, and former Adjutant General of California.

Maj. Gen. Homer I. "Pete" Lewis, USAFR, former Chief of Air Force Reserve. And even a Carter, Maj. Gen. Leslie D. Carter, USA (Ret.), of Midlothian, Va.

SENATOR HANSEN ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague from Wyoming, Senator Hansen, has presented an excellent statement on the Panama Canal treaties to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I have read Senator Hansen's statement, and find it a convincing argument against treaty ratification.

He has eloquently put the current treaty debate in its proper perspective by stating:

These treaties are the wrong treaties, at the wrong time, for all the wrong reasons.

Mr. President, as one who has been an opponent of treaty ratification, I urge all my colleagues to study the statement our distinguished colleague has presented to the Foreign Relations Committee. Cliff Hansen is a man of keen intellect, whose views are respected by all of us in the Senate. His analysis will be most beneficial to all Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, in order to share this excellent statement with my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HANSEN

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Committee: I greatly appreciate this opportunity to express my views before this Committee on the Panama Canal Treaties. My position over the last ten years is a matter of public record. I have always maintained I would oppose any treaty under which the U.S. relinquishes total control of the Canal Zone, its defense positions and the rights to operate the Canal. I have not altered my position.

Some weeks ago I told President Carter I would withhold judgment until I had the opportunity to study and to familiarize myself with the terms of both the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. But I have now concluded such a study and made a decision. I remain opposed to both treaties as they are presently drawn.

THE WRONG TREATY FOR THE WRONG REASONS

The fact that a new treaty has finally been negotiated comes as little surprise. Talks have been going on sporadically for many years under several administrations. I will not suggest that these talks should not have occurred, in light of several years of political turmoil and economic hardships within Panama. I will not say a new treaty is not entirely necessary. I will not deny that a reevaluation of the situation may have been advisable in the interests of cooperation between the two countries.

The question of sovereign rights has been debated extensively. Therefore, I will not address myself to that issue. I believe there are far more important aspects of these Treaties upon which to base my opposition.

What concerns me are the conditions under which the United States has negotiated these treaties. We have reacted to threats of violence from the leftists within Panama, and we have been led to believe our withdrawal from the Canal Zone is being favored by the Latin American community as a whole. The new treaties have been held up to us as a chance to set an example for the world in demonstrating our sincerity with regard to the sovereign rights of individual governments. Our presence in Panama has been pictured as the last example of colonialism in the Western Hemisphere. We are expected time after time to feel guilty for our presence there. We have been told it is time to make amends for our past errors. I do not buy that. It is dishonest to play on the conscience of the American people and to thus ignore the fundamental questions involved.

This is not the issue. Charles Maechling stated in a recent editorial that "Treatment of the Panama Canal as a Latin American political symbol rather than as a global strategic and economic asset has distorted important treaty issues." The Panama Canal Zone is far too important an issue to be held up as a testing ground; a kind of acid test. As a result of this approach, we have negotiated from a position of weakness; we have remained on the defensive throughout the recent months as talks progressed, and I believe we have capitulated on every major issue to the demands of the Panamanian Government. These treaties are the wrong treaties, at the wrong time, for all the wrong reasons.

UNRESOLVED QUESTIONS

I am concerned about the role the media has played in this drama. Time and again human rights issue involving the personal and political freedom of the Panamanian people have been ignored or minimized by the media in an effort to avoid setbacks in the treaty negotiations. There have been charges and countercharges, but all have received scant attention and no comment from the State Department. The charges may all be unsubstantiated. But that has not yet been thoroughly resolved.

There have been as well, allegations involving the bugging of Panamanian quarters. Though the charges seem to have been dealt with, I wonder if they have completely resolved. I am concerned that the Attorney General sought to intervene when the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Separation of Powers subpoenaed those records which may have clarified the situation. While I realize there may be some question of committee jurisdiction involved, I would hope the Senate Intelligence Committee has been completely satisfied in its investigation of the matter. It would be unfortunate if the incident did in fact have any influence on the negotiations, one way or another.

I am concerned about the way the Administration chose to publicize the signing of the treaties.

The U.S. Constitution guarantees to the Senate equal participation in the adoption of treaties with foreign nations. This is an essential element in assuring that the American people have an input in the contracts made with other nations. Far from presenting a treaty to the United States Senate on which we would advise and consent, President Carter has attempted to present the Senate with a "fait accompli."

I have since been very pleased with the extent to which this Committee has gone in receiving testimony of all those interested in this vital issue.

Ratification remains the sole prerogative of the United States Senate.

There is some serious question as to whether the House of Representatives will in fact have an opportunity to exercise its Constitutional right to decide on the disposition of U.S. property within the Canal Zone. The Attorney General has taken it upon himself to assert that House approval is not needed. I cannot agree. I would hope the Administration does not insist on maintaining that position.

Members of the Armed Services, both active duty and retired status, are very divided over the Canal issue. Heavy support for the treaties is coming from senior officers currently serving, while those senior officers no longer serving are opposed to the terms of both treaties. I have long been one of the most ardent supporters of our defense establishment and have always believed in the exceptionally high caliber and integrity of our commanding officers. However, I cannot completely ignore that unfortunate situation recently when a commanding officer was immediately and publicly relieved of his duty when he expressed his doubts concerning the wisdom of one aspect of the Administration's foreign policy. While we must rely on members of our armed forces on matters involving our national defense I believe it is important that in light of recent events we keep in mind conflicting pressures under which such officers function.

Testimony from within the Administration has also differed with regard to the defensibility of the canal. The State Department has contended that the Canal is indefensible, as if that were some kind of logical argument to give up a fight before it begins. In advocating this position, the State Department has carried its propaganda to the American people in a most regrettable manner.

While the State Department has espoused the indefensibility of the Panama Canal, the Defense Department has confirmed what our common sense had already told us, that the Canal is indeed defensible. Obviously, it has occurred to the Administration recently that if we are entering into a treaty which gives us the right to defend the canal, it cannot be maintained that the canal is indefensible. Whether or not the canal is defensible is a matter which the State Department and the Defense Department ought to settle between themselves before the debate goes much further.

All the reasons put forth in support of the treaties have not convinced me. Representative Robert Dornan of California, in responding to those testifying in favor of ratification, said, "If a rejection of this treaty comes, it will not be an ungenerous act but a statement that we (the United States) have very little to apologize for. So far you've only given us two reasons for this treaty; that the Latin American people will love us more if we do it and to prevent the bloodshed of thousands of Panamanians if we don't do it." He is correct in his assessment of the arguments being used in favor of these treaties. They are weak, indeed.

ALTERNATIVES

It is extremely unfortunate the Administration is determined by means of this treaty to relinquish all practical control and rights of defense in the Panama Canal Zone.

Despite a widely publicized show of support, there are also serious reservations among the Latin American countries with regard to the terms of the treaties. At the gathering of the Organization of American States in Granada this year, that organization voted 19-0 for a resolution stating that canal tolls should reflect only the actual operating costs of the waterway. Panama did not vote and the United States abstained. I do not believe all of Latin America wants the United States out of the Canal Zone and again, I cite the State Department for perpetuating this false impression as a means to gain support for its policies. The countries of Latin America have as much to lose as the United States should the tolls be raised or access to the Canal limited.

The entire negotiation process was based on the threat of violence and deteriorating relations with the Latin American community, resulting in a treaty full of ambiguities and under which U.S. rights are not adequately protected.

Therefore, I have cosponsored six amendments and two reservations which Senator Dole has had the foresight to introduce. These reservations, and the amendments especially, would correct what I regard as the most serious weakness in the treaties.

The first amendment I have cosponsored with Senator Dole would reinstate the right of the United States to negotiate with any other State for the right to construct an interoceanic canal through that State. Any treaty which provides for less will be inadequate.

Article XII of the Panama Canal Treaty contains a provision which would allow the United States to build a second canal, if we should ever wish to do so, only in the country of Panama. At the same time, the treaty contains no commitment on the part of Panama to agree to permit us to construct that canal, should we decide to do so. Yet we are prevented from constructing one elsewhere. This provision is totally unacceptable. Why we would agree to build a second canal only in the country which has demanded possession of our first canal, is totally incomprehensible. I cannot believe our negotiators accepted such a provision, knowing full well the implications.

Article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty deals with what has aptly been described as "ransom" or "conscience money." Currently, Panama receives a $2.3 million annual annuity. Under the terms of this treaty, the annual annuity would increase to between $70 and $80 million. A clause in this Article also binds our Government to negotiate an economic loan package amounting to almost $345 million.

The second Dole amendment which I have cosponsored reduces Panama's share of the canal's annual operating revenues from 30 cents per net ton to 15 cents per net ton for each vessel transiting the canal. It would further eliminate the biennial adjustment of this rate according to changes in the U.S. wholesale price index. Finally, the amendment would eliminate that provision which would supply Panama with up to $10 million per year depending upon revenues. The amendment also provides that during any period in which the canal is inoperable, the fixed annuity shall cease, regardless of why the canal is closed.

Article XI of the Panama Canal Treaty provides for the 'orderly transition' of jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. The Administration is emphasizing a 23-year period in which this will occur. In actual fact, as soon as the treaty enters into force, the Republic of Panama shall gain full jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. A complete transfer of U.S. judicial, administrative and regulatory authority will be accomplished within 30 months.

In my opinion, this does not constitute an orderly transition. I believe there are very few American citizens who will remain in the Canal Zone, knowing they will be under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama. Large numbers may return to the United States, leaving a void in the manpower support of the operations of the Canal.

The third amendment which I cosponsored would allow the Panama Canal consultative committee to study the situation after the treaty takes effect and make a recommendation as to when the period of transition should actually end. However, January 1, 1990, will be the earliest time at which that would take place. Any treaty which subjects our U.S. citizens to Panamanian law and civil and criminal justice within 30 months after the treaty enters into force is totally impractical. Transfer of the administration of the Panama Canal Commission from United States to Panamanian leadership takes place on January 1, 1990, and it is only logical the two dates be coordinated.

I have cosponsored a fourth amendment to add a new Article XV to the Panama Canal Treaty which stresses the importance of maintaining and properly observing internationally recognized human rights, including civil and political rights in the Canal Zone. As I noted earlier, there remains a great deal of unresolved questions involving charges of civil and political human rights violations. The Administration and the State Department cannot operate under a double standard on the human rights issues, in the name of expediency when it comes to concluding a treaty with the government of Panama.

Article IV of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, I believe, is the weakest article of the treaty. There is nothing in Article IV which assures that the United States can unilaterally intervene in the defense of the canal whenever necessary, regardless of how the Administration has sought to explain the section. And, as has been so recently illustrated, the Panamanians have explained this article to their people in opposite terms. Panamanian negotiator Escobar Bethancourt stated in August, "The neutrality pact does not provide that the United States will say when that neutrality is violated." As has been already noted, Panamanian interpretation is at least 50 per cent of the definition. Reinforcing the misunderstanding, Senator Dole recently released a cable in which Lopez Guevara, one of the Panamanian treaty negotiators, stated "Intervention is simply forbidden by international law. Panama cannot agree to the right of the United States to intervene." If this is in fact the definition, the treaty is unacceptable. I would hope the Administration settles the matter as expeditiously as possible.

The fifth amendment which I have cosponsored with Senator Dole adds a provision specifically guaranteeing U.S. authority to intervene militarily on behalf of the canal when we determine its neutrality to be threatened, whether from the outside, or the inside, which could very well be the case.

Article VI of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal includes a provision which grants the United States "expeditious" passage through the canal in times of crisis. This provision alone is an admission which negates that argument espoused by proponents of the Treaty who would deny the strategic importance of the Canal during a time of crisis. However, the word "expeditious" is inadequate and open to subjective interpretation, as it has already been, by the Panamanian government. In August, Escobar Bethancourt said in a public broadcast to the people of Panama, "Expeditious passage does not mean privileged passage. As a matter of fact, the concept of privileged passage was rejected." Lopez Guevara reiterated those sentiments in the cable released recently saying expeditious passage does not mean the United States ships may "go to the head of the line." If this is in fact the case, we have been grossly misled by the Administration.

I have cosponsored a sixth amendment which would specifically stipulate that during a period of crisis, American war vessels and auxiliary vessels will be entitled to privileged passage through the canal. Without this amendment, the treaty is unacceptable.

In addition to these six amendments which I have cosponsored with Senator Dole which would improve upon the treaties considerably, I have cosponsored with him, two reservations to the resolutions of ratification.

The first reservation would require that Panama demonstrate, during the duration of the treaty, significant progress toward observing the internationally recognized human rights of its citizens.

The second reservation would reaffirm the Constitutional responsibility of the House of Representatives to participate in transfer of ownership of the Canal Zone territory. As I stated above, I am disappointed in the Attorney General's statement that House consideration of the treaties is not necessary, and I applaud the efforts of those Congressmen who filed suit recently in U.S. District Court seeking a reaffirmation of their Constitutional right.

In addition, I wholeheartedly support those Senators and State law officers who filed suit this week asking the United States Supreme Court to uphold the exclusive right of Congress to dispose of federal property under Article IV of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I commend Senator Dole for having taken the initiative on these important issues, and I am pleased to be a cosponsor of these amendments.

In my opinion, this entire matter of negotiating the treaties has been mishandled from the start. I would hope the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in its usual thoroughness and attention to detail, will refrain from reporting out these treaties before all the remaining questions are answered.

SENATOR THURMOND'S LEADERSHIP IN THE PANAMA CANAL ISSUE

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the newly proposed treaties with Panama have stirred up a considerable amount of discussion here in the Senate. I am pleased that so many Senators are finally taking a keen interest in this subject. Debate is long overdue.

For many years, our distinguished colleague from South Carolina (Mr. Thurmond) has endeavored to direct the Senate's attention to the crisis that our State Department was creating in Panama. It was Senator Thurmond, for instance, who, in anticipation of these treaties, took the lead in 1975 by introducing Senate Resolution 97, with 38 cosponsors. This legislation, which the State Department chose to ignore, put the State Department on notice that there was widespread opposition in the Senate, and among the American people, to the surrender of the Panama Canal. Many of the difficulties that we now face in Panama could have been avoided, in my judgment, had the State Department heeded the advice of Senator Thurmond.

It was also Senator Thurmond who, in 1974, offered S. 2330, a bill to modernize the operations of the Panama Canal. This creative legislation is based on the unassailable assumption that modernization would not only benefit the Panamanians and all nations which rely on this important waterway, but is, indeed, the best solution to our problems in Panama from an engineering, navigational, political, and military standpoint.

Major modernization of the existing canal, as Senator Thurmond has explained, can and should be done under the existing treaty of 1903. Developed within the Panama Canal organization after World War II, the Terminal Lake-third locks plan would provide a third lane of larger locks for larger vessels, the physical removal of the bottleneck locks at Pedro Miguel, the consolidation of all Pacific locks south of Miraflores, and the creation of a Pacific terminal lake to correspond with the eminently superior layout of the Atlantic end at Gatun. This work would enable uninterrupted summit level navigation from the Atlantic locks to the Pacific locks, and greatly simplify marine operations. Approximately $171 million has already been spent on this project.

In addition to aiding normal commercial shipping and enabling the transit of larger ships and tankers, the completion of the Terminal Lake-third locks plan would also benefit both the United States and Panama with increased employment. It is the least expensive and the most practical alternative to the proposed surrender of the canal and the construction of a new sea-level canal. What is more, it is highly doubtful that this modernization will ever take place if the canal is transferred to the Panamanians.

Reiterating the need for completion of the Terminal Lake-third locks project, Senator Thurmond recently delivered an important address on the Panama Canal Treaties before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce International Policy Committee in Washington, D.C.

Mr. President, I would like to share this address with my colleagues, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR STROM THURMOND

It is a distinct honor to be here this morning to present to the Chamber my reasons for opposing the treaties with Panama. I am pleased you recognize the need to participate in this national debate, as oftentimes lack of participation by a group of your stature is misread as a position of acquiescence.

My interest in the Panama Canal is long-standing. Over the years I have introduced several bills to modernize the Panama Canal. In the 94th Congress, I offered a resolution signed by 38 other Senators opposing the surrender of this waterway to Panama. Last August, I visited the Canal Zone for briefings and study to ascertain any changes since my previous visit several years before.

While I recognize the need for some adjustments with Panama concerning the Panama Canal, I see the retention of U.S. control as basic to the protection of our interest.

My 1976 resolution was more than sufficient warning to both the Ford and Carter Administrations relative to the Senate's concern in this matter. The treaties have been signed with great fanfare in an atmosphere of threats and violence by Panama. Panamanian chief negotiator Escobar Bethancourt went so far as to say "... This country (Panama) will take a course of violence" if the treaties are not ratified.

At no time in my memory have such threats and pressure been exerted on the Senate as is the case with these treaties. In making our decision, however, we must rationally decide what is in the best interest of our Nation, irrespective of the pressures and threats directed toward us.

Recently, treaty proponents have made a number of arguments to attempt to justify ratification. I would like to comment on some of these points:

USE VS. CONTROL

The central argument made, as enunciated by Defense Secretary Harold Brown, is that "use of the Canal is more important than ownership."

My position is that only through ownership can we be assured of control over this vital waterway. Once ratification takes place, sovereignty is surrendered. At that time the rights of Panama in Canal affairs will become dominant, as ownership by them means eventual control, which in turn governs use. I do not feel a small nation of 1.7 million people, with a history of 59 government changes since 1903, has the stability or economic strength to manage and finance a waterway of the Panama Canal's complexity.

U.S. RIGHTS OF PASSAGE

Treaty proponents also argue expeditious passage rights for our ships in time of emergencies adequately protects our interests.

Why then did our negotiators and the Defense Department seek "priority passage" during the negotiations? Despite our position as the world power most affected by the use of the Canal, the Panama officials say our ships are not guaranteed a place at the head of the line in emergencies. On this point, Admiral Thomas Moorer, former Joint Chiefs Chairman, declared Monday, "I submit that ownership and control, on one hand, and priority passage and defense, on the other, are synonymous."

INTERVENTION RIGHTS

Treaty proponents argue further that our rights to use the Canal are guaranteed under the Neutrality Treaty because the Treaty itself does not rule out U.S. intervention to assure its availability.

Even Treaty advocates, such as General Maxwell Taylor and Admiral Elmo Zumwalt, described the Treaty provisions on this subject as "ambiguous" and "fuzzy."

Admiral Zumwalt went so far as to suggest we attach a separate Resolution to the Treaty to nail down U.S. rights to step in if Canal movement was impaired.

PANAMA'S GOVERNMENT

Treaty proponents also argue that the Panamanian dictator Torrijos has the support of his people.

Why then have there been no free elections during Torrijos' 9-year reign, which has pushed the national debt from $167 million to over $1.5 billion, and brought economic stagnation to Panama? One might also ask, Does the Panamanian government have the political strength or will to resist outside interference? Once sovereignty is given to Panama, will that government remain friendly to the U.S.? If U.S.-Panama relations are bad, then the only other great power to which they could turn would be the Soviet Union, through its figurehead Castro.

ANOTHER VIETNAM

As I stated earlier, the Treaty has been presented to the Senate under the implied threat that if we do not ratify, we will be inviting another Vietnam.

More likely, if we relinquish control of the Canal, we will have another Cuba to our South. Vietnam was a foreign nation distant from the U.S., while the Canal is in our Hemisphere and we have operated it for the benefit of Panama and the world. The Panama Canal Zone and the Canal are U.S. territory; Vietnam was not.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Treaty proponents also argue our credibility on human rights is involved.

That point raises the question as to why then are we being asked to make a national hero out of the Torrijos government? The respected liberal organization, Freedom House, which the State Department has cited in its annual report to Congress, rates Panama as "not free." It states that, on both civil and political rights, Panama has one of the worst records in the world.

COST OF THE GIVEAWAY

Treaty proponents claim the U.S. should be willing to pay Panama up to $1.5 billion during the process of transferring control since we have paid many other foreign governments billions for base rights.

In other countries where we have base rights, we are merely renting their land. In Panama, we bought the land from the Panama Government, paid all landowners and even squatters, plus paying the French Canal Company and Colombia. In the Wilson v. Shaw case, the U.S. Supreme Court stated the Canal is without doubt U.S. property.

JOINT CHIEFS' POSITION

Proponents argue that the Joint Chiefs of Staff favor the Treaty. This is true, but most retired officers do not support it. Shortly a list of those military leaders opposed to the Treaty will be released, and I assure you it will be a long one.

Furthermore, the Treaty is a political issue, while Canal use is mainly a Navy issue. Four past Navy Chiefs oppose the Treaty. One of this group, Admiral Moorer, served as the past Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. Admiral John McCain, Commander-in-Chief of our Pacific forces during the height of the Vietnam War, has stated, "it is my conviction that U.S. interests are best served by keeping the Canal." This Committee should also note it is significant that to date not one active duty military officer has publicly opposed the Treaty.

COST TO SHIPPERS

Another point, and a key one to businessmen, addresses the claim by Treaty advocates that increased tolls will finance the additional payments to Panama.

They seem to forget that Canal passage costs have increased 45% in the past three years and the Canal is still operating at a deficit. In addition, while the increased use of the Canal to transfer oil from Alaska to the East Coast will mean more business for the Canal, it also means higher tolls to shippers and higher oil costs. The U.S. business community and the American taxpayer will be saddled with that expense. In fact, the Chairman of the Merchant Shipping Council, Mr. W. J. Amoss, Jr., has switched from an advocate of a Treaty to an opponent of this Treaty. He said the increased toll costs will spell "sheer disaster for operators east of the Canal", which incidentally means shippers on the Eastern Seaboard.

The weakness of these nine arguments by Treaty advocates is further compounded when we consider other issues which have been raised.

Six months after ratification of the Treaty, the Canal Zone ceases to exist and about 65 percent of the land and 10 of the 14 U.S. bases are given to Panama. The remaining land adjoining the Canal itself is under limited U.S. control for the purpose of operating the Canal. We then oblige ourselves to begin paying the Panama government huge sums in various ways, totalling up to nearly $1.5 billion over the next 22 years.

NEUTRALITY TREATY AMBIGUOUS

One of my most significant concerns is the ambiguity contained in the Neutrality Treaty. This deserves special attention. Ambassador Linowitz and others have maintained that no limits were spelled out in the Treaty, so we will be free to take whatever steps are necessary to protect the neutrality of the Canal. These remarks might be reassuring to the American public, except for the comments made by Chief Negotiator Bethancourt on these provisions to the Panama Assembly on August 19. He stated:

"Those people believe that the right to intervene is granted, but nobody grants the big powers the right to intervene. They intervene wherever they damn well please with or without a pact."

Additionally, in an August 24, 1977 radio broadcast, Mr. Bethancourt is quoted as saying:

"The pact does not establish that the United States has the right to intervene in Panama. This word (intervention) was discussed and eliminated . . ."

Later he stated: ". . . the neutrality pact does not provide that the United States will say when neutrality is violated."

Indeed, Articles IV and V of the Neutrality Treaty are so ambiguous as to lend themselves to various interpretations. This reason alone is sufficient to reject the Treaties.

BROAD CONCERNS

These are some of the specific concerns I have relative to these Treaties. There are other broader issues involved. Will our ratification of these treaties be seen as a pattern of withdrawal in view of our retreat in Korea, Southeast Asia and possibly Taiwan? This misguided direction of our foreign policy engenders consternation on the part of our Allies and audacity on the part of our adversaries.

This type of audacity has even been highlighted by the reckless and provocative statements of Mr. Bethancourt and others about violence.

We cannot hope to deal effectively with other Nations as a world leader if we yield to blackmail. That is the only word to describe the threats of violence and sabotage which treaty proponents are broadcasting far and wide, and using as their chief argument for ratification. If the Senate were to ratify a treaty in the face of such threats, it would show the world a new policy alien to our national character and our history, and which would invite further exploitation.

POSITIVE ALTERNATIVES

Before closing I wish to make clear I am not opposed to a new arrangement with Panama. In the past, I have supported the Terminal Lake-Third Lock Modernization Plan. This would provide for approximately $2.5 billion in capital investments over a 5 to 10 year period. Such a major step will provide an opportunity for mutual cooperation and an even greater partnership between the people of the United States and the people of Panama.

Another part of the Treaty with which I find fault is the provision prohibiting our construction of a sea-level canal prior to the year 2000, except in Panama or only with the permission of Panama. In this instance, we have surrendered an option which may be forced upon us.

CANAL GREAT ACHIEVEMENT

The Panama Canal stands as a monument to American foresight, ingenuity, and perseverance. Author David McCullough, who recently published "The Path Between the Seas," a history of the Panama Canal, has written:

"It is the physical expression of a boundless confidence, one which believed tomorrow will be better. If an archaeologist were to come across only the locks and the cuts in that jungle, his conclusion would be: 'What a civilization it must have been to build this!'"

Adds McCullough:

"Many people feel that by relinquishing the canal we are saying something profound about ourselves, that we have reached a turning point in our growth as a nation. Will we go forward as a people with our skill and great machines, or have we become a people who are pulling in and withdrawing?"

In conclusion, neither our interests nor the interests of the people of Panama are served by the treaties. The only outcome of ratification can be danger ahead.

CONCERNING INTERPRETATION OF PROVISIONS OF THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations resumed its consideration of the proposed Panama Canal agreements this morning by taking additional testimony from negotiators Ellsworth Bunker and Sol Linowitz.

Our purpose in asking the negotiators to come back at this point was to give the members an opportunity to discuss with them the clarifying statement pertaining to the neutrality agreement which the White House released Friday, October 14, following General Torrijos' brief return visit to this country.

This morning, the committee devoted 2 full hours to examining the "Statement of Understanding" and discussing its meaning with Messrs. Bunker and Linowitz. This was a very positive and useful meeting and as chairman of the committee I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, it served to clarify all of the major, as well as some of the minor, differences of interpretation that have surfaced since the signing of the agreements. As a result, I am hopeful that Senators will be satisfied after examining the statement and the discussion of it this morning that there are now no differences of interpretation between the United States and Panama. I think this morning's hearing record makes it quite clear that we are all on the same wave length.

For the information of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the "Statement of Understanding," along with a copy of the transcript of a press conference held October 18 by Panamanian negotiator Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, be printed in the Record. I ask my colleagues to study this material very carefully because I believe it will serve to answer many of the questions that have arisen about the interpretation of the proposed Panama Canal pacts.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF UNDERSTANDING

Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly.

PANAMA: ESCOBAR TELLS PRESS OF CARTER-TORRIJOS MEETING

(Opening remarks by Panamanian negotiator Romulo Escobar Bethancourt at news conference held at journalists house.)

Good afternoon, distinguished journalists. We have called this news conference on instructions from General Torrijos and the national government, the purpose being to provide information on the meeting held in Washington between President Carter and General Torrijos.

While General Torrijos was on his tour of Israel and West Europe, he was invited by President Carter to stop over in Washington on his return trip to have a talk. President Carter was interested in two things: First, to exchange views with General Torrijos on his tour of Israel and West Europe, and to obtain the reaction of those countries or their rulers regarding the treaties signed between Panama and the United States. The second point was for the two heads of state to meet to clarify some matters which were causing confusion in Panama as well as in the United States. Specifically, this referred to two points, both of which are part of the Canal Neutrality Treaty.

In Washington, the two heads of state first held a private meeting during which they discussed the general's trip to Israel and Europe. Subsequently, they held a broader meeting between President Carter and his adviser and General Torrijos and his advisers. The following matters arose at this meeting: President Carter pointed out that, in spite of the fact that both he and General Torrijos clearly understood the points concerning the Neutrality Treaty, the following had occurred: The U.S. Senate Foreign Affairs Committee was interpreting Articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty in a manner different or contrary to the way it was being interpreted in Panama by us, the government's spokesmen, and that this was causing confusion in both countries.

General Torrijos expressed the same view and said he was very pleased to hold this meeting, because if a concrete interpretation was to be forthcoming on these problems, he wanted the interpretation to be made before 23 October, the date of the plebiscite in Panama. The two heads of state, with the participation of their respective advisers, continued the meeting and went right into the items in question.

The first of these topics was Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, which states that both Panama and the United States pledge to maintain the neutrality (of the canal—FRIS) so that the canal may remain open peacefully and in a nondiscriminatory manner to all ships. This language had been perfectly understood by the negotiators and the rulers of both countries, but the confusion arose with regard to the following: Whether or not the United States had the clear and indisputable right to defend the canal in order to keep it open to the world's ships, on the one hand, and whether, on the other hand, this involved the right to intervene in the domestic affairs of the Republic of Panama.

Why did the problem arise? Because some Senators in the United States maintained that the language used in Article IV effectively gave the United States the right of defense against attacks on the Panama Canal in violation of the Neutrality Treaty. They extended this to mean that, as a consequence of this right of defense, they had the right to intervene in the Republic of Panama.

On the other hand, ever since the first public and official explanation in our country on 19 August, to the assembly of Corregimiento Representatives, we said that the intent of article IV was to point out that, in effect, Panama and the United States had the right to defend the canal against attack in order to keep it open for transit by all the world's nations, but that the scope of this right of defense at no time could be extended to mean the right to intervene within the Republic of Panama.

After the two heads of State managed to define these basic facts, we were able to divide the problem in such a way as to be able to clarify it. The objections being made in the Foreign Relations Committee of the U.S. Senate, on the one hand, and the objections in Panama, on the other, would have no reason to exist once the two heads of state managed to develop this thinking and this common interpretation.

During the talks between President Carter and General Torrijos and at the meeting, the U.S. President reiterated that at no time had his country interpreted article IV to mean the right of intervention in Panama's internal affairs: that it had always interpreted this as a right of defense against any attacks on the canal in violation of the neutrality treaty; and that the U.S. interest was fundamentally based on the fact and need that the canal must remain peaceful and permanently open to traffic by all ships of all nations of the world. In this sense the Panama Canal constitutes an interoceanic waterway that is vital not only to U.S. commerce and shipping, but to many countries of the world as well.

Therefore, this was President Carter's reasoning. In addition, he very wisely pointed out that his country was not currently in a position to engage in intervention, because it already has had experience with intervention in the internal affairs of other countries. General Torrijos recognized in President Carter a very moral stance regarding the political conduct of his government and of the United States, based precisely on the criterion that, although his country is a great power, it is turning away from the type of intervention that it carried out in the past in Vietnam, Santo Domingo and a number of other places in the world.

We honestly believe that the two heads of State developed a stronger understanding at this meeting, not only in regard to settling the negotiation and treaty issue, but also in regard to the political conception of the new relations that must prevail between our two countries and between the United States and the other countries of the American continent.

A single interpretation was then agreed upon so that no conflicting interpretation or standard would be expressed in the United States and Panama regarding article IV. The two heads of state agree that the correct interpretation of article IV is based on two facts: That attacks or acts of aggression against the Panama Canal grant to Panama and to the United States the right to defend it, in order to prevent such attacks, and so that the canal may remain neutral, open and peaceful for all nations. In addition, at no time does such defense involve, refer to or grant to the United States the right to intervene in Panama's internal affairs.

On the initiative of General Torrijos and President Carter to clarify the concept further, it was even pointed out that, in addition, any action taken by the United States to maintain the canal being open to all nations would never be an action aimed against the territorial integrity or the political independence of the Republic of Panama. We believe that in this way, through the unification of this stand, a real separation is made between the problem of the canal's defense against attacks and acts of aggression, and the act of intervention which we Panamanians have always rejected and which we have said was never embodied in the neutrality treaty. This position has now been strengthened with the unified interpretation by the two heads of state on this problem.

In this regard this becomes specific, since President Carter said this textually. What I am going to do here is repeat how this stand was reached to prevent continued confusion in Panama and in the United States with regard to the scope of article IV of the neutrality treaty.

According to the treaty on permanent neutrality and the operation of the Panama Canal—in parentheses, the neutrality treaty—Panama and the United States have the responsibility of insuring that the canal will remain secure and open to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries, according to its respective constitutional procedures, will defend the canal against any threat to its neutrality and consequently will have the right to act in case of aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of ships through the canal.

You can see that this first part specifically states the right to defend the canal by Panama and by the United States, specifically to keep the canal open, and to prevent any obstruction of the transit of ships. The unified interpretation continues in the following manner: It does not mean and will not be interpreted as meaning a U.S. right to intervene in Panama's internal affairs. Any action by the United States will be directed at insuring that the canal remains open, secure and accessible, and will never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

You can see that in this specific case, the two heads of state managed to unify their stands regarding the true scope of Article IV: That is, to defend the Canal against attacks or aggression directed at closing it or at obstructing the passage of ships. The actions which Panama or the United States could take are directed toward this specific purpose. But in the case of the United States, no action can ever be directed toward the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama, which is precisely what we Panamanians are defending and have been maintaining since the signing of the Torrijos-Carter treaty.

On the second point—in this case related to Article VI of the neutrality treaty—the transit of U.S. and Panamanian warships in an expeditious manner through the canal, the two heads of State clearly stated what exactly was meant by expeditious passage through the canal by U.S. and Panamanian warships. They discussed this problem and pointed out that, fundamentally, expeditious passage means quick transit, without obstacles with the least possible processing. In addition, it was pointed out that in case of an emergency or necessity, in such specific cases expeditious passage would permit the warships of both countries—but naturally primarily those of the United States, because we do not yet have warships—to go to the head of the line of ships awaiting transit, the purpose being to go through the Canal quickly.

General Torrijos said yes, he did consider this necessary and appropriate because one of the things we did not agree with was that the warships should spend too much time in Panamanian territorial waters, much less in cases of emergencies or necessity.

Why? Because a prolonged delay could make that ship an object of reprisal within our territorial waters. Therefore, the sooner it left, the more secure our country would be. Second, warships which would remain for a long time in our country's territorial waters would have negative social consequences, because they generally carry large crews and a large number of soldiers, and a prolonged stay would disrupt normal life in our cities.

Those who are old enough to remember what occurred in Panama during World War II will understand exactly what kind of problem is caused by a prolonged presence of foreign troops in our territory—social problems, problems of disrespect for women, drunkenness, fights, scandals and so forth. Therefore, in the case of necessity or in the event of war, having warships go through the Canal quickly not only fulfills an aspiration of the United States—which, naturally, in an emergency wants its ships to transit the Canal quickly—but also is to the advantage of Panama, which does not want such ships to remain in its territorial waters. On this basis, therefore, a uniform interpretation of the true meaning of expeditious passage through the Canal was achieved.

It is unified in the following manner: The neutrality treaty provides that U.S. and Panamanian warships and auxiliary vessels will have the right to transit the Canal in an expeditious manner. The intention is, and it will be so interpreted, to insure the transit of those ships through the Canal as quickly as possible, without obstacles, with simplified processing and in case of necessity or emergency, to go to the head of the line in order to transit the Canal quickly.

This is therefore the meaning which the two rulers have now accepted as the single interpretation of the expeditious transit of warships of the United States and Panama. Besides,—and this is most important—since the general was returning from his tour of Israel and West European states, he consulted the various chiefs of state on the scope of this problem of expeditious passage and how it could affect these nations support of the neutrality treaty. In this respect, those whom he consulted told him that they were not concerned about this; that the problem would arise only if the Canal were closed: that having U.S. warships pass first was no problem; that the serious problem, they reiterated, was if the Canal were closed; because a large percentage of those nations economies are based on the transit of their vessels through the Panama Canal; and that one of the reasons why they congratulated Panama and the United States for having reached a peaceful settlement was not merely because of their solidarity with our country's just cause, but also because of their great concern that the Canal remain permanently open, as their economies would be seriously affected otherwise.

Consequently, we can tell this distinguished group of journalists that as a result of the meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos in Washington, we have made it possible for the contents of Article IV of the neutrality treaty to be specifically interpreted by the two chiefs of Government who signed the treaties.

I believe an important step has been taken in really clarifying what had become cause for great concern to us Panamanians and the U.S. Senators. To us, the vital part is clearly explained and reiterated by President Carter: that the article neither had been interpreted, nor would be interpreted, and cannot be interpreted, as a U.S. right of intervention in our internal affairs, and that U.S. actions cannot affect our territorial integrity and political independence.

Later I am going to distribute this same sheet, although you already know its contents since it was published recently in the papers. I wanted to hold this news conference to explain to you how this unification of positions was reached and, in addition, to answer any questions you may want to ask.

Question. My question is very brief. Is it a fact, as U.S. news agencies have reported, that a joint communique had been signed?

Answer. No, there was no joint communique. What I am reading to you is an interpretation reached by the two chiefs of state. It is, however, an interpretation which neither one signed because it was not deemed necessary since they had signed the treaty. As signatories of the treaty and as chiefs of state, they were merely giving their interpretation of two articles of the neutrality treaty. When General Torrijos said he had not signed a single autograph, he meant just that, since no document was signed. In these negotiations there is nothing that is secret.

If they had signed something, such a signed document would have been released immediately to the Panamanian press for publication.

When we speak of an interpretation by the two signatories of the treaty we merely mean that the two chiefs of government are saying: What we signed means this. They do not have to sign a statement saying we interpret it in this manner simply because the document which includes the text of the articles was signed by them. In fact, it is just as President Carter had said previously, that when the United States says it can defend the canal against attacks and aggressions and when Panama says that this did not mean the right of intervention, they are both actually speaking about the same thing (as heard) as being certain. What they did was meet for him to confirm to his Senate, his people, and we, to our people, the interpretation of what they had signed.

Question. Some Senators are asking that the interpretation be included as part of the treaty, as they consider it important to understanding the scope of the text. Would Panama accept this 5 days before the plebiscite?

Answer. That would be a decision for the general (Torrijos—PPIS) to make. However, we cannot abide by what the Senators want because they have their own problems and procedures there, their own legal system. In fact, I believe they have already concluded the period of hearings. Nevertheless, we cannot adapt our procedures to that of the U.S. Senate. Each country has its own procedure, and ours is through a plebiscite which is scheduled to be held on 23 October. When General Torrijos met with President Carter on this specific issue, they were not adding anything at all to the treaty; they were merely confirming an interpretation which the two countries had already made in article 4 of the neutrality treaty but which, in both countries, did not seem to be very clear.

Question. Latin America is a region of political instability. Article 4 of the neutrality treaty guarantees the defense of canal by Panama and the United States. However, if a government should emerge which is hostile toward the United States as a result of the canal, do you believe that the United States would intervene in Panama to put down the violent nature of such a government?

Answer. No. That is precisely why the interpretation points out the political independence, that this will not affect the political independence. This means that the Republic of Panama could have governments which are friendly or hostile toward the United States in the future, which we cannot know. But the commitment of Panama as a state with regard to the United States and in relation to all the other countries of the world and those that adhere (to the neutrality treaty—ERIS) is to keep the canal open. It does not mean to be friendly toward any particular country. It means that it must keep the canal open even if it is an enemy of that country. This is the real meaning of the concept of neutrality. Therefore, regardless of the kind of political regime which emerges in Panama, it can never close the canal, not just in the case of the United States, it cannot close the canal to any of the other countries. I would say that it cannot close the canal even if it wanted to since Panama's necessity in the case of the canal is precisely that it remain open. Otherwise, the ships would not transit the canal and would not pay tolls.

Therefore, one cannot make the neutrality treaty dependent on the type of political regime that may exist in Panama or in the United States. The regimen of neutrality demands that the canal remain open not only to the U.S. flag, but to all flags of the world, without discrimination.

Question. (In English) you told us about how you thought Panamanians would vote in the plebiscite. I would like your opinion on whether you think the U.S. Senate will ratify the treaty, and I also want to know if you still feel the way you felt in August, when you said that if it does not ratify the treaty, Panama will take a course of violence, a road to violence.

Answer. When I am asked questions connected with the negotiations, I like them to be asked in Spanish.

(Unidentified person in English) Ann Susie, Ann Susie, would you be so kind to say that in Spanish, please?

(Question in English) I can't. (Words indistinct).

(Unidentified person in English) If you make that question a little shorter, I will try.

(Questioner repeats question, unidentified person in the group translates into Spanish).

Answer. Regarding your question about whether the U.S. Senate will or will not ratify the treaty, Susie, I cannot answer that because I am not a Senator, and since I am not a Senator, I cannot determine what the U.S. Senate's decision will be. I do believe that President Carter's Administration, several Senators, as well as various civic and labor organizations in the United States are making a major effort to convince the Senators of the advisability of reaching a "negotiated solution with Panama in connection" with the treaty.

Regarding your question about whether Panama will choose the path of violence if the Senate does not ratify the treaty, I cannot answer that either for a very simple reason: one cannot predict the future. One does not know what the fate of the people is. We do know that the Panamanian people want to be liberated, but we also know that the Panamanian people and government have always sought the peaceful path in this process of liberation. They have always used peaceful means. They have always tried to reach an agreement that is mutually acceptable to our two countries. We cannot say that Panama will choose the path of violence because if we did we would be guessing. We believe that in this new relationship, it is more feasible to seek the path of negotiations than the path of violence.

Question. Dr. Bethancourt, I would simply like to get this clear: Has the test of the articles which motivated the meeting between Carter and Torrijos been in any way altered after their talks?

Answer. Which articles?

Question. Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty.

Answer. Oh, I see. No, no they have not been altered in any way. Those articles have not been touched, those articles retain their wording, those articles are including in the Neutrality Treaty. The problem was regarding what you have asked is that, in connection with articles IV and VI, the two leaders have said: This article IV and this article VI mean the following . . . in other words, the method of interpretation of the articles, not their alteration.

Furthermore, what they have said is what has been said all along, the only difference is that now they got together to say it in order to unify the interpretation of the two articles in both countries.

Question. Dr. Bethancourt, there is great concern—concern which I share with all Panamanians—regarding which country in the future will interpret or decide if neutrality has been violated or has been or is being threatened, particularly because of the interventionist nature of the United States in the past, a history of intervention which Panama itself has suffered from, as we are an occupied country. Only today the newspaper La Republica reported that U.S. troops and advisers are in Nicaragua fighting the Sandinist Front guerrillas. We would like to know if there are any mechanisms or if there will be any method of consultation between the two countries in such an event. In other words, has this been foreseen, was this been discussed, or is this written down anywhere in the treaty?

Answer. There is no exact method of interpretation on how violations of the neutrality treaty will be determined. Generally, in these treaties one cannot go into a multitude of juridical details. In this case they would be procedural details concerned with juridical procedures. If one did this, one would never conclude a treaty. One would have to draft several codes.

Therefore, it cannot be specifically indicated in the neutrality treaty that the method of interpretation will be this way or that. The general treaty includes an article which states that in case of a discrepancy between the two sides concerning the interpretation of an article, they will reach an agreement between themselves or, if necessary, they will appoint an arbiter to decide the issue. This is the general way these situations are handled.

On this basis Panama concluded a treaty with the United States, after that unilateral declaration, a treaty which reiterates the maintenance of neutrality. But this is not an ambiguous neutrality. It is the neutrality specifically mentioned there. Therefore, if something were to occur in Darien, for example, this would have nothing to do with the canal. Thousands of things could occur on the Isthmus of Panama, as in all other countries of the world. The neutrality treaty indicates a specific situation. It applies to the canal. So as to make it possible for ships to transit. If, for example, in Darien or in some part of the country the government of the Republic of Panama should stop a ship for A, B or C reasons, this is something which has absolutely nothing to do with the Panama Canal. What Panama will not do, under the neutrality treaty, is prevent a ship that is coming exclusively to transit the canal from doing so. This is the meaning (of the neutrality treaty—BRIS).

Therefore, in order to discuss violations of the concept of neutrality established in this treaty one has to look directly at the objective on which the treaty is based: That is, to keep the canal from being closed, thus preventing the passage of ships, and to prevent any hindrances to the passage of ships which come to transit the canal. This is the key to how the scope of the concept of neutrality is measured. But this is not outlined in the treaty concerning the canal. If we used the method you mentioned, we would have to add to each article the procedure by which the article would be implemented. This would be highly impossible. This is not done even in codes. You see, for example, that the penal code lists the crimes, the criminals and the subjects. It is another code, the judicial code, which indicates what procedures are used to judge those crimes and apply the corresponding punishment. If the penal code, in addition to defining crimes and criminals, were to include the procedures, it would not be a functional code.

The same thing applies to treaties. Treaties indicate the points of agreement—the subject, the substance of this subject. The procedure (interrupts sentence—FBIS). For example, here in these treaties you will see that many of these things are developed by different procedures: For example, procedures to be developed by the commission which will administer the Panama Canal, procedures to be developed by the Joint Board for the Defense of Canal. But these procedures are not specifically outlined. What the treaties gives is the subject matter which is being agreed upon by the two countries and the clause which I mentioned to you concerning what procedures are followed for (sentence left unfinished—FBIS).

Answer. Those are different problems. One thing has nothing to do with the other. As far as the expiration date is concerned. It is clearly established. It is known to be 31 December 1999, and noon, Panama time. There is an article which states this and which cannot be disputed.

The other article concerns the date of expiration on which the canal is returned to Panama, with no cost, except as agreed upon by the two parties. (Sentence as heard—FBIS) why (the phrase—FBIS) except as agreed upon by the two parties? Because, let us suppose that in 1996 or in 1999, with 1 or 2 years remaining before the treaty between Panama and the United States expires—this is a hypothetical case—that is, 2 years before the treaty expires, there should be the need to make an investment for X, Y, or Z reasons related to the functioning of the canal. Then the United States could say to Panama: Well, 1 year remains before our administration ends, but in this year it will be necessary to invest, let us say $5 million and we believe that to make such an investment now, when we have 1 year to go, is absurd from the point of view of our economy. Panama could then decide to say: Go ahead and invest the $5 billion and when you turn over the Canal, we will recognize this debt of $5 million. This is a hypothetical case. That is why one says except as agreed upon by the two parties, because the matter is not closed, because one does not know what contingencies may occur. However, one says except as agreed upon by the two parties because if they do not agree on anything, then the canal has to be returned free of costs to the Republic of Panama. If Panama were to say: "No, do not make the investment, or if you do it will be at your expense because we are not going to recognize this sum, then there would be no agreement. When one stipulates except as agreed upon by the two parties, this means the two parties must reach an agreement in this regard.

But this was nothing to do with the treaty termination date. Because as to the treaty termination date, if it were not a fixed date or if it were a fixed date but with the possibility of extension, this would appear in this article and it would say 31 December 1999, except for whatever the parties might otherwise agree upon. It would say so there, but it does not say so because the termination of U.S. control is emphatic with regard to U.S. presence here in Panama: At noon on 31 December 1999, Panama time period, nothing else is said.

The other refers rather to a problem of an economic nature, a problem of some investment that might have to be made at the last minute when there is only a short time left before Panama recovers the canal. In this case the two parties will have to agree on whether Panama agrees to assume the debt or not. That would be a problem between the two countries. However, about wanting to take what one article states and give it a meaning in another article, this does not make sense. This does not make sense because they are different subjects and each article contains what one wants it to contain. When that article is related to another article, it is so stated. You can see this in the treaty. When administration or defense is mentioned, reference is made to the schedules. You have to refer to the schedules because the articles state that these schedules will expand on the contents of that article. When one article is related to another, it is stated that the article is related to another article.

In law practice we cannot prevent attempts at all kinds of interpretations. This cannot be prevented. Furthermore, the lawyer always has a tendency to do this. This is why we have courts where, when a prisoner is being tried, one lawyer is accusing him and another is defending him over the same issue.

However, there is another matter, which is commonsense. Commonsense is superior to law. Commonsense is what tells you when something is clear. Commonsense cannot be twisted or changed no matter how much you argue against it. For example, if you hit an egg with a hammer and the egg breaks, there is no lawyer in the world who can deny it. Nevertheless, commonsense will tell you that if you hit it with a hammer, the egg will break.

Therefore, this problem must be clear with regard to the fact that these documents are open to many interpretations. However, we do have commonsense and this indicates to you that there is a termination date in this treaty. It is clearly stated in one of its articles which is devoted to, and even has as its title, the termination date. This article says that it expires on 31 December 1999 at noon Panama time and nothing else. It does not say that it is related to another article, or that one has to look in an annex for more information, or that one has to seek an exchange of notes to explain it, or that one has to seek a subsequent agreement or a subsequent interpretation. This article shows that it can stand on its own, that it does not need interpolations or another article to indicate whether or not it applies.

What is occurring now is an attempt to seek interpretations in order to create uncertainty—to create uncertainty with regard to this problem, so that people will think: Is it true or not that it expires on December 31, 1999? That is the aim, because we are 3 or 4 days away from the plebiscite. There are lawyers who have said that the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty is better than this one. They have said this, but they have not taken the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty and read it to the people article by article. They have not done this. They have said the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty is better than this. Let us keep that one. Moreover, this is degrading, but they have gone that far. And worse things will happen.

However, one thing is being forgotten. They are forgetting—in an attempt to think of themselves as very intelligent, or in believing that one can play with all kinds of ideas—one important thing, which is the common man. The common man is used to living with commonsense daily, and he cannot be deceived. He cannot be asked the kind of question which Plato asked in attacking sophists, such as, tell me the meaning of a man who is not a man, who is sitting in a tree which is not a tree and hitting the tree with a stone which is not a stone. This is for the sophists, this is not for the common man.

Question. My question refers to next Sunday's plebiscite. What percentage of the people will vote yes, in the opinion of the government?

Answer. I cannot answer that because I have not consulted the government concerning such a percentage. However, based on my very personal opinion, starting with the fact that everyone who votes yes will be voting for a new treaty and that everyone who votes no will be voting for keeping the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty, I believe that a large percentage of our people will vote yes. Naturally, I am not a prophet and cannot tell you exactly what that percentage will be.

Question. Comrade, I would like to know why the Republic of Panama in Article VII says: The Republic of Panama will adopt the measures necessary to insure that no other use of the land and water of the canal basin will exhaust the supply of water necessary for the continuous and efficient management, functioning and maintenance of the canal and will not interfere with the U.S. rights to use the waters of the canal basin. Panama needs water for its people to live. The Panamanian pays for his water. The Panamanian needs electricity. Why does Panama subsidize a country, which I respect but which is the world's largest economic power, and why do we give it our water?

Answer. I am going to divide your question into two parts, the one about the Panamanian people needing water and the other concerning why we took the decision not to deforest or not to interfere with the waters for use in the canal. First of all, the two points are not contradictory because the maintenance of the hydrographic basin is important to provide water for our people and for the operation of the canal. Second, we must protect the hydrographic basin in this case, in relation to the canal, because otherwise we would have to close it. If there is not water, the canal must be closed. That is a great truth. And it is not a question of subsidizing the United States in that respect. The fact is that the canal constitutes, according to our geographic position, one of our resources, part of our wealth, to develop our country. That is why we are struggling to put a termination date on the treaty with the United States, so that the canal will become our property. This is also the reason why during the 23-year-period we have agreed with the United States to receive approximately $80 million a year instead of the present ridiculous sum of $2.6 million.

Since it is an economic resource, we must first maintain that economic resource, take care of that economic resources, and obtain the greatest possible benefit for our country and our people. If, according to your theory, we deforest the hydrographic basin, that would be tantamount to Venezuela setting fire to its oil wells. If Venezuela sets fire to its oil wells, it would destroy one of the principal sources of its wealth.

That measure is directed at conserving sufficient water for the operation of the canal, not just now that the United States has it, but also after it is turned over to us. Furthermore, it would be absurd for us to deforest the hydrographic basin, for us to alter the water situation, or not to try to better the water situation because then we would not only have no water for the canal, but we would not have water for our country.

For instance, take the case of Panama, so as not to talk about other countries. What has happened in certain regions of our country? Indiscriminate deforestation, the felling of trees, the turning of places which years ago had abundant vegetation into barren areas has resulted in diminished rainwater reserves and a decrease in our water levels. It has resulted in an alteration of our annual rain levels to the point that last year we had one of our country's worst droughts.

By protecting our hydrographic basin, we are not engaging in anything blasphemous or doing this because the gringos have such pretty faces. We are not interested in having the canal close down. We are interested in seeing it function and in having the canal. * * *

Question. But then why do they not pay for the water? It says here that they will use the water free of charge. How come we have to pay for it?

Answer. We pay for its consumption.

Question. That should be free of charge because they consume it, too.

Answer. For its consumption, we pay for its consumption. The water. * * *

Question. They consume it, too. * * *

Answer. Enough!

JOHN WAYNE AND THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. Humphrey), I ask unanimous consent that a statement by him, as well as the text of correspondence he has received from John Wayne to which this statement makes reference, be printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the text of correspondence was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

Last week, I received a letter from John Wayne and his statement reviewing the Panama Canal Treaties. Since Mr. Wayne has had close ties to the Republic of Panama going back to the 1940's, I think his views on the discussions now focusing on the Panama Canal Treaties deserve our attention.

While I would urge my colleagues to give close attention to Mr. Wayne's statement, I would like to call their attention to his conclusion:

"The new Treaty modernizes an outmoded relation with a friendly and hospitable country. It also solves an international question with our other Latin American neighbors, and finally the Treaty protects and legitimates fundamental interests and desires of our Country."

I found Mr. Wayne's analysis of the new treaties particularly thoughtful. He is a man of impressive integrity and patriotism for his country. Therefore, his views are most relevant.

BEVERLY HILLS, CALIF., October 11, 1977.

SENATOR HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed is a statement regarding the Panama Canal Treaty. As usual, our dear provocative press misquoted me. This has increased my mail by letters from people who are concerned about my reaction to the Treaty. The enclosed is the answer that I am sending to them.

I would appreciate it if you would read the enclosed review which I have made. Through friends and a few years of experience, I have had the opportunity to know a little about the situation down there. I might add that I have friends on both sides of the political spectrum. They are all still living the same life in the same manner as they were before the Torrijos change of government eight or so years ago. Their personal liberties do not seem too badly interfered with. None of them are in jail, and they have perhaps a little more respect for the law.

At any rate, the statement enclosed is a point of view that I think is worthy of your attention.

Sincerely,

JOHN WAYNE.

Enclosure.

STATEMENT REGARDING PANAMA CANAL TREATY

My interest in Panama goes back to the 40's. I have friends on both sides of their political spectrum. As a matter of fact, my first introduction to the Panamanian situation was in the 30's when Harmodio Arias was president. He was probably the best liked figure in all of South America and one of the very few presidents who has ever completed a term up to and since that time. His wife and his son Tito, then about 12 years old, visited me in California. Another son Tony was Godfather to one of my daughters. I am only going into these personal things to show you that I have had reasons to give attention to our relationships down there.

I have followed the Panamanian situation since the time the State Department insured us losing good relationships with Panama by changing their policy and charging extremely high prices for tuition for the children of several Panamanian families to go to Canal Zone schools. These families were continually involved in the leadership and administration in Panama. I think it would have been quite obvious with their children attending our schools that they would have our point of view. I wrote a letter to our Administration at that time to apprise them of this situation. Nothing was done.

You say that it is a blow to you to learn from the press that I favor the surrender of the Panama Canal. I certainly did not. I was appalled when General Eisenhower did just that and gave the sovereignty of the Canal away by allowing the Panamanian flag to fly there; but at that time, neither Congress, nor the press, nor the conservatives uttered any kind of cry. I did, but it was a voice in the wilderness.

In checking to find the reason for President Eisenhower's actions, I found out that although we had the rights to the ownership and jurisdiction of the Canal that Panama had not surrendered sovereignty of same. I also found out that the United States in the Arias-Roosevelt Treaty of 1936, ratified by our Congress in 1939, recognized the sovereignty of Panama in the Canal Zone as it was originally stated in the 1903 agreement.

Under negotiations during the Kennedy Administration, it was further agreed that any place within the civil area that the American flag flew, there must be a Panamanian flag raised.

Our people in the Zone tried to avoid this by removing flag poles. This started irrational actions by both sides. During those student riots which took place in 1964, our then president, Lyndon B. Johnson told the world that there would be a gradual return of the Canal to Panamanian possession. There were still no outcries from the people who are now complaining, but the above acts plus common decency to the dignity of Panama demanded a re-evaluation of our Treaty.

Now, let's take the Treaty for what it is. We do not give up one active military installation for the next quarter of a century. We do transfer to Panama in the civil Canal area such governmental activities as police and fire protection, civil administration, post offices, courts, customs, garbage collection, and maintenance of certain areas which are not necessary to manage the Canal. The Canal will continue to be run by an American agency. The Board of Directors of that entity will be comprised of nine members—five members of the Board, American—and four Panamanians who will be selected by the United States from a list proposed by Panama. This Board of Directors will not have any authority on our military bases which we will have there for a quarter of a century to insure this Treaty.

The Treaty insures all American citizens working in the Canal their continuing jobs to retirement and the continued uses of their rented homes at the present rate which averages around $150 per month including all their utilities, garbage collection, sewerage, upkeep of the grounds and maintenance including gardening lawns and painting of buildings. This is guaranteed to each until retirement or completion of their contracts.

When the Canal Company transfers these responsibilities to Panama, they will also transfer $10,000,000 a year of the toll charges to take care of them. I doubt if this will cover the costs. So does our government. Therefore, this United States

Canal Company Agency which will still be running the Canal for the next 20 years will be instructed to raise the toll charges 30 cents per ton or about $\frac{1}{100}$ of a cent and a half per pound to be given to Panama to cover such contingencies as inflation and to insure the above responsibilities plus rental for the 120,000 acres which these United States will continue to hold for its military installations and also the use of a 4,000 square kilometer water shed as a water reservoir to take care of our civil and military needs in the area. This added toll charge could amount to \$40,000,000 in the years to come; but not one cent of it will come out of our pockets.

None of this will cost the American taxpayer one cent. We will not be required to pay $1 to Panama when this Treaty is put into effect.

I explained to the press when I was interrogated that I am only one of 200,000,000 private citizens of the United States and that I am not presuming to establish our foreign policy. I suggested that perhaps the facts as I have presented them to you might be put in a more enlightening manner to our citizens.

Regarding Communism, quite obviously, there are some Communists in General Torrijos' administration as there have been and probably still are in ours. Back in the days of McCarthy, it was proven that a great number of people in our government were Communists. For his high-handed manner with the use of the Committee, he was censored; but the truth of his findings were never questioned.

There will always be accusations and counter-accusations in this area. General Torrijos has never followed the Marxist line. Even in his speech when he visited Cuba, he stated that Castro had insured schooling and developed a system of feeding his people but at a high social cost. Because of this he stated that what was aspirin for Cuba was not necessarily the right medicine for Panama which is putting it about as plainly as possible when you are visiting in a foreign country that you are not agreeing with their methods.

Such rumors and accusations mushroom to a degree that it is hard for anyone to defend themselves. General Torrijos' government has not followed the Marxist line. He does have his Escobar Bethancourt as we have our Andrew Young, neither of whom were elected by either populus. A quarter of a century from now—when and if this agreement is carried out to the letter of the law—and we decide that it is proper to remove military installations, Escobar Bethancourt will be an old and forgotten character; and Young will probably be relegated to some posh job in our civil service from which he cannot be fired or taken care of by some liberal foundation as was Hiss.

I hope that the pragmatic view that I have of this situation is understandable. I have carefully studied the Treaty, and I support it based on my belief that America looks always to the future and that our people have demonstrated qualities of justice and reason for 200 years. That attitude has made our country a great Nation. The new Treaty modernizes an outmoded relation with a friendly and hospitable country. It also solves an international question with our other Latin American neighbors, and finally the Treaty protects and legitimates fundamental interests and desires of our Country.

U.S. BANKS IN PANAMA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues information concerning the activities of U.S. banks in Panama. The recently concluded treaty with Panama has stirred speculation that U.S. banks may have excessive exposure in Panama and therefore, have a special interest in the benefits to Panama from the financial portions of the agreements.

As chairman of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, I asked the Federal Reserve Board and the Comptroller's Office to provide detailed information on U.S. bank exposure in Panama. I ask unanimous consent that their replies, including the tables appended thereto, be printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the data supplied by the bank regulatory agencies show that U.S. banks had total claims on Panama of $2,831 million as of December 31, 1976. Reports for

June 30, 1977, are not yet fully tabulated, but it appears that total exposure has not grown and may have declined: All national banks had just $773 million in claims in Panama, and 20 large banks (including large State member banks involved in lending in Panama) had $2,162 million in claims in Panama. Data obtained for June 30, 1976, indicate total U.S. bank exposure in Panama was $3,417 million. Further revision of the figures may yield a different result, but based on what is available currently, U.S. banks seem to have reduced their exposure in Panama during the past year, although overseas operations in general and other off-shore banking centers outside London (Bahamas, Cayman Islands, Singapore, Hong Kong, Bahrain, and so forth) in particular have been expanding rapidly.

Panamanian claims of U.S. banks do appear large in relation to claims on other Central American countries. Total U.S. bank claims on the other five republics were $1,478 million at the close of last year, as compared with $2,831 on Panama. But claims on Panama are enlarged by its role as an offshore international banking center, a role not played by other Central American republics. From one-quarter to one-third of bank claims on Panamanian residents are claims in fact on the branches of other foreign banks (principally European banks) in Panama. These interbank deposits are fully backed by the parent banks and should be excluded from an assessment of true bank exposure in Panama. It should also be noted that a much higher percentage of total claims on Panama are externally guaranteed (Panama, 21.3 percent; Costa Rica, 8.9 percent; El Salvador, 3 percent; Guatemala, 1.7 percent; Honduras, 9.3 percent; and Nicaragua, 3.7 percent).

Claims on Panama are largely short-term claims despite its use as a center for booking loans to be used throughout Central America. As of December 31, 53.5 percent of U.S. bank claims had maturities of under 1 year. As of June 30, 52.1 percent of all national bank claims on Panama had maturities of less than a year and the percentage was slightly higher (53.8 percent) for the 20 largest national banks.

The U.S. bank operations in Panama are concentrated in a few large banks. Three banks, which happen to be state-chartered banks, holds 50 percent of the claims held by 20 large U.S. banks on Panama, that is, $1,081 million.

Four national banks hold 62 percent or $481 million of the claims of all U.S. national banks on Panama. The six U.S. banks with the largest claims on Panama (of which at least four are State-chartered banks) hold 75 percent or $1,622 million of the claims of 20 large banks on Panama. Some of this country's largest banks do very little business in Panama. And 13 of the 20 largest national banks do no business with other foreign banks and 5 do no business in Panama at all.

The bank regulatory agencies also provided information on the claims on Panamanian residents with more than 1 year to maturity as a percentage of bank capital. Only two banks, both State banks, had claims on Panama equal to more than 10 percent of capital. When claims carrying the guarantee of a party outside Panama are excluded, no bank has loans over 1 year to maturity which exceed 4 percent of its capital. Thus the potential losses which any single bank could suffer in Panama if all loans to all nonguaranteed borrowers were in default are less than one-half the bank's single borrower limit. To put it differently, no bank is more heavily exposed in total claims with maturities over 1 year in Panama than it is authorized to be exposed to a single domestic corporate borrower.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, D.C., October 11, 1977.

HON. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN. I am pleased to respond to your letter of September 19 requesting information about U.S. bank claims on Panamanian residents.

Enclosed are four tables prepared by our staff which provide the information in question. These tables are derived from several different sources. Table 1 was prepared from data collected by the Federal Reserve as of year end 1976 from a group of approximately eighty U.S. banks; these data were published in a press release issued on June 3, 1977.

Tables 2, 3 and 4 were prepared from data as of mid-1977 collected in a new survey on bank exposure conducted by the Federal Reserve in cooperation with other bank supervisory authorities. Twenty large U.S. banks reported total claims on Panama amounting to $2.2 billion in this survey, compared with $2.8 billion of claims on Panama reported in the earlier survey noted above for a larger group of banks. Data collected in the new survey are still being processed by our staff and may be subject to further revision. If significant revisions should occur later in the course of the editing process, I will provide you with a revised set of tables.

Data in Table 3 have been combined into groups of three banks in order to preserve the confidentiality of data for individual banks.

I hope this information will be useful to your Committee. Please let me know if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR F. BURNS.

BALTIMORE SUN DISCUSSES COMMERCIAL IMPACT OF PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, one of the least discussed aspects of the Panama Canal treaties is the impact which those treaties will have upon the U.S. consumer, shipper, farmer, and jobholder.

The economics of the Panama Canal are complex. They can easily be unsettled by very minute readjustments of costs—costs which include not only canal tolls, but also costs in extended shipping time, uncertainty, and breakdowns. If the canal is closed, if the tolls are increased, or if the operation becomes inefficient or uncertain, then there will be an adverse multiplier effect throughout the U.S. economy, with some regions bearing the brunt in terms of jobs, hardships, and lower incomes.

It is already admitted that the terms of the treaties will require an immediate increase in tolls of at least 25 percent and more probably at least 40 percent. The exact amount and the projected impact will not be known until a formal study is completed in January. A study made in 1974 showed that the maximum practical increase in tolls at that time was 75 percent. Since then tolls have been increased 3 times amounting to a 50-percent increase. It seems clear that the current proposals will require a toll level substantially in excess of the 1974 limitation.

Mr. President, the Baltimore Sun, which is published in one of the Nation's leading port cities, is perhaps more sensitive to the realities of the waterborne commerce trade than other newspapers of note. Last Sunday, it published a major article on the commercial impact of the Panama Canal treaties written by Joseph S. Helewicz and James A. Rousmaniere, Jr. It is the first important review of these issues in the press that has come to my attention, and I recommend it to all of my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Baltimore Sun, entitled "The Panama Canal: Who'll pay the freight?", be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Oct. 23, 1977]

(By Joseph S. Helewicz and James A. Rousmaniere, Jr.)

The automobiles we drive. The fuels that heat our homes. The fruit we eat for breakfast. And the televisions which provide our entertainment.

Many of these products come through the Panama Canal. Lately, some of the producers of these goods, and some of the shippers who transported them, have begun to rethink ways of moving the products to us.

They are thinking of avoiding the canal—for economic reasons.

In all the brouhaha in recent months over the Panama Canal and its importance to national security, hardly any word has been said on what the treaty means to the movement of goods from wellhead and factory through the 50-mile canal to us, the consumers.

When the subject is discussed, it is almost always as a consequence of a political event: the closing of the canal. The assumption is that if the canal is not closed, commerce—all 120 million tons a year—will flow unabated through the system of locks and channel.

The economics of canal traffic is more complex than that. The immense commerce flowing through the isthmus has a different stake for everyone, and that includes the consumer.

Those stakes are vital—they involve business and money and jobs. Just how they will be affected is not clear at the moment.

Consumers, the ones who always get it in the end, do not know and they likely will remain in the dark as long as the economic issues are given short shrift.

Carter administration officials have done little to put the matter on the front burner. Their talk of the economic impact of the treaty has been on the order of a put-down.

For example, Sol M. Linowitz, the principal treaty negotiator, has been quoted as saying the canal is "economically obsolescent" to United States interests. And hardly any of the businesses which rely on the canal are stepping forward to challenge that line of thinking.

Yet in recent weeks, business interests such as those in the maritime industry and others have become critical and outspoken on the treaty, and more is on the horizon.

Some have stepped forward before, specifically to oppose toll increases set by the Panama Canal Company, a U.S. government unit. Predictably, some are complaining about tolls again. There is a difference this time around, however.

The principal outside economic consultant who is working on the treaty confided in an interview that he is having reservations, indeed grave concerns, over the ultimate impact of higher tolls at the canal.

The concerns may be hard to grasp. Toll rates for ships can range from $15,000 to $40,000 for each transit. At current rates, the toll's impact is comparatively miniscule.

The effective toll on the shipment of a 40-pound box of bananas is 8.2 cents; a ton of sugar has a toll cost of only 85 cents; a barrel of crude oil has a toll rate of 14.8 cents, hardly enough to show up at the grocery counter or the gas pumps.

Nevertheless, some industries are worried. Shippers of bulk products, such as grain and coal out of the country's heartland for delivery to East Asia, are concerned that tolls are already at the breaking point.

They fear that another increase, coming on top of three increases in the past few years, will make the canal an uneconomical route for shipping.

Further, they contend that once the Panamanians get full control of the canal, it will be difficult to predict the levels of rate increases in years to come.

Recently, some shipping interests have begun to look seriously for alternate ways to get their products from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and vice versa, in an effort to remain competitive. That means holding down the costs of getting the product to the consumer.

The producers of North Slope Alaskan oil, for instance, have begun an earnest drive to build a $500 million pipeline that will carry their crude from receiving terminals in California to refineries in Texas.

The pipeline, which is facing environmental opposition, is an alternative to shipping through the Panama Canal to the Gulf Coast.

In addition, steamship lines are experimenting with the Suez Canal as an alternative to using the Panama access to the lucrative South Pacific markets.

Shipping companies also are engaging in innovative combinations of rail and ship services to entice producers, like the billion-dollar European wine and liquor business, into shipping their goods through the Gulf Coast ports and the railroads to the West Coast, instead of through the canal.

Ecuador, one country which relies heavily on the canal for imports and exports, may be forced to relocate an entire market for one of its principal export products—the banana.

The country's low-profit banana export trade may not be able to swallow continued toll increases, economists say. Japan, it happens, is beginning to develop a taste for the fruit, so there is hope for the Ecuadorian plantations.

While this looking for alternative routes and markets is going on, few individual businesses are playing to the public with their concerns about the canal's future.

For example, instead of asking to testify in Washington on the treaty, some shipping executives have gone quietly to the federal negotiators to influence the course of bargaining.

These same interests have not asked to air their concerns before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which is holding hearings on the treaty issues.

A senior staff member of the committee said last week that he was "surprised" no commercial interests have stepped forward.

Two of the most elite business organizations in the United States, whose members presumably would benefit from happy neighbors to the South, have decided to avoid a public position.

The Business Roundtable, a group of 160 heads of the top companies in the country, decided against publicly supporting the treaty, though the group's leader and Carter confidant, Irving S. Shapiro, chairman of du Pont de Nemours & Co., individually asked members to voice support.

The Council of the Americas, a group of 230 industries which controls 90 per cent of private U.S. investment in Latin America, likewise has not taken a position on the current documents, and it may never do so, according to one source.

The business concerns over the treaty are varied. And so are the reasons for not going to a public forum with complaints.

Maritime executives, for example, have said privately that it would be poor timing to make a pitch to Congress for help. The industry, and specifically maritime labor, has been accused of attempting to buy members of Congress through campaign contributions.

There are other reasons why commercial interests have not spoken up:

Ely Brandes, an economist and consultant to the Panama Canal Company, who now is examining the treaty, attributed the silence to human failings.

"There are very few people in any line of business who have tried to face a problem before it came upon them."

For some industries, like the coffee traders, the impact of toll increases is insignificant. "It just one more nail (in the coffin)," said one disgruntled official of a major commodity importer.

William Merrill Whitman, retired secretary to the canal company, and treaty critic, said commercial interests "have been lulled into a feeling of security by the State Department, which wants to get the treaty through."

The whole discussion of the economic issue hinges on what tolls will be charged, and who will pay. Everyone agrees that tolls will increase, but the range of estimates is wide open.

Predictions run to a gradual 25 per cent increase through the end of the century, the view of treaty supporters, to more than 300 per cent, foreseen by the pact's harshest critics.

The canal, completed in 1914, operated for 60 years with no toll increases at all and has had only 3 in its history, all coming since 1974, when the waterway was losing money.

Some experts point out that those increases have had profound impacts on world markets, such as forcing producer to seek out new, and unanticipated, buyers.

For example, Peru used to ship large volumes of iron ore through the canal to East Coast steelmakers, but now it hardly ships any. Peru found it could not compete with ore from Venezuela, Liberia and Brazil, cargoes that do not have to be shipped through the canal.

Fortunately for Peru, it found a waiting Japanese market for its ore. An ironic twist is that the iron going to the Japanese is being made into steel that now is haunting American producers and their work forces.

The canal toll increases also served in part to create a new method of shipping cargoes from the Far East to the Midwest, via the West Coast.

Known as "mini-land bridge," ships and rails combine to carry products over the seas and over the Rockies. The service diverts shipments from the all-water canal route, as well as more expensive East Coast ports.

That is what toll increases have done in the past. As for the future, there is wideranging conjecture. In the flux of discussion, treaty critics have made mind-boggling estimates on toll increases and potential economic impacts.

Some of their statements have provided an illuminating look at how government officials involve themselves as commentators on complex issues.

For example, Richard C. Turner, the attorney general of Iowa who unsuccessfully filed suit to block the treaty, contends tolls will increase from 300 to 500 per cent.

"Iowa is the second-largest exporter of feed grains and soybeans in the United States," he said in an interview. "The toll increase is going to have a tremendous effect on us. It's going to price some of the farmers out of the market."

When asked where he got his percentage estimates, Mr. Turner said he read the figures in a newsletter circulated by Representative Neal Smith (D., Iowa), who served on a House Appropriations subcommittee that was looking into the costs of treaty negotiations.

An aide to Representative Smith said the legislator heard the estimate while on the subcommittee's trip to Panama a year ago. Mr. Smith did not pursue the matter. "It was just a projected fear," the aid said.

Another state attorney general, Evelle J. Younger of California, made a similar warning of economic disaster in a public release last month.

When pressed for supporting data on the warning, an aide could only reply, "Gee, I think he got that from a speech [Ronald] Reagan made. I'm not sure."

For its part, the Carter administration, which is pushing the treaty, has shed little light on the potential economic impact.

Farmers called to Washington in September by Bob S. Bergland, the Secretary of Agriculture, were told tolls might increase 25 per cent over the next 22 years.

Panama Canal Company sources, on the other hand, say tolls will increase immediately by as much as 40 per cent.

A State Department official said tolls would not be allowed to go "beyond the point of diminishing marginal returns."

That level is not now known, but Mr. Brandes, the consultant, says that level is nearly at hand.

The California-based economist said in an interview that he was heartened by signs that both sides on the treaty talks recognized that the canal can only produce so much revenue.

"Previous studies," he added, showed "that you can go four times up."

How far up can tolls go now? Mr. Brandes, who will complete a study on the matter early next year, is not sure. But he cautioned, "There's a danger. We're not very far from the point where we will get declining returns."

The steamship operators, the industry that stands to be affected most directly by canal toll increases, agrees with Mr. Brandes' line of thinking. They believe the tolls have hit the limit, but their ranks are split on how to address the issue.

Extreme friction between steamship operators who use the canal and those who ply other routes was played to its fullest at this month's meeting of the National Propeller Club, a major maritime trade group, which met in Galveston, Texas.

The group easily voted through resolutions for a bevy of federal subsidy programs, but when it came to the canal treaty, the best the members could do was pass a loosely worded resolution calling for construction of a second canal.

Port operators have been more assertive. The Gulf Ports Association, whose members rely heavily on the grain export business, appealed directly to President Carter to defer implementing the treaties.

The group's members are concerned that toll increases in the 30 percent range will price American farmers and exporters out of the international grain sales business and, thus, eliminate the fallout they get from the trade.

The fallout is substantial and varied: more business, stable employment and higher taxes to their communities.

Gulf port administrators say that countries like Canada and Australia, which will not have to contend with the economics of the Panama Canal, will be placed at a definite pricing advantage over American grain producers.

Meanwhile, the Association of American Port Authorities, which represents port operators in the entire Western Hemisphere, including Panama, expects to take some sort of position on the treaty at an upcoming meeting in Mexico City.

The group will have trouble reaching a unanimous position because it includes Canadians and Latin Americans who, unlike American port operators, are unwilling to commit themselves on what they view as a political issue.

American port operators are like everyone else in this debate. They cannot agree on the economic issues because those issues are so broad and perplexing.

One reason is that the forces of economics are so varied. But there is one undisputable economic fact of life: When costs rise, the consumer pays.

Consider this scenario. If the canal's tolls rise, or if the waterway is poorly operated, shipments could be diverted to other markets or routes.

It is a scenario in which one mode of transportation, waterborne shipping, would lose, along with the immense benefits associated with ports, ranging from substantial tax revenues to paychecks for longshoremen.

Competitors of steamship lines, such as the railroads, would win, becoming the beneficiaries of diverted business. In addition, traditional markets could fall by the wayside while new ones are created.

This is but one of many scenarios that make up the big picture of international commerce.

At the end, the consumer may ask: "Should I be concerned how my clock radio comes to me?"

Under the din of political debate over strategic controls, hemispheric influence and ownership rights, basic economic questions like this have not been asked. The economic ties—the delivery of products—are the closest ties individuals may have to the Panama Canal.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 19

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, one of the principal dangers which would face the United States should the Senate give its advice and consent to the proposed Panama Canal treaties is the possibility—indeed, the probability—that some future government in Panama would repudiate the treaties on grounds that the treaties had been negotiated by an illegal dictatorial regime not authorized to act on behalf of the Panamanian people. The argument would be that the acts of the overthrown dictator of Panama should not be allowed to bind the new legitimate Panamanian Government and hence that any previous actions taken by the dictator would be ultra vires and therefore voidable. A future government could well take the position, and with some justification I would think, that Dictator Torrijos was no more authorized to act on behalf of Panama than was the Frenchman Bunau-Varilla.

Of course, Mr. President, in my judgment Bunau-Varilla was the properly designated representative of the Government of Panama and the treaty of 1903 was legally ratified by the Constitutional Constituent Assembly of Panama even prior to ratification in the U.S. Senate, so I do believe that the treaty of 1903 is a binding document, but in the eyes or hindsight of many Panamanians, the treaty of 1903 was improperly procured. I am, therefore, only relating what I believe to be the likely opinion of Panamanians in future years with respect to any treaties which might be promulgated under the rule of the present military dictatorship.

But, Mr. President, the possibility of future Panamanian repudiation of these proposed treaties is not simply my speculation. On August 31 at a press conference held here in Washington, representatives of the Panamanian Committee for Human Rights made an emphatic statement. And something that does not exist down in Panama at the present time is, of course, human rights for the citizens of Panama. Representatives of the Panamanian Committee for Human Rights are outside Panama, of course, and they are seeking to influence the decisions of the Government there with respect to the granting of human rights to the people of that country.

This Committee on Human Rights stated emphatically that Omar Torrijos did not speak for the Panamanian people and if democratic institutions returned to Panama, no treaties negotiated by the dictator would be recognized as binding. That does not mean, Mr. President, that a future government would return to the status quo that existed at this time. That means that they being in control of the canal would keep the canal under such conditions as they set, certainly as to the right of the United States to defend the canal and the right of prior passage. They would not give the canal back. I do not mean that when I say they would repudiate the treaty, but they would take whatever they already had and seek to get a whole lot more.

These are the people who might well return to positions of authority should Dictator Torrijos be deposed.

Somewhere along the line these dictators fall by the wayside. They do not stay in forever. Some have long periods of prosperity and incumbency, but sooner or later the people catch up with them and they are deposed, and I predict that is what will happen to Torrijos unless he is undergirded by these treaties and the economic benefits that come to his regime from the tens of millions of dollars each year that would go into his coffers, some $70 million a year from the canal revenues.

Again, Mr. President, on October 11, Dr. Winston Robles, a leader of the Panamanian exile community in southern Florida, stated to the House Committee on International Relations, and I quote his statement:

All governments that come to power by force try to give legitimacy to their origins and legality to their malpractices. In 1972 Torrijos dictatorship called elections for a "Constitutional Assembly." With all political parties and activities proscribed, except the government party "Movimiento Nuevo Panama" and the "Partido Del Pueblo" (Moscow oriented communist party), and absolute control of newspapers, television and radio stations, it was not surprising that the government won 504 of the 505 carefully screened "representatives."

So if they could win 504 out of 505 representatives to the assembly it is quite obvious that they could have bettered the 2-to-1 ratio in favor of the Panama Canal treaties in the plebiscite that was held last Sunday in Panama. They saw fit to say that it was a 2-to-1 margin. Obviously if they had said, as they very well could have, that it was 100 to 1 that would make the U.S. Senate and the people of the United States skeptical of the bona fides of the election result.

So, they decreed that it was 2 to 1. They could just as easily had it 100 to 1. If it had been 100 to 1, it might have caused the Senate to look with some skepticism on the treaties, for if they were so heavily balanced in favor of Panama we might have a closer look, but if it were just a 2-to-1 margin in favor of the treaties it looks as if maybe Panama did not get such a good deal after all.

That apparently was the thought process of the dictatorial regime.

So, Mr. President, it is pretty clear that the norms of democracy observed in Panama represent nothing but a farce played to the world audience. It is crystal clear that these people in this constitutional assembly are solidly under the thumb of the gangster dictator and equally clear that they have little or no choice as to what course of action they collectively or individually choose to follow.

But, Mr. President, Dr. Robles continues to describe the actions taken in 1972 in Panama designed to give some semblance of legitimacy to the Torrijos dictatorship. He continues to describe this so-called constitutional assembly.

This selected, rather than elected, assembly held its first meeting October 1, 1972. A week later the "new constitution" was approved without discussion and the "constitutional assembly," even to the surprise of its members, found itself transformed into a "Legislative Assembly"—but one without power to legislate.

That is the type of government they have down there, showing it is completely under the thumb of the dictator. What we have here then, Mr. President, is a so-called constitutional assembly transformed into a legislative assembly which is something akin to a debating society with appointed members selected by the dictator but without any power to legislate. This unelected body was therefore established under a constitution designed primarily to uphold the facade of legitimacy while giving the substance of power to one man. But here is what Dr. Robles has to say:

The new constitution subordinates the legislative, executive, and judicial power to the National Guard. It eliminates the separation of powers and places the legislative power in a "Legislative Council" composed of the Cabinet Ministers and any number of members appointed by Torrijos. It also states that Torrijos is the "Maximum Leader."

Maximum leader, Mr. President. That means that power may be shared with appointed lackeys, but at the bottom line only one man decides. No separation of powers, Mr. President, and no power outside the dictatorship, for that matter. That points out the importance of our own Senate and House of Representatives insisting on maintenance of the powers delegated to each by the U.S. Constitution.

Here is what Dr. Robles has to say about the reason for going through the motions of adopting this unusual constitution:

The Constitution exists only for "cosmetic" reasons and does not impose in practice any limits to the use and abuse of the governmental powers. This concentration of dictatorial powers, without parallel in the constitutions of any other Latin American country, does not give, however, a complete idea of the real power that the dictator and the National Guard exercise. For example, the Article 29 of the Constitution prohibits expatriation, but several hundred Panamanians live in exile and are not allowed to return to their country.

So, Mr. President, these Panamanians who have managed to escape to a country where they are able to state their views without at least any immediate fear of reprisal have got a very low opinion of Dictator Torrijos and, consequently, an even lower opinion of the legal effect or validity of any treaty negotiated by him. I might add, Mr. President, that Dr. Robles' view is one that I also share inasmuch as I believe it to be inappropriate for the United States to enter into a treaty relation calling for partnership in the joint operation and defense of a strategic waterway with a government whose leaders are either criminals or the associates of criminals. Dr. Robles made the same point when he described life in Panama to the members of the House Committee on International Relations:

Today Panamanians live in constant fear. Telephones are tapped, mail intercepted, houses searched in the dark of night, people arbitrarily arrested, and the population intimidated by an organization of paid informers. This government, its officers and its friends are involved in all kinds of legal and illegal businesses. The involvement of high ranking officers in drug traffic is well known.

And I might say, Mr. President, that we have seen some hints of the extent of that involvement in previous discussions here on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere. Certainly the American people should be alerted to the character of this Government that the Department of State has seen fit to treat so handsomely and with such great deference.

Yet, Mr. President, much has been made in our own media here in Washington about this so-called plebiscite conducted on Sunday, October 23, in Panama, but listen to Dr. Robles' explanation of the legal effect of this plebiscite. And before quoting him, Mr. President, I would like to remind Senators that Dr. Robles is a lawyer of great international standing and certainly the foremost authority on the Panamanian Constitution. Here is Dr. Robles' analysis of the legal effect of the Panamanian plebiscite:

The Panama Constitution provides that any Canal Treaty must be "submitted" to a national plebiscite. However there is a confusion. The plebiscite does not have any binding effect because the power to approve a treaty belongs to the Assembly of District Representatives—(Article 141 of the Constitution). The plebiscite is an expedient to give the treaty the appearance of a popular approval. However, what kind of a plebiscite can be held without a free press, without freedom of assembly, and without freedom of thought and expression? What is the value of a plebiscite under the constant manipulation of information by the government-controlled press, radio, and television?

With questions like that being asked, Mr. President, this plebiscite then is not going to be a very solid foundation for a new treaty, at least not in the eyes of some subsequent, freely constituted, legal Panamanian Government.

Dr. Robles also points out that it does not really matter whether the plebiscite was conducted freely or not because, and I quote his remarks:

The plebiscite is a simple problem for the Panamanian government. It does not matter how many vote aye or nay. What matters is who is going to count the votes.

So the results of this plebiscite could very easily have been tailored, Mr. President, to achieve the best public impact. And public impact is pretty important to our Department of State. You know, Mr. President, the U.S. Embassy in Panama had a study prepared by a Mr. John L. Jackley, on the subject, "The Impact of the New Canal Treaty." In addition to much other advice, Mr. Jackley suggested to our diplomats the following:

A lot of good press would be essential for success: In this situation we could make good use of the controlled press situation of the isthmus. If it doesn't work, no propaganda would sell it. But it can be given at least an initial breath of promise through skillful manipulation of the available media.

So it has been recommended, Mr. President, to the Department of State that the controlled press down there in Panama be utilized to full advantage to rig the results of this plebiscite. And you know, Mr. President, for the best psychological impact here in the United States, they would not want a 100-percent vote—that would be too obvious; they would want a vote showing some significant opposition but overall strong approval—and that is about what we have gotten out of these results reported from Panama.

Mr. President, with the Department of State being advised "to make good use of the controlled press," certainly we ought to be able to understand the feelings of the Panamanians who wish to see their country free, and certainly we ought to be able to understand their feeling that any deal negotiated with Dictator Torrijos is not binding and is in itself a threat to the prospect that Panama will ever regain freedom.

Dr. Robles summarizes the situation in this fashion:

Panamanians do not want to replace a bad treaty with one that is going to be imposed with Torrijos playing the same role that Bunau-Varilla played in 1903. The new treaty does not solve "the causes of conflict" between the two countries. On the contrary, it adds a few new ones, as, I am sure, many members of Congress are aware. However in this ever-changing world, permanent does not mean eternal. Sooner or later the dictator will fall. Then the treaty is going to be rejected by Panamanians and their governments and all the resentment against the dictatorship will be reflected in the future relations between Panama and the United States.

And that is the bottom line, Mr. President. Sooner or later the dictator will fall, and sooner or later any treaties negotiated with the dictator would be by the Panamanian people completely and properly repudiated, and the United States will be blamed correctly for perpetuating a dictator whose time is already past.

PANAMA CAN'T OPERATE THE CANAL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, one of a number of questions which the Senate should consider in the Panama Canal debate is whether the Panamanian Government will remain friendly to the United States if control is transferred to that country.

Additionally, does that Government have the political strength or will to resist outside interference? Does Panama have the economic vitality to maintain and protect this vital waterway?

Ron Hendren, writing in the October 18 edition of the Greenville News, examines the lack of technological sophistication which makes a transfer of control to Panama highly questionable.

This lack of technology raises other questions. If the Panamanians are unable to cope with the complex operation of the canal, to whom will they turn? If to us, it will mean great outlays of cash. The only other great power to whom they could turn would be the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, the Ron Hendren column entitled "Panama Can't Operate Canal," which appeared in the October 18 edition of the Greenville News, is excellent reading in light of these concerns. In order to share this column with my colleagues, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

PANAMA CAN'T OPERATE CANAL

WASHINGTON.—In all the prolonged, impassioned debate over the Panama Canal, the one question that ought, over all others, to be answered has yet to be asked: Can the Panamanians run it?

The answer is no.

Not only could the Panamanians not run it today, there is serious question whether an intensive training campaign begun tomorrow would ready them for the task in time. For in all their years of living next door to the canal, and despite their sustained enthusiasm for reclaiming what they view with some justification to be rightfully theirs, our unhappy neighbors have demonstrated virtually no inclination or capacity to master the technology to operate the thing.

I said technology; perhaps art is a better word: It takes a dozen years to learn how to pilot a ship through the locks, a feat that has been compared to nursing a hot dog through a series of eyedroppers. Only a handful of men have mastered it, none of them Panamanians. And piloting is only one of more than a score of canal jobs requiring special skills obtainable only through a lifetime of dedicated apprenticeship.

For me, the history and politics of the canal pale in comparison to the importance of that present-day reality. Whether the trench is rightfully ours in perpetuity, whether we are there illegally, or whether, as Sen. S. I. Hayakawa (R-Calif.) put it, we stole it fair and square—all those are important considerations. We also need to know beyond doubt whether, if we leave, we will retain the right of unilateral military intervention, and whether our warships will receive preferential passage.

These are important questions that ought not even be asked until the Panamanians demonstrate as much enthusiasm for learning how to run the canal as they have for winning control of it.

To say no to that doesn't reflect politics, conservative or liberal. It's just plain common sense. Before those treaties are ratified—if they are ratified—there ought to be a clear, written understanding that we will not leave, nor be expected to do so, until we are satisfied that the Panamanians can operate the canal.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Time magazine associate editor, Edwin Warner, recently contributed an excellent piece concerning the Panama Canal treaties in the October 31, 1977, issue of Time.

In plain language, Mr. Warner poses the major questions about the Panama Canal treaties and what effect approval of the treaties would have. His responses to those questions are reasonable and succinct.

I believe this information will be of interest to my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that the questions-and-answers section of this Time essay be printed in the Record.

THAT TROUBLESOME PANAMA CANAL TREATY

(By Edwin Warner)

... Amid all the rhetorical smoke surrounding the canal treaty, people are understandably confused about the hard facts—and realities. Some key questions about the pact and what its approval would mean:

Q. How important is the Panama Canal for the U.S.?

A. Of course, it is still important, but not nearly so vital as it used to be. About 8 percent of U.S. international maritime trade passes through the waterway, much of it in non-American vessels. Some 4 percent of American coast-to-coast trade transits the canal, compared with 9 percent in 1964 and 50 percent in 1940. Few U.S. warships make the trip; the supercarriers are too big, and the nuclear submarines are vulnerable to detection and attack because they must be on the surface to make the crossing. Besides, the U.S. has maintained two virtually separate navies in the Atlantic and the Pacific since World War II. Strategic materials are increasingly transported across the country by rail and truck. While disruption of the canal would be troublesome for the U.S., it would be far from fatal.

Q. What claim does Panama have to the canal?

A. Historically, at least, not much of one. The U.S. will be ceding the canal to Panama but not "returning" it, since Panama never really possessed it. If anything, Colombia was the aggrieved party. With American connivance, Colombian rebels "liberated" the isthmus from the Bogota government in 1903 and turned the rights to build the canal over to the U.S. Panama and its canal came to life together; without the canal, Panama could scarcely exist as a viable nation. Canal revenues account for some 25 percent of Panama's gross national product, 20 percent of its employment and almost 40 percent of its foreign exchange earnings. Thanks to the canal, Panamanians have one of the highest per capita incomes of any nation in Latin America: a still very modest $1,060. In one sense, Panamanians can be grateful that America decided to build the canal.

Yet the present anomaly remains a small but proud nation cut in half by a huge waterway under the control of a foreign power. The arrangement may once have been economically justified, even a historical necessity, but it is a current indignity for Panamanians. As Venezuelan President Carlos Andres Perez Rodriguez told Carter: "The Panamanians feel exactly about the Canal Zone as North Americans would feel if the British owned the Mississippi River." In fact, Americans had much the same attitude as contemporary Panamanians when the Spanish and French (not the British) controlled the Mississippi at the turn of the 19th century. In 1956 America supported Egyptian sovereignty and condemned the British and French attempt to recover the Suez Canal. The U.S. has had too much experience with double standards in dealing with the Communist world to indulge in the same practice.

Q. Can Panama run the canal as well as the U.S.?

A. The American record is hard to beat. There have been remarkably few accidents or sinkings considering the amount of traffic. Yet there is no reason to assume that Panamanians cannot do as well; the Egyptians have learned to run the Suez Canal, which admittedly lacks the complex system of locks of the Panama Canal. Says a senior State Department official: "Nowhere is it written that you have to have a Georgia Tech degree to run the canal. The canal is damned important economically to the Panamanians. It is their only natural resource, and they will take care of it." Writes Vermont Royster, former editor of the Wall Street Journal: "For us, the canal is at most one adjunct to commerce and defense. For Panama, the canal is vital, the closing of the canal would be a disaster."

At the moment, Panama does not have the skilled manpower to take over the canal. But it has 23 years to train pilots, technicians and mechanics—a sufficient amount of time, one would think, since it takes a mere twelve years to train a brain surgeon. Panama has also said it would hire other nationals if there are not enough native citizens to do the job.

Q. Can the U.S. intervene militarily to protect the canal once Panama is in control?

A. No question has aroused more anxiety or opposition to the pact. Until 2000, the U.S. will control the canal and its military bases. After that the treaty states that the U.S. and Panama shall maintain the "neutrality" of the canal, a clause that seemed alarmingly vague to many people. When it became apparent that this concern was about to sink the treaty, Panama's head of state, General Omar Torrijos Herrera, went to Washington, and he and Carter issued a joint "statement of understanding." The "correct interpretation," they said, is that each country shall defend the canal against any aggressive act or other threat to its neutrality and shall make sure that it remains "open, secure and accessible." But the U.S. has no "right of intervention in the internal affairs of Panama." This seems to lead to a certain ambiguity. How can the U.S. defend the canal without somehow intruding in Panama's internal affairs? Treaty proponents admit the distinction is a fine one but think that it can be observed. The U.S. asks nothing more of Panama than a functioning canal.

The Carter-Torrijos understanding seemed to answer the question of intervention to almost everyone's satisfaction. Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd, who has not said how he stands on the treaty, described the understanding as "a very important diplomatic achievement and a big plus for the President and the treaty." Republican Senator Robert Dole, one of the pact's chief critics, called the joint statement a "step in the right direction," his most favorable remark to date.

The Carter-Torrijos understanding also cleared up another controversial point. The treaty gives both nations the right to send its warships through the canal "expeditiously." But how expeditiously? Panamanian officials, under fire from the left, insisted that U.S. vessels would be granted no special treatment. A number of U.S. Senators found that position unacceptable. The new statement specifies that warships of either country would be entitled to "expedited treatment" and, during emergencies, could go to "the head of the line of vessels."

Q. What if the U.S. fails to ratify the treaty?

A. The reaction in Latin America would be dramatic. Countries on the coast of Latin America that depend heavily on the canal—Peru, Ecuador, Venezuela—have privately advised the U.S. that they have some misgivings about eventual Panamanian control. But publicly they would doubtless join the rest of the continent in denouncing the U.S. for a breach of faith. Certainly the rejection would sour American relations with Latin America and intensify distrust and hostility.

Failure to ratify would also be a gift to America's worst enemies. Latin America's left wing opposes the pact because it ensures a U.S.-Panamanian partnership for the foreseeable future and, perhaps more important, because it eliminates a major source of antagonism between the U.S. and its southern neighbors. Notes the Buenos Aires Herald: "The Latin American left is clearly dismayed at the emergence of an agreement which may prove satisfactory to most Latin American opinion, ranging from the center left to the center right." If the Senate were to reject the pact, the Latin left would be able to say, "We told you so," and would probably gain adherents among disillusioned moderates. No right-winger in the U.S. is more fervent in his desire to see the treaty fail than is the Latin American left.

Q. If the U.S. does not ratify the treaty, can it protect the canal from violence?

A. Not very easily, say the people who should know: the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They believe it is in the national interest to cede control of the waterway. Acting alone, surrounded by a hostile population not only in Panama but in the rest of Latin America, the U.S. would need an estimated 100,000 troops to put down a determined guerrilla effort. And even that sizable a force could not seal off the waterway's lock mechanisms, dams and power plants from some kind of sabotage. A band of skilled terrorists, for example, could approach the Gatun Dam through the dense jungle with relative ease. Properly placed explosives could blow up the dam, drain the water that is required to operate the locks and put the whole canal out of commission for as long as two years. General George Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told Time Correspondent Jerry Hannifin: "If I were a guerrilla backed by Fidel Castro or somebody, I would just love those Panamanian jungles. They are better than even the jungles of Viet Nam. An organized guerrilla effort would cost us heavily. That is why we want the Panamanians on our side from scratch under the new treaties. We need them to help us." If the U.S. were forced to take some kind of military action to protect the canal in, say, the year 2027, it would be in a far stronger moral position if it had approved the treaty. Then it would be fighting on behalf of Panama, not against it.

The Panama Canal treaty is no historical accident, no caprice of idle statesmen. It has been twelve long, arduous, ruminative years in the making; it is an idea whose time has come—and whose time may be running out, given the objection to the treaty among many Latin Americans, especially in Panama. Strongman or not, Torrijos is faced with opposition, chiefly radicals who are considerably farther to the left than he is. If the treaty is not ratified, if trouble breaks out in Panama, it will be all the harder to draw up a subsequent pact in an atmosphere of mutual recriminations. Responsible citizens of both countries would look back on the present period as an opportunity that was tragically missed."

HOW CANAL TREATIES WOULD BENEFIT IOWA FARMERS

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, for the people of Iowa one of the most important questions concerning the proposed Panama Canal treaties is the impact those agreements would have on American agriculture, and in particular farm exports.

Recently the Des Moines Register published an analysis of this issue by one of Iowa's most respected commentators, Lauren Soth. Mr. Soth details the importance of the canal for agricultural exports and concludes that our agricultural interest calls for every reasonable foreign policy to keep that route open. That goal, he argues, requires that these treaties be ratified.

Mr. Soth also declares:

The surest way to close the canal and to put our farm exports under handicap, particularly in the growing Asian markets, is to try to hold control of the canal by force.

In view of the importance and timeliness of these facts for the people of Iowa and other agricultural states, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Mr. Soth's article be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

HOW CANAL TREATIES WOULD BENEFIT IOWA FARMERS

(By Lauren Soth)

Public opinion polls show large majorities of Americans opposed to Senate ratification of the Panama Canal treaties which have been signed by President Carter and Panama's ruler, Gen. Omar Torrijos.

The popular opposition to the treaties appears to be based on chauvinistic feelings about not giving up "our territory." It cannot be the result of serious thought about economic consequences.

The principal stake (practically the only stake) of the United States in the canal is its value for commercial shipping, especially for exports of agricultural products. The canal is vulnerable to sabotage or guerrilla attack. No treaty and no military guard can assure complete protection.

But it is evident from recent uprisings that continuing the U.S.-imposed one-sided arrangement on the canal would risk interruptions of traffic and destruction of the lock system.

American farmers have been expanding their markets in Asia tremendously in the last two decades. Japan now is the largest single country market for U.S. farm products. Of the total of around $23 billion of agricultural exports this year, about $8.5 billion will go to Asian markets, $4 billion to Japan. About 70 per cent of the U.S. farm commodities export to 15 markets in Asia last year passed through the Panama Canal.

One-fifth of all American agricultural exports last year were shipped through the canal.

The canal is particularly important to the big-volume trade in corn, soybeans and wheat. The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) reports that one-fifth of total corn exports moved through the canal, a fourth of soybean exports and nearly half of grain sorghum exports.

The proportion of wheat shipped that way is not so high, since the white wheat and hard spring wheat of the Northwest usually are shipped via Pacific coast ports. But much of the hard red winter wheat of the Great Plains goes through Panama.

The tolls for shipping through the canal will go up under the new treaties, but they would have to go up anyway because of higher operating costs—even if the U.S. could get away with its present low rate of payment to Panama (which it cannot). The tolls are expected to increase about 25 to 30 per cent under the new treaties. But this would add only about five per cent to the total shipping cost for most products going through the canal.

Of course, the higher shipping cost would apply to all canal users. The United States still would have a transportation cost advantage over Brazil in shipment of soybeans to Japan, for example. If the canal were closed to U.S. use, however, Brazil would have a 50-cent a bushel edge, since we'd have a longer haul around Cape Horn.

The Panama Canal is important to the United States for internal as well as international trade. Many bulk commodities shipped between eastern and western parts of the country go through the canal, including canned fruits and vegetables, citrus and dried fruits.

Several of the least thoughtful opponents of the treaties argue that the canal should remain in U.S. hands exclusively in order to assure use of this trade route for American farm products. That kind of reasoning is possible only for a Rip Van Winkle who has been asleep in the last 20 years and oblivious to the political trends in South America and to the riots in Panama.

The surest way to close the canal and to put our farm exports under handicap, particularly in the growing Asian markets, is to try to hold control of the canal by force.

Because of the energy situation, we will have to rebuild our railroad system in the next few years. This will make it feasible to move more products east and west by rail and perhaps permit greater exports of farm products to Asia from West Coast ports.

But the longer ship route, through the canal, undoubtedly will continue to be the cheapest way from the Midwest—and our agricultural interest calls for every reasonable foreign policy to keep that route open.

That seems to me to require the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 20

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in one of my earlier speeches to the Senate on the subject of the proposed Panama Canal treaties, I emphasized the fact that one of the major flaws of the proposed treaties, is that the new proposed treaties, rather than building on and modifying our existing treaty relationship with Panama, would wipe out that relationship in its entirety and would, in effect, start out completely anew. Now, certainly there are advantages in a fresh start in almost any project, and I would be the last to insist that it would be impossible to start anew in our dealings with Panama, but, Mr. President, if that course of action is to be followed, then much greater care must be given to preserving the substantive rights of the United States than has been given thus far in this new reordering of the structure of the bilateral rights and obligations now existing between the United States and the Republic of Panama.

But because we have had such close diplomatic ties with Panama since the formation of the Republic of Panama in 1903, in my judgment, regardless of the ultimate outcome, we would still make a grave error and would make our task unnecessarily difficult if we were to abolish in toto all existing treaties, protocols, executive agreements, exchanges of letters, and similar notes, memorandums or other documents bearing on the Panama Canal and on the close ties of the United States with Panama. However, Mr. President, near total abolition is exactly what is contemplated by these proposed treaties.

Article I of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty would in one stroke abrogate virtually every document of significance negotiated with Panama in the past 74 years. Article I would wipe out presumably both the good and the bad without discriminating between the two. Article I would, for example, wipe out the present monopoly the United States enjoys with respect to construction of any canal across the Isthmus of Panama and would leave the Soviet Union or any other third nation free to negotiate with Panama for rights to construct a new sea level canal, either within the present Canal Zone or at some other location in the isthmus. It would leave the Soviet Union or Cuba or some other third nation with which Panama might enjoy particularly cordial relations complete freedom to negotiate even for completion of the third locks canal now lying within the canal and initially worked on by the United States prior to World War II.

So, Mr. President, that is one example of an existing right of the United States which would be destroyed by this wholesale meat-ax abrogation of all existing significant treaty ties with Panama. But there are plenty of other rights now enjoyed by the United States which would be lost, presumably forever. Also among the many and valuable rights now enjoyed by the United States which would be destroyed with the implementation of article I is our present right to deny access to the canal to a belligerent vessel of war or any other vessel which is employed by a belligerent power as a transport or fleet auxiliary. The United States obtained this right in an agreement concluded in 1914 between Robert Lansing, then acting Secretary of State, and Eusebio A. Morales, Ambassador Plenipotentiary for Panama. A protocol of the agreement, the protocol of 1914, was signed at Washington on October 10, 1914, and entered into force on the same day. It is found at 38 Statutes at Large 2042. In pertinent part, Mr. President, the protocol reads as follows:

Hospitality extended in the waters of the Republic of Panama to a belligerent vessel of war or a vessel belligerent or neutral, whether armed or not, which is employed by a belligerent power as a transport or fleet auxiliary or in any other way for the direct purpose of prosecuting or aiding hostilities, whether by land or sea, shall serve to deprive such vessel of like hospitality in the Panama Canal Zone for a period of three months, and vice versa.

In other words, Mr. President, that is a very diplomatic way of saying simply that if either Panama or the United States decided not to allow the passage of a belligerent vessel of another nation, then that vessel had best go around the horn because it could be a 3-month wait for passage through the canal. In practical effect, the protocol of 1914 gives to the United States the right to forbid the passage of a vessel belonging to a nation at war with any other nation, and the rights set forth in the protocol, when coupled with the territorial interest of the United States in the Canal Zone, guarantee to the United States the legal authority to deny passage to a belligerent vessel belonging to a nation making war on the United States or on an American ally.

Without this protocol, Mr. President, or without the retention of territorial rights in Panama, the United States could find itself in the ridiculous position of having agreed, as a matter of international law pursuant to these proposed treaties, to permit the passage of warships of a nation attacking this country or of a nation invading an ally of this country. One can almost imagine the grim race which might be conducted by American warships and belligerent vessels of an enemy nation—a race which, if won by the United States, would perhaps entitle the United States to move to the head of the line of merchant vessels but which, in any event, if lost by the United States, would entitle the belligerent vessels equally to free and unimpeded passage through the isthmus. The war and the race could presumably be resumed on the other side.

Mr. President, that cited prospect is obviously farfetched and represents a fact situation which would be, in practice, almost inconceivable. But, Mr. President, the scenario I have described would be, nevertheless, completely permissible within the legal confines of these proposed treaties. Why not be more honest about the matter? Why not lay out on paper exactly what the position of the United States is? Why surrender rights vital to our national security interests while at the same time asserting that we could, through military might, secure the desired result? No, let us be candid with Panama and with ourselves.

We now have the right as a matter of international law to deny passage through the canal to belligerent vessels of other nations. What possible good can be achieved by setting up the legal fiction that the canal will always remain perfectly neutral and that even in time of a war in which the United States is itself participating, the canal will be available to ships of all nations?

I might point out, Mr. President, that should we in fact adhere at some future date to this legal fiction which would be set abroad in these proposed treaties—should we in fact adhere to the concept that we will guarantee the perfect neutrality of the canal itself in all circumstances—then the United States could find it necessary to tie down in the Caribbean and the Pacific military and naval forces, which might be better utilized elsewhere, solely in order that those forces could watch the approaches to the Panama Canal.

This argument is not new, and I recognize, Mr. President, that much has changed in naval strategy with the advent of nuclear weapons, but certain basic principles of warfare are going to remain immutable throughout the ages, and certainly in some later war, either conventional or nuclear, in which the United States or an ally of the United States unfortunately might become engaged, in some future unhappy day, we could well expect to see physical control of the Panama Canal as a significant military factor. Prior physical control is the key, because otherwise the United States could face the task of a Normandy-like invasion of the isthmus or the expense and danger of perpetual naval over-watch.

So, Mr. President, while we are worried here in the Senate about obtaining an amendment to these treaties to make clear that U.S. warships would have the right of priority passage through the canal, let us not overlook the broader issue of control of the canal during wartime, and let us not overlook this protocol of 1914 which would be quietly wiped out by article I of the proposed Canal Treaty. Let us instead consider protecting our rights to the canal in wartime, and let us consider direct incorporation of the protocol of 1914 into the body of the proposed Canal Treaty so that the protocol may continue in full force and effect in order to guarantee thereby to both Panama and the United States the right to deny effectively the hospitality of the waters of the Republic of Panama or the hospitality of the waters of the Panama Canal Zone to any belligerent vessel of any country. Let us maintain our rights within the legal text of our treaties with Panama and not through the threat of force of arms.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 21

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on Tuesday, I talked at some length about the repressive character of the Panamanian Government and the impropriety of propping up the current Panamanian dictator through Senate advice and consent to a new treaty relationship which would tend to perpetuate the dictator's regime and which would be rightfully subject to repudiation by a later legitimate Panamanian Government. I emphasized that subsequent repudiation of these proposed treaties by a legitimate Panamanian Government was not in the least conjectural, but was instead a matter of plain record, inasmuch as leading Panamanian exiles have already testified to the House Committee on International Relations that, after the downfall of Dictator Torrijos, these treaties would not be worth the paper on which they are written.

To refresh the memory of Senators on this point, I will quote again from the remarks made before the House committee by Dr. Winston Robles, the chief spokesman for the Panamanian exile community here in the United States. Dr. Robles stated the matter in this fashion:

Sooner or later the dictator will fall. Then the treaty is going to be rejected by Panamanians and their governments, and all the resentment against the dictatorship will be reflected in future relations between Panama and the United States.

Mr. President, Dr. Robles' remarks ought to be heeded. They foretell the great danger for the prospect of long-term friendship with the Republic of Panama and they foreshadow dire problems for the United States should Dictator Torrijos fall from power and thereby cease to be the guarantor of these treaties. The good will of Dictator Torrijos cannot be the linchpin of good relations with the people of Panama.

So, Mr. President, Dr. Robles' remarks ought to be taken into account. Since these treaties depend—and let us face the matter honestly—since these treaties depend only on the word of a small-time gangster dictator, will we not soon see a vested interest in guaranteeing that this same smalltime dictator remains in power, or that his successor regime remains in power, in perpetuity? Do we not run the risk of ratifying these treaties of becoming in perpetuity the champions of a repressive government, rather than the consistent and active proponents of human rights in Panama, in the United States, and in all countries? Certainly, even a casual student of these proposed treaty arrangements would recognize that the United States, after ratification of these treaties, would have a heavy stake in seeing continued the Torrijos dictatorship, since virtually every provision of significance does depend on the continuance in power of the military regime now dominating Panama.

This latter point has not been lost on commentators who have followed this debate. Last Friday, the Washington Star carried a particularly perceptive editorial by Charles Bartlett which was entitled, "The Case for Delay on Panama," Mr. Bartlett suggests a third alternative to ratification or rejection of the Panama Canal treaties. Of course, Mr. President, in my judgment, these treaties should be promptly rejected, out of hand and without embarrassment, because these treaties are so laden with substantive and technical defects as to make them unworthy of favorable action in the Senate and, indeed, except for the gravity of the situation, unworthy even of efforts to correct by amendment the many obvious errors and the even more numerous latent flaws. But, Mr. President, notwithstanding my own opinion on this subject, I do feel that the third option suggested by Mr. Bartlett should receive close scrutiny inasmuch as his suggestion would at least prevent the United States from assuming the role of guarantor of the Torrijos dictatorship, one of the most repressive regimes ever to govern a nation in the Western Hemisphere. Mr. Bartlett suggests simply that the Senate defer action on the Panama Canal treaties until Torrijos loosens his death grip on the people of Panama.

Mr. President, Charles Bartlett describes his idea—and this may well, indeed, also be the idea of others, including some members of the Senate—he describes his idea in this fashion:

This strategy contemplates a delay as long as the three years which preceded Senate approval of the 1936 treaty. It has its roots in varied doubts on the character and intentions of President Omar Torrijos.

Mr. Bartlett apparently feels that delayed action on the treaties could cause some semblance of basic human rights to be reestablished in Panama. I, for one, believe it will take more than a delay in ratification of these treaties to reestablish democracy in Panama, but perhaps delay would cause some steps in the right direction to be initiated. In reviewing the recent public relations offensive launched by Dictator Torrijos, Mr. Bartlett seems to doubt that any significant steps have in fact been taken by the dictator to improve human rights in Panama, and he notes that the so-called free debate which preceded the plebiscite held last Sunday "could be the start of a new era or a mere gesture to propitiate the U.S. Senate." Mr. Bartlett rightfully suspects this plebiscite was held strictly for stage effect here in the United States, and in further discussing the dim prospects for real progress in improving human rights in Panama, he goes on to point out the following:

The signs are not encouraging. Gerardo Gonzalez, the former Communist leader who is now Torrijos' vice president, has asserted in recent days that Panamanians would not have had a new treaty if they had persisted in "the farce which in the past they considered democracy." He termed elections "a complex and repudiated system" which divided Panamanians into groups.

So, Mr. President, the Vice President of Panama, Gerardo Gonzalez, a former Communist, is not impressed with an electoral process which tends to divide voters into groups—presumably into groups not enamored of Torrijos' pro-Marxist regime. Former Communist Gonzalez—I assume he is no longer a Communist because that is what Mr. Bartlett reports—former Communist Gonzalez would undoubtedly prefer to see these treaties promptly ratified here in the Senate without delay so that the pro-Marxist regime now in power can fully consolidate its authority on the cash and prestige thereby bestowed. This last factor is also noted by Mr. Bartlett, who describes the matter this way:

If the treaty is ratified and the government begins to draw the $80 million per year which it anticipates in tolls and fees, the regime will have no further need to consider democratization. The national guard, already badly corrupted in the top ranks, will be expanded to snuff out the last resistance to a left-wing dictatorship.

The great virtue of delay is that it will oblige Torrijos to show more of his hand. "I am one of the most radical of men," he has been saying in Europe. He has certainly been radical in visiting upon a small republic such authoritarian exotica as torture, forced expatriations and a blackout of free expression. Relentless greed is his only major shortcoming as a hardline Marxist.

Mr. Bartlett concludes with this thought:

A Marxist dictatorship would be a poor epitaph for the sage of America's role in Panama, and the best hope of avoiding it may be foot-dragging by the Senate.

Indeed, Mr. President, perpetuation of a Marxist, pro-Castro dictatorship in Panama is not a result many Members of the Senate, if any, would wish to see as our country's crowning achievement in the Isthmus of Panama, and I do, therefore, respectfully commend to my colleagues for active consideration Mr. Bartlett's thesis that prolonged delay—perhaps delay on the order of the Senate's wise and lengthy consideration of the genocide treaties—prolonged delay of that order might be the best method of stimulating Panama's political evolution toward freedom and might, additionally, be the best way of preserving the national security interests of the United States in this strategic and vital waterway.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion?

Mr. ALLEN. I am delighted to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I believe the Senator from Wyoming is ready to proceed under his order.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, first, let me compliment the distinguished Senator from Alabama for his very perceptive observations and comments this morning. I hope that Senators will take time to read in the Record what our good friend from Alabama has so succinctly observed this morning.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator.

FORMER PANAMANIAN PRESIDENT COMMENTS ON TREATIES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, a statement by former Panamanian President Arnulfo Arias, on the proposed Panama Canal Treaties, was recently brought to my attention. Dr. Arias, who now resides in exile in Florida, served as President of the Republic of Panama during 1940 to 1941, 1949 to 1951, and served 12 days of a third term before being ousted by Gen. Omar Torrijos in October 1968.

As one who had had a long and close association with both the domestic and foreign policies of Panama, Arnulfo Arias brings a unique perspective to the current treaty issue. His statement should be a part of the historical record on this matter. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the statement by Dr. Arias be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT FROM DR. ARNULFO ARIAS, LAST CONSTITUTIONAL PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA

First: On September 7, 1977 two treaty proposals were signed in Washington, by representatives of Panama and the United States after negotiations have been held for several years. The proposed treaties and their implementations were negotiated and signed at a most difficult time in Panamanian history, when there had not been and there are not, genuine democratic institutions, nor freedom of expression, nor basic inalienable rights of the citizenry. In such a manner that none of the political parties which represent the vast majority of the whole electorate have been involved in anyway whatsoever, directly or indirectly, in the negotiations or the signature of the drafts.

Furthermore the proposed treaties have in themselves developed a quite large area of misunderstandings, doubts and double interpretations in Panama as well as in the U.S.A. which invalidates them and makes them inadequate by the precedent it sets, besides the planting of tragic seeds of discord for the future.

Second: The treaty drafts do not take into consideration the vital interests of Panama, the U.S.A., and Latin America, and should therefore be rescinded. Firmly established trends of opinion are backing such clear judgment. In this way we will avoid an internal confrontation in both countries as well as between both nations.

Third: It is up to Panama to first reestablish the democratic process, all public freedoms, guarantees to the citizenry, the return of all political exiles and the full enjoyment of all human rights, and furthermore to bring the house to fiscal and economic order.

Fourth: Later, within a climate of progress and public faith in our future, return again to the negotiating table to obtain a just and equitable treaty for both countries since we are not in discord with one another and a special relationship binds us together in our mutual aims to protect the rights and aspirations of our people. We have the desire for a dignified cooperation and the responsibility to guarantee by all means a maritime passage for all people of the world.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: ENHANCED BY INFORMATION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, a recent Gallup survey indicates that "the more Americans know about the Panama Canal Treaties, the more likely they are to favor Senate ratification of the pact." The survey also showed, however, "a serious lack of knowledge about the treaties."

For both these reasons, the Senate's decision to postpone final action on the treaties until next year was well advised. I believe the American public, and perhaps even Members of the Senate, will benefit from additional time to learn about and study the Panama Canal Treaties.

This survey also asked people what they regarded as the best arguments for and against the treaties. The argument that the treaties would "remove the stigma of colonialism" was considered the strongest argument for ratification. To me, this means that many Americans agree that we cannot continue to use the Canal Zone as an American colony. The few remaining colonies are anachronisms in a world which has long since rejected colonialism as an acceptable form of government. By attempting to continue our control of the canal itself as an adjunct to a Canal Zone colony, we unnecessarily weaken our ability to maintain our right to use the canal. Moreover, colonialism is totally inconsistent with our national traditions and principles. Our Nation was born in the first major successful revolt against colonialism.

How can the United States—of all countries—defend colonial ownership anywhere in the world?

We did not build the canal to establish a colony: We built it to guarantee open access to the United States and the rest of the world of a transit between the Atlantic and Pacific. And we have efficiently operated the canal that way. Ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties would give us the right to defend the canal and to guarantee future world access to it while recognizing legitimate Panamanian national interests.

Mr. President, my colleagues may find interesting the full report of this Gallup survey on the Panama Canal Treaties which appeared in the Washington Post on October 23, 1977. I ask unanimous consent that this report be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CANAL TREATIES ARE ENHANCED BY INFORMATION

(By George Gallup)

PRINCETON, N.J.—The more Americans know about the Panama Canal treaties, the more likely they are to favor Senate ratification of the pact, lending support to President Carter's thesis.

When those surveyed who have not heard or read about the debate over the treaties (26 per cent) are given a brief description of the pact and are asked to vote on it, they vote it down by nearly a 2-to-1 ratio (39 to 23 percent with 38 per cent undecided).

However, when the results are limited to just those who have heard or read about the debate (74 per cent), opinion is more closely divided, with 48 per cent opposed, 40 per cent in favor, 12 per cent undecided.

Finally, the survey measured the views of the better informed. The informed are defined as those who can correctly answer three key questions about the pact: the year the canal is to be turned over to the Republic of Panama, whether or not the United States has the right to defend the canal against third-nation attacks and whether or not the biggest U.S. aircraft carriers and supertankers are able to use the canal.

The vote among this "better informed" group—the one person in 14 who can answer all three questions correctly—is 5 to 4 in favor of the treaties.

The survey reveals a serious lack of knowledge about the treaties, with about four in 10 Americans aware that the United States has the right to defend the canal, only about one in four aware that the canal is to be turned over in the year 2000 and only about one in seven aware that aircraft carriers and supertankers cannot use the canal.

The poll was taken between Sept. 30 and Oct. 3.

(Overall, the poll shows 36 per cent favoring the treaties, 46 per cent opposed and 19 per cent undecided, regardless of awareness of details of the treaties.)

(These results show a slight drop in approval from Gallup poll released in early September, when 39 per cent favored the treaties, 46 per cent were opposed and 15 per cent undecided. The earlier poll, however, was designed before the treaties were written and asked respondents their views based on a brief summary that stated, incorrectly, that the United States would "maintain control over the land and installations necessary to operate and defend the canal" after the turn of the century.)

Those who have heard or read about the debate were asked what they regard as the best arguments in favor of and against the treaties. Here are the responses, in order of frequency of mention:

BEST ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR

1. A good public relations move—remove stigma of colonialism.
2. Canal is not important to U.S. interests.
3. Maintaining canal is too expensive.
4. To avoid a conflict/prevent hostilities.
5. Not giving it totally away—we would be able to defend it against attack from third nation.
6. It belongs to the Panamanians—it's part of their land.

BEST ARGUMENTS AGAINST

1. U.S. has economic stake in canal.
2. U.S. should not pay them to take the canal.
3. Panama may not stick to terms of treaties.
4. They will soon keep us from using the canal at all.
5. Communists will take it over.
6. Canal is important to our national security.
7. We built and paid for it—we should keep it.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Nov. 1, 1977]

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 22

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the chair. Mr. President, on October 19, 1977, the subject of my Panama Canal talk—and I might say that was my 21st talk on this subject—was the visit to the White House made recently by Panamanian Dictator Omar Torrijos. I discussed in detail the lack of clarity in the unsigned joint communique issued at the conclusion of the dictator's visit, and I pointed out its failure to resolve any of the many ambiguities in the proposed Panama Canal treaties.

Specifically, Dictator Torrijos and President Carter had discussed the right of the United States to intervene in Panama to defend the canal after 1999 and the right of U.S. naval vessels to priority passage. As I explained in my remarks at that time, the so-called agreement reached by the two leaders has done virtually nothing to clarify existing ambiguities in both areas and, in fact, would further cloud both issues by introducing additional conflict in the separate interpretations of these treaty provisions by the two governments.

Of course, Mr. President, former Ambassador Linowitz and other administration spokesmen have either asserted or implied that the United States does have the right to intervene in Panama to protect the neutrality of the canal and that U.S. warships do have the right of priority transit of the Isthmus of Panama.

These assertions have been made, Mr. President, notwithstanding the words of the treaties which seem certainly to indicate otherwise. In other words, Mr. President, former Ambassador Linowitz and other proponents of the treaties have insisted that the treaties have a meaning which would be viewed favorably here in the Senate and which might be acceptable to the people of the United States, but, Mr. President, unfortunately for proponents of these treaties, the Panamanians have refused to lie low while the documents are being sold up here in the United States. The Panamanians have been quite frank in stating their interpretations. In fact, Mr. President, starting back in August—in fact, on August 10, 1977, and again on August 24, 1977—Panama's chief treaty negotiator, Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chose to publicize in Panama the exact limitations on the rights of the United States to take military action to protect the canal and to maintain its neutrality and on the rights of U.S. war vessels to priority passage. Fortunately, Dr. Escobar's remarks were subsequently made available to the Senate and have served to highlight the differing interpretations given to these very important defense provisions. Senators read with some amusement Dr. Escobar's rather indelicate comment:

If the gringos—

Referring to the United States—

If the gringos with their warships say, "I want to go through first," then that is their problem with the other ships.

Indicating that Dr. Escobar felt confident that we had no right of priority passage. That was not very diplomatic. Mr. President, but certainly clear in its meaning. Here we have expressed in no uncertain terms exactly how the Panamanians would view this so-called right of expeditious passage which has been trumpeted by certain of our treaty negotiators as a great diplomatic achievement. Similarly, Mr. President, we learned from Dr. Escobar's remarks—as early as August 10, 1977, back before we had even been told what was in the treaties—that Panama agreed to United States intervention to defend the canal only in the event such intervention was directed against “third countries”—not against Panama. We were even more baffled when we learned that former Ambassador Linowitz on the same day refused to comment on or to correct Dr. Escobar's assertion.

So, Mr. President, these differing interpretations, if indeed they are differing interpretations, have been in the works for some time now; in fact, these differences were quite evident even preceding the signing of the two treaties on September 7, 1977. But, Mr. President, when it later became obvious that the Senate would not allow the matter to be hazed over or swept under the rug, the proponents of the two treaties apparently thought that it would be wise to seek some clarification to allay the concerns of many of us here in the Senate, to assuage our feeling that the two documents ought to be capable of reasonable interpretation by reasonable men, to come up with the same interpretation and to persuade the citizens of the United States that these ambiguities would, in subsequent years, not be resolved in favor of the Panamanian interpretation with consequent disadvantages to our own national security. The unsigned clarifying document, however—and Senators, of course, know that this so-called agreement between Dictator Torrijos and President Carter was not signed—caused more problems than it solved and has thrown us into even deeper confusion in our attempts here in the Senate to ascertain the actual meaning of these truly mystifying provisions.

I regret to say, Mr. President, that a new element of further confusion has been gratuitously thrown into the brew by Dictator Torrijos. Apparently, Mr. President, a few days ago on October 21, 1977, Dictator Torrijos—in addition to again threatening the Senate in veiled terms with an armed attack on the canal should the Senate fail to ratify these treaties—in addition to that frequently heard threat, Torrijos in Panama made the following interesting comment giving his interpretation of the just-announced, unsigned communique. I quote what Torrijos said:

I don't want the canal unprotected but I don't want them (the Americans) to overprotect us to the point of interfering with our lives. I want to establish a system where we press a button here and a bell rings there when the attack is greater than our ability to handle it. I wouldn't say it's a right the U.S. has—I'd say they are obligated to come to the defense of the canal.

On these terms, we understood one another. Then we drew up in two minutes exactly what we wanted: You don't interfere in our internal matters, and leave me a button I can press in Panama, and then I want a loudspeaker at strategic command that they will hear when I do press the button.

So, Mr. President, this does not sound like much of a right we have obtained here in these treaties or in this subsequent so-called clarifying document. This is not much of a right if we are unable to take any action until a petty Marxist dictator elects to “press a button” to put American troops into action to look after his needs as he sees them. Not much of a right indeed, Mr. President.

In fact, on close analysis I would call this particular interpretation given by Dictator Torrijos an interpretation which would in practice impose an obligation on the United States to shore up his dictatorial regime rather than an interpretation which would grant to the United States, as I believe the majority of the Senate desires, a right to guarantee the neutrality of the canal with such appropriate military action as the United States, in accordance with its constitutional process, might itself unilaterally decide.

So we still have the question as to who reaches the decision for military presence by the United States. Torrijos says he is the man that presses the button, and that we do not have any right to determine when it is necessary for us to take action.

It is my contention that the United States should be allowed, at such times as it feels the canal is in danger, to have the right to send troops in to protect the canal.

The last thing, Mr. President, that I trust any of us would like to see given to Dictator Torrijos is the ability to "push a button" to commit U.S. troops to battle, and certainly, Mr. President, this is indeed a curious concession made to Torrijos if he does secure by these treaties the right to demand the presence of U.S. forces as it may suit his own interest, while the United States must wait idly by for the dictator's summons when the vital interests of the United States are being sacrificed to some yet-undisclosed Marxist project endangering the operation of the canal.

In other words, Torrijos sees the treaty and the unsigned agreement between him and President Carter as giving him the sole right to decide when American troops can come in to defend the canal, but he might be the aggressor himself. The Panamanians might decide to nationalize the canal, to take it over, and exclude U.S. shipping, U.S. warships. Naturally, he would not press a button, as he called it, to summon U.S. troops.

So we do not have any meeting of the minds yet, no matter how highly trumpeted the unsigned agreement.

What is going to happen, of course, is to amend the treaty, which I will get to in a moment.

Finally, Mr. President, in my judgment, the Senate ought to take note of the fact that the Panamanian plebescite for ratification of these treaties has already occurred. Naturally, therefore, there can be no binding legal effect given now to any extraneous signed executive agreement incorporating, or perhaps further clarifying, as they say, the so-called clarifying document already issued. Simply stated, a new signed executive agreement purporting to lay this matter to rest could have no binding legal effect since it would not have been in existence at the time of the Panamanian plebescite and since, therefore, the Panamanian people could not have been aware of its terms prior to their favorable vote for ratification.

Mr. President, the only way these questions can be resolved properly is for the Senate to undertake the duty of amending these treaties with precise language which sets forth exactly the rights of the United States, both with respect to priority passage for war vessels and as regards intervention to defend canal neutrality. Only by amendment and by subsequent renegotiation with Panama can the present impasse be resolved in a legally binding manner.

and in a manner which can form the basis for decent future relations with Panama. We cannot rely on the theory that might makes right. Our future rights must be clearly expressed if we are to avoid criticism in some future age for exerting power in excess of our internationally recognized legal authority. Additionally, Mr. President, only by precise amendment of these two provisions and of the many other ambiguous provisions found throughout both treaties—only by this careful process of amendment can the Senate discharge its full responsibility to the people of the United States to insure the complete protection of our vital national security interest in the Panama Canal and in any other strategic waterway which might be constructed between the two seas.

REPORT FROM PANAMA

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, article XI of the Panama Canal Treaty provides that the Republic of Panama shall gain full jurisdiction over the Canal Zone as soon as the treaty enters into force. It further provides for a complete transfer of U.S. judicial, administrative, and regulatory authority within 30 months, even though the administration is emphasizing a 23-year period in which this will occur.

In my opinion, these provisions will not constitute an orderly transition. As I indicated in my statement recently before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I believe there are very few American citizens who will remain in the Canal Zone, knowing they will be under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama. Large numbers may return to the United States, leaving a void in the manpower support of the operations of the canal.

Mr. President, in a recent article by Mr. Egon Tausch of the U.S. Industrial Council, he notes there are about 34,000 U.S. citizens living in the zone, most of whom are directly connected with canal operations. Mr. Tausch further notes that since 1974, when former Secretary of State Kissinger announced the joint statement of principles, resignations of U.S. citizens have increased by 60 percent. In addition, according to an informal poll of U.S. citizens about their plans, 67.8 percent said they would not consider remaining if the zone is turned over to the Republic of Panama.

Mr. President, I believe the administration and the negotiators on both sides have failed to take into account the very real possibility that, should jurisdiction of all U.S. judicial, administrative, and regulatory authority be transferred within 30 months, as provided for under the treaty, there may, in fact, be very few left to operate the canal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Mr. Tausch's article be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

REPORT FROM PANAMA: THE AMERICANS WHO OPERATE AMERICA'S CANAL

(By Egon Tausch)

(NOTE.—The author of this article is an author and attorney who spent his formative years in Latin America. Mr. Tausch served as an officer in Vietnam, taught at West Point, and has published in National Review and other journals. He recently visited the Panama Canal Zone to gather material for this report.)

One factor in the Panama Canal controversy which has been deliberately ignored by both the State Department and the media is the problem of the Canal Zone residents, or "Zonians."

There are about 34,000 U.S. citizens living in the Zone, most of whom are directly connected with Canal operations. It is a remarkably stable population, made up for the most part of children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren of Canal workers. Many have married Panamanians and others are naturalized U.S. citizens themselves. There is no labor-management dissension, unemployment, welfare, race issue, or crime problem in the Zone.

The Zone is not a duty assignment for its residents; it is their home which they have quite rightly believed would always be part of the United States. For obvious reasons, the State Department would like to forget about them.

Much has been made of the fact that the Canal will be turned over to Panama gradually; the Panamanians will not have full control until the year 2000. This has obscured the fact that the Zone itself, as distinct from the Canal, will be turned over within 30 days after the treaty is ratified. The Zonians have lived next door to the Panamanian police state and do not relish the thought of living under it. Their attitudes must be taken into consideration before ratifying the treaties: Any timetable for the transition to Panamanian control of the Canal depends entirely upon the willingness of Zonian employees to stay and work after the Zone is under the jurisdiction of the Guardia Nacional. If they won't, the Canal will close down quickly and disastrously, regardless of any agreements to the contrary that U.S. and Panamanian negotiators might have made.

The Zonians have no intention of being ignored. They were the victims of the 1964 riots, sporadic violent incidents since then, including the bombings of American automobiles in November, 1976, and harassment by the Panamanian Guardia Nacional and secret police.

Now they find themselves an embarrassment to the U.S. Embassy in Panama, which has refused to permit the rights of these American citizens to strain relations with the Panamanian dictatorship.

"When we go into Panama to use their airport—we aren't allowed to use our own military field anymore—and get detained by the Guardia, we're all alone," says Mrs. James Fulton, president of the Pacific Civic Council in the Zone. Patrolman William Drummond adds, "If we get into any kind of trouble, we now know better than to call on our own embassy. We call the British. They don't have to pretend we don't exist."

Drummond, president of the Police Union and legislative chairman of the Central Labor Union and Metal Trades Council, had his two automobiles bombed in the terrorist attacks of 1976. The incident was attributed to the G-2, the intelligence arm of the Panamanian secret police. The U.S. Embassy in Panama speculated publicly that Drummond might have bombed his own cars to gain sympathy for the plight of the Zonians, a charge proven false when the other bombs went off and the terrorist notes were discovered. The Embassy never apologized to Drummond.

On February 11, 1977 Drummond was arrested by the G-2 at the Panama airport when he was on his way to testify in Washington on union business. He was detained and questioned in downtown Panama City for three hours. His release was obtained only because the arrest was reported by the protocol officer from the embassy, who had happened to witness it. The Ambassador decided not to make a point of such arrests for fear of endangering the treaties.

Shortly before the negotiators completed the treaties they authorized Gov. H. R. Parfitt of the Canal Zone to release a list of fifteen "assurances" to U.S. citizens in the Zone—points that were to be in any proposed treaty.

Among them was the following assurance concerning criminal justice: "In connection with offenses arising from acts of omission punishable under the laws of the Republic of Panama, United States Citizen employees and their dependents will be entitled to specific charges, cross-examination of witnesses and legal representation of choice."

Also, the State Department announced, a status-of-forces agreement would be included in the treaty, which would permit U.S. civilians to be tried by their own courts as is done by the military in other foreign countries. These assurances were repeated by every level of government and were even incorporated into a Department of Defense directive to the military.

In reality, the State Department negotiators were aware that Torrijos had consistently refused to consider any such assurances. These clauses had already been omitted from the early draft treaty at Torrijos' insistence.

The final treaty gives all authority over criminal justice—procedural and substantive, crimes of commission and crimes of omission—directly to Torrijos, with no safeguards for U.S. citizens, other than the right to serve their sentences in America if Panama agrees at a later date.

In the face of his repeated failure to get Panamanian agreement on these points, Ambassador Bunker continues to push the treaties by promising that a status-of-forces agreement will be forthcoming, somehow.

The residents of the Canal Zone feel a personal sense of betrayal by the U.S. government. They can vote only in presidential general elections, so their interests are centered on one issue—foreign policy. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger was profoundly disliked in the Zone, and the last television debate between Carter and Ford led the Zonians to believe that Dr. Kissinger's policies would be reversed by a Democratic administration. The Zone went solidly for Jimmy Carter. Now the President's representatives encounter only hurt hostility from the residents.

The Zonians have held rallies protesting the proposed treaties. More than 2,600 appeared at the last one before the treaties were signed. If any Zonians favor the treaties, they have yet to speak out. Despite their expert knowledge of Canal operations and of conditions in the Zone, the residents have not been interviewed by the major U.S. news media. The Canal Public Information Office complains that it gives a representative list of Zonians to every reporter who calls on the office, but none bother to visit the locals.

Some of the American reporters have resorted to denouncing the Zonians' stilt bungalows and commissaries-without-discounts as "unfair" luxurious living. Unlike other Americans, the Zonians are expected by the press to live a Spartan existence, in return for the privilege of working on the Canal.

In actuality, the architecture and scenery of the Zone differs from that of Panama only in that it is kept clean and in good repair. The attack on Zonians is reflected in Time Magazine's report of a Canal pilot who "refuses to work for a dictator." The quote is preceded by the magazine's categorical opinion: "The Zonians' basic objections to the treaty range from chauvinistic to sentimental to mercenary."

State Department officials counter Zonian opposition to the treaties by calling the U.S. citizens "colonialists" or "racists," a charge which labor leader Drummond refers to as the last ditch effort of desperate bureaucrats. He, like many Zonians, is married to a Panamanian national.

Speculation about the evacuation of the Zone continues, without evidence of U.S. concern for keeping the Canal going.

Federal District Clerk Doris McClellan feels protective of her courthouse in the Zone. The daughter of Sen. John McClellan (D-Ark.) knows her way around Washington. "What right," she asks, "does the State Department have to abolish or give a federal court over to a foreign jurisdiction? We're under the Justice Department, not Foggy Bottom!" A Southern lady of the traditional mold, she gets angry when she envisions the future of her beloved courthouse under the rule of Gen. Torrijos and his henchmen of the Guardia. Indeed, the general will have little use for a court of justice within a governmental system which recognizes no civil rights whatever.

Miss McClellan is taking no chances with the historical honesty of the future occupiers of the Zone—she is sending all the deed records which prove ownership of the land, north for safekeeping.

Washington seems in no hurry to appoint a new federal judge for the Canal, making do with visiting judges in an obvious ploy to prepare for the turnover in case the treaties are ratified.

"What do they think they'd do with us? Send us home? Where is our home, if not here?" asks William Benny, a control house operator on the Canal. He and his wife were born in the Zone, and have no ties with other parts of the U.S. Benny will have to make his own plans for his family, and they won't be based on a timetable prepared in Washington.

The Governor of the Canal Zone and President of the Panama Canal Company is an Army general on leave of absence. The Zone Government and the Canal Company both operate under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Army. After completing his term, Gov. Parfitt will return to active duty, with a promotion if he hasn't made waves. He is prevented by his office from voicing Zonian complaints about the State Department or taking any position in regard to the proposed treaties. Nevertheless, his testimony before Congress during earlier hearings must have been unwelcome to those among his superiors who favor a gradual Panamanian takeover of the Canal.

Gov. Parfitt is painfully aware that the Canal must be closed if there are not enough U.S. employees who are willing to remain at a temporary job in a place that is no longer to be their home, under a repressive foreign regime, and with little or no support from their own embassy. The Governor testified that fear of the future was affecting the work force even before the treaty agreement was reached. Since the 1974 Kissinger announcement of the Joint Statement of Principles, resignations have increased by 60 percent.

"Although the number is not of such magnitude as to cause great concern, what we are concerned about is the trend—the fact that this could snowball and ultimately seriously affect our ability to perform the Canal's mission. * * * Prospective employees are wary in seeking employment with the Panama Canal when doubt exists as to the future security and tenure of their positions and the conditions which might prevail under a new treaty."

Even if other Americans were paid enough to induce them to move to Panama, they would require extensive training to become familiar with the 1910 technology of the Canal, simple as it is. And they would have to be integrated slowly into the regular workforce. If the treaties are ratified, there won't be a regular workforce to ease them in to.

The U.S. Civic Councils, organizations of Canal Zone community representatives, polled 285 U.S. citizens about their plans. 62.8% said that they would not consider remaining if the Zone is given to Panama. "Many of our people now tell us that 'the day that the Canal Zone Police go, we go,' and also, more alarmingly, 'when the U.S. workers see the day getting closer that jurisdiction will be handed to Panama, you can expect to see the Canal shut down.'"

The only labor trouble that the Canal ever faced was a "sick-out" in March of 1976, which was a response to rumors of a new Canal treaty. As the Civic Councils reported, "Morale at that time was extremely low; this year we have to say honestly that our people are so demoralized that they are ready to give up and quit—a shutdown of the Canal, if it occurs, will not happen over a labor issue. It will result from apprehensive employees, who in their fear for their physical security, will simply leave their jobsites, go home and pack their suitcase * * *"

"The trouble with the State Department," concludes Pat Fulton of the Pacific Civic Council, "is that they want a new treaty as a 'symbol'. But the Canal is a thing." Ideology and nationalism will not change the fact that if the Americans leave, the Canal will be dependent on Panamanian mechanical skills.

The Canal mechanism is simple, but it requires upkeep. There is no regular maintenance system in Panama. Pride is based on acquisition; maintenance is work performed for no visible result. The elaborate daily lake dredging and cleaning and lubricating procedures employed on the Canal are objects of amazement, and sometimes derision, among Panamanian visitors.

For years the United States has given preference in hiring, training, and promotion to Panamanian nationals. At the present time only two of the ship pilots are Panamanians, and not many others of that nationality have risen above menial labor positions. Far fewer than the quota provided for by the program apply for training; fewer still complete it.

Recently the United States acceded to Panamanian requests and gave up control of Bayano Dam, a source of energy and a necessary control valve on the lake which supplies the locks with water. The daily inspections of the dam ceased immediately after Panama took possession. Within a few months the dam became inoperable. Torrijos could find no Panamanians with the knowledge and skills to repair it and was forced to fly in a team of Yugoslavian engineers and mechanics. Since the repair of the dam, new cracks have appeared.

Panama has never conquered the problems of mechanical and administrative efficiency. The garbage collection system in Panama City is practically nonexistent; heaps of refuse rot in the tropical sun. Modern buildings have no hot water systems built in. Torrijos bought a new fleet of buses from Germany, but made no arrangements for mechanics or replacement parts. A year later, less than one-third of the buses were still running; the others were cannibalized for their parts and the bodies left abandoned along the streets.

The treaty negotiators could not entirely ignore the possibility of Zonian flight and the lack of skilled Panamanians to replace the American employees.

Consequently, the U.S. Embassy in Panama contracted the services of Mr. John L. Jackle to do a study of the impact of a new treaty on Canal Zone residents and how they might be convinced of its benefits. The political branch of the embassy worked with Mr. Jackle. The final report indicates that the methods of the Panamanian dictatorship are not completely alien to the State Department: "a lot of good press would be essential for success: in this situation we would make good use of the controlled press situation on the Isthmus. If it does not work, no propaganda will sell it. But it can be given at least an initial breath of promise through skillful manipulations of the available media."

Later the report adds, " * * * we would have to work closely with the Government of Panama to insure that their share of the participation would be handled with our goals in mind. We would not want a Government of Panama speaker who is going to rant about how glorious Panama's demands are; we would want someone who could communicate on a low-key level and who would be very reassuring."

Even such sophisticated Madison Avenue techniques might not work with Bill McConaughy, Senior Control House Operator and a highly respected mechanic. McConaughy has worked on the Canal all his adult life, as have his two brothers, their father, their grandfather, and their great grandfather, who helped build the Canal and whose Theodore Roosevelt Medal the descendants treasure. Bill's pride in the Canal is second only to his pride in America for having created it.

"Short of working on the Moonshot there's nothing I'd be prouder to do than what I'm doing here. We feel that way, and it doesn't wear off with time." After thinking a moment, he adds, slowly, "As long as the Canal is American."

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 23

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, having used most of my time, I ask unanimous consent that my 23d speech on the Panama Canal, 21 of the others having been delivered on the floor, and I believe 1 inserted in the Record—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Alabama would like to have some additional time on his speech, I will be glad to yield to him on my time.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator. I do not believe it will be necessary.

I ask unanimous consent that my 23d speech be printed in the Record as if delivered on the floor, and I do call attention to the fact that 21 of these speeches have been delivered.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator's speech will be inserted in the Record.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on Thursday, October 13, 1977, I addressed the Senate on the subject of a report in the Washington Star that the Department of Justice had confirmed the existence of a sealed narcotics indictment in the eastern district of New York against Moises Torrijos, brother of the Panamanian dictator, Omar Torrijos. At that time, I went into some detail in describing the events in 1971 which appear to have led to the indictment of Moises Torrijos sometime during the year 1972, and I noted—as have others—the peculiar fact that Moises Torrijos found it inconvenient to come to the United States for the gala signing of the proposed Panama Canal treaties, notwithstanding his brother's position as Panamanian Chief of State or his own governmental positions as an Ambassador and as the current Panamanian information officer for the proposed canal treaties. More particularly, I expressed my own continuing concern that the U.S. Department of Justice may not be pursuing vigorously the prosecution of Moises Torrijos because of political considerations.

Now, Mr. President, the purpose of a sealed indictment is to keep secret from the person indicted the fact that he is under indictment until such time as the individual is within the jurisdiction of the State seeking his prosecution. But, Mr. President, once the existence of an indictment has become a matter of public knowledge and indeed once the person indicted is personally aware of the fact of his indictment, there is absolutely no good purpose served by continuing to cloak in a veil of secrecy the specifics of the offenses charged.

So, I would hope that the Attorney General will soon see fit to unseal this secret, sealed indictment against Moises Torrijos so that the American people can be made aware of the detailed charges made against him. The American people have very properly been made aware in great detail of the charges made against Tongsun Park, and certainly the same standards should apply in this particular case. So I would hope that the indictment against Moises Torrijos will be made public, either by the Department of Justice or by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York, and I would hope that it would not be necessary for interested parties to petition the court for information on this subject which should be of great interest to the citizens of the United States.

Certainly, Mr. President, no claim could now be made that Moises Torrijos is unaware of his indictment inasmuch as that fact has been widely reported here in the United States and, I might add, Mr. President, because presumably Moises Torrijos has known of this indictment for some time—in fact, has probably known of this indictment from a time very soon after it was handed down by the grand jury there in the eastern district of New York. So, Moises Torrijos knows of this indictment and very probably knows of the details of this indictment. Yet, the American people have been kept in the dark. And I do feel that this is a subject about which the people of this country should be advised inasmuch as this subject does appear to touch on the conduct of high government officials of a government with which the United States would jointly operate and defend this vital national asset, the Panama Canal.

You know, Mr. President, the year following the negotiation of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1903, our Government took the prudent step of negotiating with Panama a document entitled "A Treaty for the Mutual Extradition of Criminals." This Extradition Treaty of 1904 provides the mechanism for the extradition of persons charged with or convicted of certain specific enumerated crimes.

Mr. President, we do not know the details of the charges against Moises Torrijos, so it is difficult to determine from reading the language of the Extradition Treaty of 1904 whether that treaty would provide for extradition of Moises Torrijos to the United States. But we do not have the same problem here that we have in the case of Tongsun Park because we do at least have an extradition treaty with Panama for the extradition of criminals, and we do not have a treaty with South Korea for that purpose.

But, Mr. President, the Department of Justice has not seen fit to exercise the rights of the United States under this treaty of 1904 to seek the extradition of Moises Torrijos. So it must follow that the crime or offense charged against him is not one of the crimes or offenses enumerated in the extradition treaty. And indeed, Mr. President, if you do examine the treaty of 1904 in detail, as I have done and as I am sure many other Members of the Senate have done since this case came to light, you will find that among the 13 categories of crimes enumerated in the extradition treaty, the treaty does not cover trafficking in drugs.

I suppose, Mr. President, that the reason for that omission is relatively simple. In 1904, the United States was not beset by the problems and the tragedies generated by and associated with the lives and activities of some 400,000 heroin addicts. In 1904, it was possible to walk the streets of Washington, D.C., or New York City late at night without fear of violent attack by a heroin addict desperate to obtain the means to support his deadly habit. In 1904 the suicide rate among teenagers was not escalating by a factor of 300 percent as it has done in the United States over the past decade, nor in 1904 were significant numbers of soldiers and sailors in the Army and navy subverted and destroyed by addiction to hard narcotics. So in 1904 our negotiators did not give extradition for trafficking in drugs very high priority.

But this, Mr. President is not 1904; this is 1977, and our country continues to lose ground in its grim and unsuccessful struggle against the drug trade. This is 1977, Mr. President, and our country continues to see the fabric of its society rent by the venality of drug profiteers.

Some elitist leaders of oppressed foreign populations might assert that drug addiction is a problem confined to ghettos and, therefore, not a problem worthy of serious attention or significant moral concern. But, Mr. President, the horror of a death from addiction to heroin, the horror of drug-motivated violent crime cannot be dismissed on those false grounds by the people's representatives in the Congress of the United States. Our duty is to strike against this disease at every opportunity.

In 1971 and 1972, the Subcommittee on the Panama Canal of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries conducted a careful investigation of drug trafficking in the Republic of Panama. A briefing at that time given to the subcommittee by the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs contained the following information:

Panama is one of the most significant countries for the transshipment of narcotic drugs to the United States. Its geographic location facilitates the illicit traffic because it is a terminus for air and sea transport. Additionally, domestic and international telecon facilities are well developed. The significance of Panama is evidenced by the fact that during the past twelve months, 641 pounds of heroin were seized in the United States which had transited through Panama. This 641 pounds consists of only four single seizures and does not include seizures of less than 100 pounds.

I regret to report, Mr. President, that my own study of this subject indicates to me that little, if anything, has changed since the time that information was provided. But to illustrate the magnitude of the problem, Mr. President, I should also quote the following passage from this same report of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs:

It is clear that the Republic of Panama has not and is not paying sufficient attention to narcotic enforcement activities to achieve notable results. This may be due to high level apathy, ignorance and/or collusion.

So, Mr. President, this matter of the involvement of high Panamanian officials in trafficking in heroin has, therefore, been the subject of official concern for some time, and the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, which is now the Drug Enforcement Administration, was seeking without much success as far back as 1971 to obtain the full cooperation of the Government of Panama in rooting out these wrongdoers who were and are creating such enormous suffering here in the United States.

As early as September of 1971, the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs was conducting narcotics information training for the members of the Panamanian Central Narcotics Unit, and before the end of 1971 the Bureau had extradition treaty to include drug violations. Unfortunately, Mr. President, that agreement to examine the feasibility of an extradition treaty for drug offenses had about as much effect as would this agreement in these proposed treaties to examine the feasibility of a sea level canal. In other words, Mr. President, they agreed to study the feasibility of extraditing drug offenders, and they did not agree to anything else.

And now it is 1977, and in spite of intense diplomatic negotiations on every imaginable subject, we still have no treaty for the extradition of drug traffickers, not that anyone should be particularly surprised inasmuch as the brother of the Maximum Leader down there would presumably be one of the first to be extradited. So we are not surprised, Mr. President, but many of us are outraged because we in the United States still have the problem of 400,000 heroin addicts being fed on heroin funneled through Panama.

Mr. President, even though the negotiators for the United States do not seem to have given this subject a second thought, the negotiators for the Republic of Panama were concerned—very concerned—about treaty provisions affecting jurisdiction of offenses involving trafficking in drugs. In fact, Mr. President, the negotiators for the Republic of Panama were so concerned about the treatment of drug offenses and the jurisdiction of Panama over drug offenders that they insisted that Panama be given in the proposed Panama Canal Treaty primary jurisdiction for all crimes involving the trafficking of drugs even within what is now the Panama Canal Zone and even if the offender were a U.S. national.

This specific assertion of jurisdiction of offenses involving trafficking in drugs is set forth in article XIX of the executive agreement in implementation of article III of the Panama Canal treaty, and it is also set forth, with respect to military personnel, in article VI of the executive agreement in implementation of article IV of the treaty. In both cases, it is also clearly specified that an individual charged by U.S. authorities with trafficking in drugs must be handed over to Panamanian authorities upon their request.

I am sure all Senators share my hope that Panama is insisting on jurisdiction over crimes involving trafficking in drugs out of a genuine desire to suppress the drug trade rather than from the more base motives which might be inferred from some of the revelations of the past weeks and months, but the point is, Mr. President, no provision whatsoever in these proposed treaties is made for the extradition of drug offenders who are sought by the United States and who have obtained refuge in Panama. This omission has occurred notwithstanding the many thousands of Panamanians residing in the United States who travel frequently between the two countries, this omission has occurred notwithstanding also the many U.S. citizens with dual Panamanian citizenship, and this omission has occurred notwithstanding the fact that as far back as 1971 the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs obtained the agreement of the Government of Panama to examine the feasibility of obtaining drug offense extradition rights—notwithstanding all these factors, our negotiators have not provided in these proposed treaties for this important extradition provision.

As I have often noted, Mr. President, I can see virtually nothing in these treaties which accrues to the benefit of the United States. Why, at least, could we not have obtained the right to extradite drug offenders who are charged with violating our laws and who are found in the Republic of Panama? After proposing to give to Panama one of our most valued national assets and after proposing to pay to Panama several billion dollars for taking the gift, I do find it more than passing strange that we could not even obtain an agreement from Panama that narcotics offenders could be extradited.

So, Mr. President, I hope we can rectify this shortcoming. I propose to amend the pending Panama Canal treaty to provide for the mutual extradition of persons charged with or convicted of trafficking in drugs. I have prepared this amendment as one of a series of amendments I intend to propose to correct the errors and omissions of our negotiators. Mr. President, I have prepared this amendment for introduction because I believe this amendment, when considered in the Senate, will bring into focus a problem of massive proportion which must be addressed and solved before any new agreement can be entered into with Panama in which it is provided that the United States and Panama will jointly operate and defend the vital Panama Canal.

The proposed amendment, along with the other amendments I intend to offer, will of course be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, chaired by my distinguished senior colleague, Senator John Sparkman. I know that the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations will give this amendment together with all others very serious and very careful consideration, and knowing that fact I respectfully suggest to the distinguished chairman of the committee that hearings on this amendment might aid in surfacing information for the committee to enable its members to assess accurately the need for its adoption. In my judgment, this amendment is clearly needed, other amendments are clearly needed, and I hope that these needed amendments will receive the full support and backing of Senators who recognize that the Senate must assume responsibility for putting into these treaties what the Department of State has left out and for taking from these treaties the many provisions negotiated by the Department of State which do violence to our national interest.

I thank the Chair, and yield back the remainder of my time.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: THE BEST ANSWER

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, we originally built the Panama Canal to assure open access for the United States and the rest of the world to a passage between the Atlantic and Pacific. I support ratification of the treaties because I believe they represent the best method of protecting this open access which is so important to our economic interests and our national security.

I know many Americans, including Members of the Senate, are either opposed at this time to ratification, or remain undecided. To those who oppose the treaties or who are in serious doubt, I submit that there are at least three concerns which must be resolved in order to support the proposition that we not ratify the new Panama Canal treaties. These issues are of great concern to me because they each pertain to a serious threat to an assured free and open passage between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

First, it appears that the chief opponents to the Panama Canal treaties outside the United States are Communists, Castroites, and leftwing radicals. This is particularly true in Panama, where the Castroites and leftwing radicals led the fight against the approval of the treaties in the Panamanian plebiscite. Does not the fact that the most strongly anti-U.S. elements in Panama are the most strongly opposed to the treaties suggest that the treaties are in our best interests?

Second, under the Panama Canal treaties the United States has the exclusive right to develop with Panama a sea-level canal anywhere in the country of Panama. The feasibility study on the question of a sea-level canal completed in 1970 found that the two most suitable routes for such a canal were both in Panama—one 10 miles from the present Canal and the other the canal itself. If the treaties are not ratified, what is to prevent the Japanese, with their engineering expertise, and the Arabs, with oil dollars, from joining hands to build a sea-level canal elsewhere in Panama to the exclusion of the United States? Or, what if the Soviet Union were to join in such an enterprise with the Panamanians? Under article XII of the treaties, the United States has the security of knowing that no foreign power, whether hostile or friendly, will build or control a sea-level canal in Panama.

Third, while the Panama Canal would not have been built without the ingenuity, leadership, and sweat of the United States, the Panamanians believe that Panama belongs to the Panamanians and that the canal is on Panamanian soil, or that, at the very least, the canal physically divides their country and that their country must be united. If the treaties are not ratified, this Panamanian nationalism may well result in efforts—not led by the Panamanian Government, but by antigovernment and Communist forces—to sabotage the canal in guerrilla activity which could escalate into a military conflict. Ratifying the treaties offers far greater assurances that we can avoid this result, while guaranteeing forever the right of the United States to defend the Canal. If the treaties are not ratified, how many American troops and how many American lives should be expended to defend the canal against what Panamanians deem to be Panamanian national self-interest?

It seems to me that to pose these three concerns is really to answer them.

First, it is in the best interests of the United States to ratify the treaties. The Castroites and left-wing radicals know this even if some of us feel bound by our historic past to the exclusion of recognizing our own present self-interest.

Second, the United States needs and must retain the exclusive right to develop with Panama a sea-level canal anywhere in that country.

Third, it is unrealistic to expect Panama to accept the physical division of its country. We would never accept such a presence by a foreign power bisecting the United States.

Thus how do we further our own best interests in a free and accessible Panama Canal while maintaining the right to defend the canal and our own right to preferential passage in time of emergency?

By agreeing with our opponents and enemies that the treaties should not be ratified? By abandoning to foreign powers the right to build a competitive sealevel canal? By committing American troops and lives to an effort to suppress Panamanian nationalism?

No, none of these.

I submit that the best answer at this time is ratification of the Panama Canal treaties, thereby guaranteeing forever a free and open Panama Canal under the protective umbrella of our Armed Forces. The treaties are the best available assurance of continued unfettered and fair access to the canal by the world and for the United States, while protecting and maintaining all the legitimate interests of the United States in the Panama Canal.

THE PANAMA CANAL GIVEAWAY

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, a distinguished Kentuckian and good friend of mine, Judge Guthrie Crowe, recently provided me with a long and thoughtful essay on why the United States should not relinquish control of the Panama Canal.

Judge Crowe recently completed a 25-year tenure as Federal district court judge for the Canal Zone, a position he had held since his appointment in July 1952 by President Harry Truman.

Judge Crowe is a native of LaGrange, Ky. He is a lawyer and a former member of the Kentucky House of Representatives. He was the first commander of the Kentucky State Police, a department which was organized under his direction.

I have the highest respect for Judge Crowe and feel that my colleagues would benefit from reading his views on the Panama Canal Treaties. I ask unanimous consent that this article by Judge Crowe be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL GIVEAWAY

(By Guthrie Crowe)

OPENING

In my job as Judge, I had a ringside seat at the struggle by Panama for the Panama Canal. In fact, I had to try some cases and rule upon some matters that arose out of the problems between the U.S. and Panama.

A new treaty or treaties have been drafted as a result of the pressure from Panama, the U.S. Department of State, American banks and corporations like the 220 or more U.S. firms doing business in Latin America that have organized the Council of the Americas. Sympathy for the Third World also enters into the picture, for this is the era of the dissolution of the empires of the West and the U.S. position there has been stamped with the stench of colonialism.

The charge of colonialism is completely false, but it is like the communist lie: If you say it often enough, it will be believed.

The U.S. occupation of the Canal Zone is anything but colonialistic. There is no private ownership of real estate. The sole purpose to which the Zone is devoted is the operation of the canal. The U.S. citizens and all others who work there are required to leave the Zone upon retirement. The only private enterprise permitted has to do with shipping, except for a few limited services for the physical and spiritual welfare of the workers. There are churches, YMCA's, 3 or 4 dentists, tailors and shoe repairmen and private clubs, but nothing else. These services are strictly controlled by the C.Z. Government and have rental agreements or land leases that can be terminated by the Governor at will. Congress made one exception in that it granted to the Sojourners' Masonic Lodge in Cristobal, title to the land on which its lodge building stands.

The Zone was not acquired by invasion as was the wont of the governments that participated in empire building, but it was bought and paid for and our entry was at the behest of the people of Panama who looked upon the Americans as saviors who could wrest victory out of the French failure and would do as has been done—give to Panama a flood of gold, employment and success that she so desired.

Presently, the two-headed complex entitled the Canal Zone Government and the Panama Canal Company which own and operate the canal and the zone, employ about 3,500 Americans and about 12,000 Panamanians. The Panamanian employees receive excellent wages and are participants in U.S. retirement programs. It has been the policy for years for these entities to give preference to Panamanians in employment in all but certain security jobs, although most of the top jobs are held by Americans because of their technical expertise and seniority.

Careful studies show that millions of U.S. dollars flow into the economy of Panama annually from the relationship and the U.S. is a very benign and helpful partner. Our military also spends millions of dollars there and employs many Panamanians in posts of responsibility and good pay. These employees are like all people in that they are organized and make additional demands for better pay and working conditions but, generally speaking, they are contented and know full well that when Panama gets control, they may lose their jobs and those that are retained will be kept at a lower wage and with the loss of other benefits.

Panama's money is backed by the U.S. and is kept on a parity with the U.S. dollar and she has over seventy banks in Panama City that deal in international exchange. Recently, there has been a great deal of construction and the faces of her cities have changed markedly and belie the assertion that Panama is the victim of U.S. colonialism and that we have appropriated from her her greatest asset.

Actually, the canal is no longer paying its own way. The tolls for years were kept at a minimum and it was the pride of the U.S. that ships went through the canal paying the same rate of tolls that they did at the time it was opened. These tolls remained unchanged for a period of 60 years, although there was a good deal of belt-tightening done to accomplish this. Canal Zone workers who had received many free benefits were forced to pay for them and overseas differentials to the U.S. workers were reduced.

In 1973, for the first time in history, the canal lost money and tolls were increased.

In 1963, in the Panamanian newspaper "El DIA", a prominent and much read columnist of Panama wrote that he took a dim view of the U.S. leaving the canal for Panamanian operation. He said he could not forget what happened to the U.S. base at Rio Hato in Panama after it was abandoned, at Panama's insistence. Everything was stripped from it and nothing left, despite plans and avowals to make use of the installation.

Gen. Omar Torrijos, the dictator, himself said from his hammock as reported by Washington Post correspondent, Marlise Simons, from Mexico City and carried in the Miami Herald on June 4, 1977, "There will be a vast political vacuum we will have to fill. I am thinking a lot about that. We will no longer have the gringos to blame." She reported further that while "international trade increased 10 percent last year, Panama's own gross national product registered no growth. This has brought new taxes, a total halt in the recently booming construction and high unemployment." She wrote, "The Government has been forced to cut back on deficit spending as commercial banks have become reluctant to increase the country's foreign debt."

The American Legion National Security and Foreign Relations Bulletin of July-August 1977 reported, "Banks and bankers have a way of influencing presidents and nations. United States and their foreign branches' banks have invested 2.77 billion in the Torrijos' Government. No one but Torrijos and his bookkeepers know the full extent of his Government's indebtedness to banks other than the U.S. Could the total indebtedness run to $5 billion?"

SEPARATION OF POWERS

The U.S. House of Representatives has taken the position by resolution and there is strong concurrence by some members of the Senate, that the Canal Zone is territory of the United States and cannot be disposed of except with the concurrence of both Houses of the Congress. The provision of the Constitution relied upon in assuming this position is Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 which states:

"The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

I had the honor of testifying before a Sub-committee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary in July with Senator James Allen of Alabama as Chairman, on the question of separation of powers and it was the sense of the testimony that this is the law.

I don't know exactly what would happen if the President and the Senate approve a new treaty and fail to seek a concurrence of the Lower House. Any attempt on the part of Congress to seek judicial relief would, of course, take place in our own Federal court system and any decision would be unilateral in its effect and would not in any sense be binding on Panama.

TITLE IN THE UNITED STATES?

Does the U.S. or Panama own the canal? This question has been bruited about by legal scholars and politicians so much that anything I say will, of course, be repetitious to some ears. I personally believe that the U.S. has a good title that could be defended in any courts that base their thinking on the English laws of Real Property and its historical precedents.

We are bound by the intentions of our leaders at the time of the acquisition of the Canal Zone in 1903 and we should insist that the people of Panama be bound by the intent of their leaders and people at the time.

First, let us turn to the basic document that gave rise to the construction of the canal, the Act of Congress called the "Spooner Act" of June 28, 1902, 32 U.S. Stat., 481. Section 2 of the Act is in part as follows:

"That the President is hereby authorized to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, for and on behalf of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, perpetual control of a strip of land, the territory of the Republic of Colombia, not less than six miles in width, extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and the right to use and dispose of waters thereon, and to excavate, construct, and to maintain, operate, and protect thereon a canal, of such depth and capacity as will afford convenient passage of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, which control shall include the right to perpetually maintain and operate the Panama railroad * * *"

The Act goes on to say in Section 4 that if the President is unable to obtain for the U.S. control of the necessary territory from Colombia, he should obtain "perpetual" control by treaty of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

It might be just as well at this point to recite what the United States did in payment for the Canal Zone.

(1) The Spooner Act provided that the U.S. should pay $40,000,000 for all of the property "real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, on the Isthmus of Panama * * * including all the capital stock of the Panama Railroad Company" and this was paid in full.

(2) Under Article 14 of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 (which will be discussed more in detail later, the U.S. agreed to pay to the Republic of Panama $10,000,000 in gold coin and also an annual payment of $250,000 in gold coin beginning nine years after the date of ratification. This was paid and the $250,000 payments were greatly increased during the administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Dwight D. Eisenhower.

(3) Article 5 of the Treaty sets up a plan for a joint commission composed of people appointed by the "Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama" to assess damages and appraise damages to private land holders in the area of the Canal Zone. This commission acted and titles to the private lands were acquired by the United States, which paid approximately $5,000,000 for the deeds and bills of sale; and

(4) In view of Colombia's unhappiness with the situation and her claims of injury, a treaty between the U.S. and that country "for the settlement of their differences arising out of the events which took place on the Isthmus of Panama in November" was signed at Bogota on April 6, 1919 and ratified March 1, 1922. This treaty provided that the title to the interoceanic canal and the Panama Railway" is now vested entirely and absolutely in the United States of America, without any encumbrances whatever", and that the U.S. would pay to the Republic of Colombia at the city of Washington the sum of $25,000,000 which was done.

Many who would espouse the demands of Panama have claimed that our position there is only a limited one; that we have merely a leasehold or what is known in English and American law as a defeasible fee; that nothing can be in perpetuity, therefore, the language "in perpetuity" is self-defeating. Legal scholars know this is just not so. The general warranty deed which expresses in no uncertain terms that the buyer of the land is to have and to hold the land forever with covenant of general warranty, is the commonest of transactions in the conveyance of real estate and in English and American law it means just what it says. Congress, in the Spooner Act, mandated the President to obtain the Canal Zone in perpetuity and the treaty of 1903 was drafted in compliance with that demand so it would be approved by the President and the Senate.

The disputed parts of the 1903 Treaty are Articles 2 and 3. The language of Article 2 that has caused so much controversy is the following:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use occupation and control" * * * of the area in dispute and further,

"The Republic of Panama further grants in like to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone * * *."

Article 3 states in full:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in the said Article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

Those who support the position of Panama have placed great emphasis upon the language in Article 3 stating, "if it were sovereign", which they read to be a denial of the fact that it is sovereign and therefore the United States does not have title. In doing this, those interpreters ignore the subsequent language, "to the entire exclusion by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority." Language that is any more certain of divestiture can hardly be imagined.

Maybe the Treaty shouldn't have used the words, "which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign." It would only have deprived the Nationalists of Panama of a part of their ammunition for they claim that no matter what, we took advantage of Panama in a weak period and they want their canal "back", even though it means invasion of the Zone and loss of life by their people.

The only time that the Supreme Court of the United States has made any determination of the question of title to the Canal Zone was in the case of Wilson v. Shaw, Secretary of the Treasury, decided on January 7, 1907 and reported in 204 U.S. at Page 24. This was a suit to restrain the Secretary from paying out money in the purchase of property for the construction of a canal at Panama. The Court denied the relief sought and Mr. Justice Brewer wrote the opinion of the Court, and said:

"It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect and that the territory described does not belong to this nation because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate.

"Further, it is said that the boundaries of the Zone are not described in the Treaty; but the description is sufficient for identification, and it has been practically identified by the concurrent action of the two nations alone interested in the matter. The fact that there may possibly be in the future some dispute as to the exact boundary on either side is immaterial, such disputes not infrequently attend conveyances of real estate or cessions of territory. Alaska was ceded to us forty years ago, but the boundary between it and the English possessions east was not settled until the last two or three years. Yet no one ever doubted the title of this Republic of Alaska."

This decision should have great influence on the attitude of our nation toward its ownership of the area but, strange to relate, our Department of State has consistently chosen to adhere to a policy of recognizing Panama as the "titular sovereign", whatever that means.

The 1903 treaty was ratified after it had been unanimously approved not only by the commissioners of Panama but by all of the municipalities and elective bodies of the Republic and by the votes of its citizens as well, as stated by Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State to Ricardo J. Alfaro, Minister of Panama, at Washington on October 15, 1923. U.S. Foreign Relations (1923), Vol. II, pp. 648-675.

The statement by Gen. Torrijos that any new treaty will this time be submitted to the people carries with it the implication that the 1903 treaty was adopted without the voice of the people. This is merely a ploy to the ones ignorant of the true facts.

ATTITUDE OF PANAMA AT TIME OF 1903 TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

At the time of the revolution against Columbia, the governing authority in Panama was called the "La Junta Revolucionaria" or "Proceres de la Independencia." These gentlemen made a report in Spanish to the "Convencion Nacional Constituyente" on January 15, 1904 which was signed by J. A. Arango, Thomas Arias and Federico Boyd and translated is as follows:

"It is an essential condition of the Treaty, The obligation perpetual that the U.S. has accepted of guaranteeing the independence of our country. That agreement on a point of such vital importance since it is related with the very existence of the nation, that lacking such a guarantee would see itself exposed to external aggressions whose fear would maintain us obligated to remain in a constant state of defense, is evident proof of the good faith and of the spirit of justice that animate that friendly people that have extended to us a generous hand. The Treaty, appreciated with strict judgment, can seem unfavorable to us in certain aspects, but estimating it as are estimated the works calculated to change the face of nations, considering it at least as the seed of incalculable benefits that must favor the most remote posterity, the Treaty realizes very noble and elevated aspirations."

This statement, contemporary with the Treaty, far more truthfully reflects the feeling of the era in which it was drafted and signed than does the Monday morning quarterbacking of today's writers and diplomats.

The people of Panama had been bitterly disappointed by the French failure and their golden dreams had been shattered. The U.S. came along and offered them, not only rescue from defeat but protection from their powerful neighbor, Colombia, that had kept them under subjection for so many years. To say that the U.S. stole the Canal Zone is not only completely untrue but absurd.

Statues of the Junta Revolucionaria adorn certain parks in Panama for they were once in high repute, but in recent years it has not been unusual to learn that they have been damaged and to hear demagogues revile them in their speeches.

During the period that the U.S. has had the Canal Zone it has eliminated the dread yellow fever and malaria, creating a healthful, beautiful area. The people are industrious and keep their yards full of flowers and plants. The ships of all nations have gone through the canal like clockwork with a brief delay only once caused by labor problems between the pilots and management.

It is interesting to note at this time that very few Panamanians actually worked in the construction of the canal. The powerful physiques of the West Indian Black men formed the great bulk of the work force and the engineering and management was done by U.S. citizens. Panama had a population of only about 300,000 people at the time, so with half being women and the exclusion of the children and the old from the males, there was only a small force available. Many of those continued to work their farms and conduct their private businesses, so their contribution was minimal.

Hon. George Westerman, former Ambassador to the U.N. from Panama has written an excellent book on the subject and researched it exhaustively.

AMERICAN BUSINESSMEN AND SHIPPERS

It may surprise some that American shippers have not voiced opposition to a transfer of the canal as it would place their ships in transit, subject to the whims and vagaries of a one-man regime. These companies are in many instances properties of conglomerates who have wide interests in Central and South America and they are willing to take their chances with Panama rather than "rock the boat." They are also beneficiaries of government subsidies and do not wish to prejudice this by opposition. Any increased tolls can also be passed on to the consumer, American taxpayer, in the form of increased shipping charges.

The businessmen of Panama who receive the benefit of millions of dollars spent by the Canal Zone governmental agencies and the employees, are horrified by the possibility of the loss of this trade but they are afraid to speak out for fear of reprisals.

COMMUNIST DICTATOR IN CONTROL

Panama is a dictatorship with many communists holding prominent positions in her government. The Canal Zone Non-profit Public Information Corporation reports that Torrijos and every person in control of government offices today is identified with the Communist Party.

Recently Torrijos and several plane loads of his leaders spent a number of days with Castro in Cuba and there is a regular airline running between the two countries. The Embassy of Cuba in Panama City is large and luxurious and responsible people tell me that there are Cuban mercenaries in the interior.

In the "Miami Herald" of July 2, 1977 the UPI with Washington Dateline stated that four retired Chiefs of Naval Operations appealed to President Carter not to give up control of the Panama Canal. The four admirals "Thomas Moorer, Arleigh Burke, George Anderson and Robert Carney described the waterway as a 'vital portion' of U.S. naval assets and 'absolutely essential to free world security.'"

The admirals argued that the canal is increasingly important to the U.S. because of the reduced size of our fleet. The passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific permits quick repositioning of U.S. ships from one ocean to another, particularly in time of crisis.

A few aircraft carriers cannot transit the canal, but the day of the carrier is past. The nuclear submarine with its deadly missiles can pass through the canal with consummate ease. If Torrijos or a similar successor controls the canal, movements of U.S. warships would be subject to his dictates when requesting passage no matter what the treaties contain and Castro and his Soviet henchmen would have a strong voice in canal policies.

The oil from Alaska is of such chemical content that it cannot be refined in the refineries of the West Coast. This means that great quantities must transit the canal to the East Coast. If the Panamanian dictatorship can control this flow of energy that is vital to the commerce and welfare of the U.S., we will be placed in a position of beseeching alms from a person who has constantly rattled the saber in his rambling speeches throughout Panama and Central America and has given evidence of harboring a deep grudge against us that would make reasonable dealings impossible. As the looters in the New York blackout, he would justify mistreatment of the U.S. by claiming that she was guilty of years of oppression and abuse toward Panama and it was therefore her day to retaliate toward the colossus of the North who had wrested from her her most valuable asset.

The present Panamanian government was established by a military coup when a democratically elected president, Arnulfo Arias, was ousted from office by the Guardia Nacional, Panama's army, because he planned to name a general of his own choosing as its head. There was no uprising of the people, and no anger against the existing government or its form. In fact, the people were happy with the election of their hero, who had been elected by them twice before.

The so-called "revolucion" was nothing but a power play by a group of men who had all of the guns and who just decided to take over the reigns of government and establish a dictatorship for their own benefit. Many of these men have become very rich and have unlimited power.

Just how President Carter can harmonize his advocacy of "Human Rights" by attempting a transfer of the canal to a government that has deprived its citizens of democratic rights, has eliminated freedom of the press, exiles native-born citizens and incarcerates its citizens without fair trials is beyond comprehension. I believe that he is the victim of a great deal of misinformation and is overpersuaded by his zeal to curry favor with the other southern countries and avoid conflict.

A recent report by Jack Anderson, political columnist is strongly indicative of the type of mentality that controls Panama's affairs. Anderson said, "There is disturbing evidence that Panama's strongman, Omar Torrijos, has struck a secret deal with Libya's wildman, Muammar Qaddafi, to give the Arab extremist a foothold in the Americas and to cooperate with the Arab boycott against the Jews. The erratic Kaddafi is regarded as one of the world's most irresponsible rulers.

He has armed radical terrorist groups, tried to purchase nuclear weapons, subsidized Uganda's zany Iddid Amin and engaged in various harum-scarum intrigues." The article dated June 6, 1977 said further that two months ago Torrijos and Qaddafi pledged allegiance to each other and recent antisemitism has been reported in Panama. All this because Torrijos is so badly in need of funds to run his government that he might turn against the Jews in return for Arab petrodollars.

CANAL NOT OBSOLETE

The tales indulged in by those who would surrender the canal are to the effect that it is obsolete and no good anymore for the world's ships are too large for it. Nothing could be further from the truth says David McCullough. In his recent best seller, "The Path Between the Seas," he wrote that the supertankers that can't go through represent a tiny fraction of the ships at sea. "If there is a problem with the canal, it's that too much traffic wants to go through it. There are 14,000 to 15,000 ships a year going through the canal today. Far more than ten years ago and less than will be ten years from now."

Canal Zone's Gov. Harold Parfitt said at a recent hearing of a subcommittee of the U.S. Senate, about 92% of the ships of the world can transit the canal. This certainly gives the lie to those who prate of the antiquity of the "big ditch."

SECURITY OF UNITED STATES

It is interesting to see that President Carter and his negotiators are stressing the fact that the new treaties will benefit the security of the U.S. This is one of the imponderables that the propagandists would thrust upon us.

We now have full control in perpetuity.

We have our troops there who can be armed, massed and used at our discretion. Our technicians, our engineers, our pilots and other U.S. citizens are there to insure the safe operation of the canal. Our police and our courts are in control of law enforcement. Lt. Gen. McAuliffe, Commanding General of the Southern Command in his testimony before the Senate Subcommittee July 22, 1977 said that with a few more men he could defend it.

As publicized, under the new treaties Panama will have much control in 3 years and she will have control of 70% of the land immediately. This land has long been considered vital to the operation of the canal and the safety and security of the people living in the Zone. Millions of dollars will be paid out to Panama as loans and grants and as a part of the tolls when the canal is already losing money.

How in the world can anybody in his right mind think that our security is insured with these changes and with a Communist-minded dictator in control of the government receiving these benefits.

The dictator has been rattling the saber in every speech he has made about the canal. He has constantly threatened the Zone with invasion and promised to lead this generation to take the canal by force. Now we would turn it over to him and pay him great sums of money in protection and our leadership talks of increased security.

Already certain Panamanian factions are disgruntled because the canal will not be completely surrendered immediately. They are grouching because our troops will be left in certain territories and there are words in the treaties that would let the U.S. perpetually protect the neutrality of the canal after Panama gets full control.

I was in Panama the time of the Remon-Eisenhower Treaty of 1955 and the ink was not dry before dissident factions were shouting against the U.S. and the same will happen this time. Our people apparently will never learn to cope with the communist-type mentality that is never satisfied and constantly clamors for more and more and more.

There is only one way to deal with people of this kind and it is not in the payment of protection money nor in the ceding of rights. The only way is by a strong position that will be respected. The constant assumption of guilt, the tearful cries that we have mistreated Panama over the years and admissions to false charges of colonialism that have been accepted by our State Department are not the methods to guarantee our security. We will not only endanger our position but we will lose the respect of the nations of the world. They know we bought it, built it, and should continue to operate it unhampered for our benefit and theirs.

COLONIALISM AND TREATY OUT OF DATE

Those sponsoring a new treaty with Panama label the opposition as red-necked chauvinists who are clinging to a relic of the colonial period of the U.S. and who would mistreat a friendly little country.

In the language of our liberal press, those who feel that a relinquishment of the canal would endanger the security and welfare of the U.S. are "jingoistic demagogues" who in some unknown but positively malicious and vicious manner hope to realize personal gain from their position. They write that the 1903 treaty is antiquated and that its provisions are archaic and a revision is long overdue.

Well, a few of those charged with chauvinism are the four retired chiefs of Naval Operations I have named, Admirals Moorer, Burke, Anderson and Carney. Another suffering the same charge is Herman Phleger, one of the most distinguished lawyers in the country, legal advisor to the Department of State under Eisenhower and architect of the far-reaching Antarctic Treaty. His position, well taken, that the U.S. operated under duress.

Those who would gain materially are not the little so-called "red necks" but the big American banks that have loaned millions to the dictator and need to be bailed out as he is on the verge of bankruptcy. The big businessmen that feel they stand to lose by being ejected from Panama and sympathetic countries, also view new treaties as opportunities to improve their positions.

For those bleeding hearts that say solemnly that the treaty "drafted in 1903 is badly outdated" have just failed to read their diplomatic history. Panama and the U.S. have been negotiating almost without interruption since the original treaty was signed.

A "Claims Convention" adjusting claims between the citizens of the two countries was celebrated in 1926 and modified in 1932.

Another Claims Convention was celebrated in 1950 and an arrangement for customs and space was celebrated in 1960 with an addendum in 1962.

In 1942 there was an agreement for the lease of defense sites which had to do with roads, airbases, lands, buildings, etc.

In 1904 there was a treaty for the mutual extradition of criminals which was amplified in 1906.

Also in 1904 there was a monetary agreement celebrated between the countries wherein the U.S. agreed to keep the monetary units of Panama at a parity with the U.S. dollar and that agreement was negotiated and amended in 1930, 1931, 1936, 1946, 1950, 1953 and 1962.

In 1936 a "General Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation" which was motivated by the "desire to strengthen further the bonds of friendship and cooperation between the two countries", was celebrated.

In 1942 they celebrated the "General Relations Agreement."

In 1955 with much ceremony and publicity was celebrated the "Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation" abrogating and changing many points of difference in the treaty of 1903.

After the riots and border incidents of January 9, 1964 the parties began another series of negotiations and in 1967 the negotiators had agreed. When this three-part treaty was made public there was a general roar of opposition voiced by the vocal elements in Panama and as a consequence it was never ratified.

TEDDY ROOSEVELT'S STATEMENT

Many who attack the U.S. control point to statements made by Teddy Roosevelt before Congress or in the heat of a political campaign when it was popular for us to have undertaken the tremendous effort to build the canal, when he was reputed to have said, "I took the Isthmus" or "I took Panama." They scornfully state that such statements were an indication of "big stick" tactics and that now we should humbly make reparations and apologize.

In Roosevelt's autobiography which describes the faithlessness of J. M. Marroquin, the dictator of Colombia at the time and the impossibility of completing a treaty with that country, he says,

"No one connected with the American Government had any part in preparing, inciting, or encouraging the revolution, and except for the reports of our military and naval officers, which I forwarded to Congress, no one connected with the government had any previous knowledge concerning the proposed revolution, except such as was accessible to any person who read the newspapers and kept abreast of the current questions and current affairs. By the unanimous action of its people and without the firing of a shot, the State of Panama declared themselves an independent Republic."

I choose to believe the autobiographic statement made in an atmosphere of reflection, as to what actually occurred rather than polemic declarations made during the violent discussions that were the order of the day when Teddy was running for office.

FRIENDLY NEGOTIATIONS?

We are told by the Department of State and the American negotiators that we should do justice to a friendly little country and that the proposed treaties have been negotiated in an atmosphere of friendly cooperation. We then learn that Sr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chief negotiator for Panama, has said to a group of government officials in a speech since agreement has been declared, that if the U.S. Congress rejects the treaty the Panamanians will "take the road to violence" and he said further, "Omar Torrijos has tried to get the negotiations to work out because we did not want on our conscience the deaths of our youths." These are naked threats quite obviously made to incite the Panamanians and to frighten the U.S. Congress.

Panama is small with less than 2 million people but it has a well-armed, well-trained fighting force skilled in the arts of guerrilla warfare and sabotage. These threats are made by a group of ruthless opportunists who not only are demanding the surrender of U.S. property but have the monstrous gall to demand that the U.S. pay them to take it. It is reported that Castro urged Torrijos to scale down his demands and accept what the American negotiators offered. So much for our naivete.

The canal has always been vulnerable to sabotage but wrecking it would certainly not be to Panama's advantage. If attempts at sabotage are in mind, a treaty that delays full control to Panama for 20 or more years will not deter the radical saboteurs.

The dictator and his crew are engaging in psychological warfare when they threaten invasion and hoping that an America sickened by Vietnam will weaken to avoid a similar tragic mess. The obvious answer is that Panama has no such size or resources and no neighbors willing to support her.

Panama needs tourist trade and foreign investments and to develop a situation of guerrilla activity like in Ireland and other parts of the world would be most destructive to her and her people and would soon overthrow Torrijos and sue for peace.

UNITY OF CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES IN SUPPORT OF PANAMA

Torrijos would have us believe that the Central and South American countries are united behind Panama in her demands and the U.S. negotiators hold over us the specter of loss of trade opportunities and rapport with those countries in the event we fail to cede. Nothing could be further from the truth. At a recent meeting in Colombia to express solidarity only five leaders were present: Colombia, Costa Rica, Venezuela, Panama and Mexico.

Anyone familiar with the history of Central and South American countries with their border wars and revolutions knows that all is not sweetness and light between them and their leaders will do exactly what they think is right for themselves. Unity between them is a myth that should be given no credence by responsible men.

Marilyn Guardabassi, who writes "A Woman's View" stated in her column of Aug. 22, 1977:

"Carter's insistence that Latin American countries are in favor of our relinquishing the canal or that such a move would enhance our image is false. Three quarters of all Latin American countries wholeheartedly support our maintaining our sovereignty, particularly those located on the Pacific Coast, for they realize that American control is their only guarantee that the canal will remain open to world shipping. This giveaway, and especially under duress from a two-bit dictator, makes us look ridiculous, not only in this hemisphere, but in the eyes of the world."

Dr. George W. Fontaine, Director of Latin American studies at Georgetown University in an article opposing the treaties written for the Wall Street Journal on Aug. 22 states:

"Yet even though no Latin American regime publicly supports the United States, the depth of pro-Panamanian feeling varies considerably from country to country. It is strongest in Venezuela, Colombia and possibly Mexico; it is weakest in the southern cone of South America. For example, Brazilians, heavy users of the canal, have privately expressed deep misgivings over Panamanian control."

Latin Americans are highly intelligent people. Many are internationalists, educated in Europe, the U.S. and other parts of the world. Each nation is separate and distinct, and proud of its own culture and traditions. Many customs have been handed down from the "Mother Country, Spain", but they have developed their own dances, music, art and literature. Some say that their national spirit is revolution.

They cannot be lumped together as they have different climates, ethnic groups and geography and they must be dealt with individually. Nicaragua is a great friend of the U.S. but I can remember when we sent Marines there to protect our interests and we were thoroughly hated. Costa Rica was a short time ago our great friend but now she has been weaned away and although she and Panama once had a border "war" she now sides with Panama against us.

Brazil was once against us and she is now a good friend, Chile and Peru were once our friends and now they are not nor are they friendly to each other.

All of the countries have their individual economic problems that are frequently competitive and they are looking for markets and opportunities. If they feel that the U.S. will serve them better in the Canal Zone they will be for U.S. retention although some of their demagogues and radical elements will give lip service to Panama.

I am reminded of the statement about Europe that the Italians hate the Germans and the Germans hate the Italians. The English hate the French and the French hate everybody. An analysis of the Central and South American countries would reveal a comparable situation.

CONCLUSION

Our President has been badly advised by a group of State Department officials and emissaries of banks and big business. He is desirous of forming a new relationship with the Central and South American countries and he believes that the proposed new treaties will effectuate an era of friendship and cooperation. He is to be commended for his desires as a great deal must be done in this hemisphere.

There was a time when American products led the way. Asiatic and European automobiles, appliances and products have captured the markets, not because of the canal problem but because they are cheaper, of good quality and are just outselling our products. There has never been any great love in Panama for the Asiatics but they are going great today.

Communist countries are constantly seeking footholds in the great South American continent with its tremendous natural resources and population explosion. If we lose the canal they will have acquired a great position of vital importance.

Weakness is not the answer and as publicized the present proposals are weak. They will only whet appetites for additional concessions tomorrow.

The talk of a sea level canal is smoke screen and the present treaties are not binding upon Panama to permit us preference that could be enforced except by some military intervention and it would be hard to imagine the U.S. going into Panama with an army to build a sea level canal.

Our country spent 17 million dollars exploring the possibility of constructing such a canal and suggested that it could be done in the rugged area of Panama near the Columbian border with nuclear devices but Panama was horrified at the thought.

Suggestions that such a canal could be built with conventional digging equipment were equally unwelcome as it would cause the death of the terminal cities of Panama City and Colon. The present lock canal provides those cities with great commerce from the ships that stop enroute through the locks and a sea level canal located anywhere would kill that trade.

The ecologists are up in arms about such a canal for the dangers to the great fishing industries. The present canal is a body of fresh water that successfully prevents mixing of the flora and fauna between the oceans. What would happen if a sluice way of salt water were to be opened between them is a matter of great concern to scientists and engineers.

The U.S. owns the canal and the surrounding lands. Why not keep them? Panama should probably receive additional benefits because of the overtures made by our government and our desire to retain her friendship but the people of the U.S. must recognize that as long as we have a presence there of any kind there will be outbreaks of hostilities. When she was part of Colombia Teddy Roosevelt recites that there were 53 revolutions in 57 years.

During my 25 years in office there were 2 strong attacks on the C.Z., 1959 and 1964, and there were many abortive attempts on the part of students and communists. Also, there were, of course, internal problems with the assassination of President Remon and the coup which put the present dictator in power.

We should not place the security and commerce of our nation in the hands of a hard drinking, meagerly educated, communist-leaning dictator who is threatening the U.S. with "give us the canal or else." This man lives by the sword and could die by the sword and a new leader could regard any treaty as just so much paper.

There is the possibility of bloodshed under the present arrangement as there is under any new arrangement. History has demonstrated that such is the way of life in Panama.

There is no honor in appeasement and blackmail leads only to violence.

THE CANAL TREATIES: OTHER CONSERVATIVE VIEWS AND VOICES

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, as the Senate prepares to consider the Panama Canal Treaties, I think it is important to point out that many traditionally conservative spokesmen have expressed their approval for these pacts. Columnist William F. Buckley, Jr. and actor John Wayne have indicated their support of these treaties. I might also add that the editor of the Indianapolis news, Mr. Harvey Jacobs, wrote a column for his newspaper on August 27 discussing the disadvantages of continuing the present treaty relationship with Panama.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this material be printed in the Record. I think this is evidence that hard thinking Americans regardless of ideological persuasion realize that the Panama Canal Treaties serve our Nation's interest.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CHOOSING UP SIDES ON PANAMA

(By Harvey Jacobs)

Take it from a military man who spent several years in Panama that the Americans who ran the Canal were a separate enclave who looked down their noses at the Panamanians.

He said it before the Canal treaty was even a gleam in Ellsworth Bunker's eye: "Sometime we'll pay the price of segregation in Panama, too."

This man left Panama several years ago; perhaps the attitude changed after his departure. But at least one man was not proud of our "ugly American" image in that place.

Now the chickens may be coming home to roost again. The Panamanians have risen up in rebellion on several occasions and Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, Panama's military leader, has threatened to let loose the force of Panama's terrorists if the Senate does not ratify the treaty negotiated for the Carter administration.

It is easy to fall in line and say we are "giving the Canal away," or "we're paying Panama to take it away from us." It's also a simple analysis to say that "we built it—we'll keep it" or "the Panamanians could sell us the Brooklyn bridge."

At the other end of the axis it is interesting to learn how the Panama negotiators are "selling" the new treaty to their people. Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chief of the team, has been as busy as President Carter and Gerald Ford trying to reassure his constituency that he didn't "sell out" his homeland. He said candidly in one address, "the treaty is good for us in some basic aspects, bad in others and ugly in others still."

He said his government was too responsible to seek a bloody confrontation with the U.S. "The massacre of the best of our youth would bring more setbacks in the development of our country" was his answer to the extremists.

The Panama government is being attacked by both leftists and nationalists for yielding to Washington the right to intervene to make the Canal "neutral" after the new treaty expires in 2000 and for "legalizing" U.S. military bases already in Panama. These bases were not authorized by the famous treaty of 1903 under which the United States received control of the Canal "in perpetuity."

Therefore, there is a significant American gain in this new treaty over what was officially granted in 1903.

That treaty has become an international eyesore, exploited to the limit by communists around the world and especially in South America. It is common knowledge that President Theodore Roosevelt directed an "insurrection" in the Isthmus of Panama against the Republic of Colombia. U.S. warships at either end of what was to become the Canal Zone blocked Colombian forces while the local fire brigade in Panama City was designated as the Army of the new Republic of Panama.

Such actions were accepted in 1903 as a logical part of the Doctrine of Manifest Destiny. But the Doctrine does not help us build friendship today in any part of the world.

Reduced to pure self-interest, the Panama Canal is not worth very much. It's too small for supertankers or aircraft carriers. The Navy used it for warships only 17 times last year, 22 times in 1975 and 12 times in 1974. A small bomb in the hands of a terrorist could paralyze it for months. With all our power, we probably could not defend it against a determined terrorist.

What hurts most in the treaty is our pride. It is humiliating to negotiate with a terrorist, leftist dictator such as Torrijos and to dignify his regime as being sufficiently responsible to accept and operate what the American people have invested in for three-quarters of a century. It is distasteful business, too, to know that the long shadow of Fidel Castro is hovering over the table.

On the other hand, fear is not in our vocabulary—and the whole world knows this. We would gain some international stature if we demonstrated that the powerful can also be humble and truly a good neighbor. We would also blunt the most potent tool in the communist arsenal of the "hate America" campaign. The debate will go on, as it should, for there is substance in both sides of the argument.

[From the Washington Star, Aug. 16, 1977]

THE CASE FOR THE PANAMA TREATY

(By William F. Buckley Jr.)

Panama.—There seems to be only one substantive objection to the new treaty, and that is its provenance. Lobbyists for it particularly disdain Mr. Ronald Reagan because they view his arguments as amounting to nothing more than warmed-over chauvinism. In fact his objections are shared by critics whose turn of mind is not that of, say, the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The distinguished Mr. Herman Phleger, legal adviser to the Department of State under President Eisenhower, and architect of the far-seeing, far-reaching Antarctic Treaty, heatedly denounces the new Panama treaty—on the same ground as Reagan, namely: The United States negotiated under duress.

The other arguments against revising the treaty are frail. It is conceded by our military that the Panama Canal is simply not defensible against sabotage or missile-bombing. Protecting it against sabotage would take Panamanian cooperation and even with it, a saboteur with an explosive in a cargo vessel could put the Canal out of action for a while.

Guarding sea and air approaches to the Canal is the only defense, if there is one at all. This we have done, this the Panamanian government is prepared in a separate protocol to charge us to continue to do; and this we can do under our own initiative after the turn of the century when the Canal is turned over fully to the Panamanians.

Respecting the economic point, the Panamanians undertake to guarantee passage to all shipping at nondiscriminatory rates. As to the subsidy, we commit ourselves to a flat 50 million dollars rental, which is reasonable, plus an unspecified jolt of economic aid to the new operators—which is not unreasonable.

Now to the Reagan-Phleger position: One's instinct is to resent bargaining under duress. Especially so in the current situation inasmuch as the Panamanians, rather than merely asking the United States kindly to reconsider arrangements entered into in 1903 with less than a scrupulous regard for the presumptions of nationhood, launched a sloppy, eristic campaign to discredit the plain fact that the United States exercises sovereign rights over the Panamanian Zone.

But the point (I have stressed it before) is that it is becoming to a mature and self-confident nation to waive, where it is appropriate to do so, such formal considerations. Besides, we can hardly be impatient with rioting youth in the fever swamps of Panama considering the number of rioting youth we indulged in the fever swamps of Berkeley and Columbia. Even if we grant (as I do), that our title to the Panama Canal is morally and historically secure, we should not fail to understand Panamanian resentment. Even if we had in our hand a record that showed that every Panamanian in 1903 had voted to grant the U.S. in perpetuity the rights we have enjoyed in the area, still there is the shifting perspective between what was permissible and even welcome in 1903, and what is permissible and welcome in 1977.

It is fashionable beyond the limits of common sense to deplore the colonialism of ages past. My own notion is that colonialism was far preferable to much that now goes on. But our colonial obligations in Panama haven't done very much for the people there. They live, for the most part unhappily, under a dictator who deals with dissidents by imprisoning them, exiling them, and confiscating their property. We do not even have the excuse, in Panama, that we have succeeded in keeping such as Torrijos from coming to power. No, we concern ourselves only with the Canal Zone.

But now that the military inform us that our presence in the zone is unnecessary to such security as is achievable, the reasons for staying reduce merely to the question: Are we going to satisfy our pride by rejecting anti-historical Panamanian demands?

That would not appear to make sense. It is as much United States policy to avoid involving itself unnecessarily in the affairs of other countries as at the turn of the century it was American policy to involve ourselves, in Wilsonian exuberance, in these matters. The Canal's military and economic importance to us is slight; its operation is a net economic drain; we have retained the right to deploy our military in such a way as to discharge responsibilities of primary interest to our Latin American neighbors. We should be large enough, as we were in the Philippines, to walk out, with true, self-confidence.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES COMMENTARY

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a column by the distinguished author, Anthony Harrigan be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DEFENSE OF THE CANAL

(By Anthony Harrigan)

One of the principal arguments used by supporters of the Panama Canal treaties is that the United States will find itself embroiled in a guerrilla war if the canal and its zone aren't surrendered to Panama. The truth is that the tactical advantages are with the United States if it keeps the entire zone in American hands.

This point is made in a hard-hitting, first-hand report from Panama written by Egon Tausch, a writer who served with distinction as an Army officer in Vietnam and later taught at West Point.

In a study report prepared for the United States Industrial Council, Tausch says: "As long as the Zone is controlled by the U.S. few military men fear Panamanian guerrillas. Although large parts of Panama are jungle, the population is concentrated in the two major cities. Panama has never fought a war. The Guardia Nacional, which serves as both the army and the police of Panama, is 8,000 strong, but almost all of it is stationed in downtown Panama City, for political uses only. The Guardia doesn't like the jungle. The most committed fighters Gen. Torrijos has are the thousands of leftist professional students, and these do better in romantic street demonstrations than in individual acts of sabotage or concerted struggles. The 'martyrs' of the famous riots of 1964 were killed when a department store they were looting caved in."

The Tausch report continues:

"Panamanians could be trained to fight—the U.S. Army has been trying to do this in jungle warfare schools in the Zone for years—but the probability, if war broke out, would be that Cubans would do all the fighting. This is true whether the treaties are rejected, or are ratified with U.S. retention of military bases but without the Zone.

"The analogy with Vietnam is valid, but not the way treaty supporters think it is.

"The crippling difficulty faced by the U.S. military in Vietnam was that geographic territory was irrelevant in that war. Fortifying towns or hilltops, though easy, was pointless; Vietnam remained a war of movement because the U.S. and Saigon forces had to maintain the offensive tactically in order to maintain political control. In the few instances when American installations were assaulted directly, the Vietcong and North Vietnamese attackers were slaughtered.

"The Canal Zone, on the other hand, is only about fifty miles long and ten miles wide. Perimeters can be established and fortified. There are no foreign 'hearts and minds' to be won; only Americans live there. There are no Panamanian villages within the Zone to worry about, nor any reason why the frontier should not be cleared of vegetation for fields of fire. Gen. Torrijos knows all of this. Difficulties would arise if and when the Zone was abandoned before the Canal was surrendered, and this is precisely what the new treaties propose to do.

"Tausch notes in his report that the idea that the Canal itself, within an American Zone, is vulnerable to sabotage by dissidents or guerrillas is based on ignorance of the physical structure of the Canal and on underestimation of 1910 technology. 'The Canal,' he explains, 'is not a complex, delicate mechanism. It consists of two lakes, three sets of locks in two channels, and a few locomotives. The lakes are filled by run-off. The locks are merely chambers built of solid concrete, with holes in the bottom through which the water passes by gravity when the valves are open. No pumps are used; each chamber is adjusted by the release of water out of the chamber above it or into the one below. The gates are steel, pivoting on posts, and locking under the pressure of the water. Each chamber has duplicate gates for emergencies. Damaged sets can be removed by the floating crane, the largest in the world, without interrupting Canal operation. The machine parts are simple, solid steel and brass, and every piece is manufactured in workshops on the banks.'"

If the American people are acquainted with these facts, they will realize that defense of the Canal against land attack would be a simple matter. Nothing is more absurd than the notion that the Canal can be disabled by dropping a few hand grenades in a lock.

PANAMA PLEBISCITE: A DEMOCRATIC RATIFICATION AND A RATIFICATION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the final results of the plebiscite in Panama on the new Panama Canal treaties were announced at an official ceremony on October 28, 1977. We had known from informal reports that Panamanians had voted 2-to-1 in favor of the treaties. The official tally, certified by the Provincial Polls Committee to the National Electoral Tribunal was 766,232 total votes cast; 506,805 "yes" votes and 245,117 "no" votes—better than 2-to-1 for the treaties. Of the total, 14,310 ballots were voided.

I was impressed with both the results of the plebiscite and with the successful exercise of the plebiscite itself as an instrument of the democratic process.

First, the Panamanian Government took active measures to inform Panamanian citizens about the treaties. Open and free debate on the treaties was permitted and encouraged. Thorough procedures for verifying the vote were followed. These factors combined give great credibility to the better than 2-to-1 vote in favor of the treaties by Panamanians.

Second, I am greatly encouraged that this democratic process was successfully carried out in Panama. I am confident that the United States will use its improved and renewed ties with Panama—the result of signing, and, hopefully, ratifying the new Panama Canal treaties—actively to encourage such democratic procedures and institutions in Panama. The fact that this vote was conducted in Panama is a constructive consequence of the effort of our country and theirs to work out a treaty beneficial to all concerned. The development and use of democratic practices and procedures in Panama will only enhance the recognition and protection of basic human rights in Panama.

Mr. President, the Panamanian plebiscite is the counterpart to our ratification procedure. But obviously, it is a different system and unfamiliar to many Americans. To provide a better understanding of the plebiscite system under Panamanian law, I ask unanimous consent that some questions and answers on the treaty plebiscite be printed in the Record. These questions and answers are based on information provided by the U.S. Embassy in Panama.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES PLEBISCITE

1. Who was eligible to vote in the plebiscite on October 23, 1977?

All Panamanian citizens who were at least 18 years of age and who had not lost citizenship rights (e.g. for conviction of a criminal offense) and who were in Panama on that day. The Panamanian Government announced that there were approximately 788,000 eligible voters. Voting is not compulsory.

2. What had the Panamanian Government done to ensure that voters were well informed about the treaties?

The Panamanian Government coordinated an information program regarding the significance of the treaties and detailing what changes the treaties would mean for Panama. Full texts of the treaties and the related documents were published as separate supplements by the Government and distributed with two daily morning newspapers and one afternoon daily. Also, members of the Panamanian negotiating team and other Government officials appeared at many public meetings in Panama to explain the treaties.

3. Were groups and individuals opposed to the treaties free to present their views to the public?

The Panamanian Government announced that public discussion of the treaties would be completely free. The Government appears to have fulfilled this pledge of open debate, even to the extent of assisting groups opposed to the treaties in publishing their message. Students organizations against the treaties and against the economic policies of the Panamanian Government received full-page donations in three Government daily newspapers. Their ads urged Panamanian voters to vote against and used strong language to condemn the treaties, and, by implication, the Government which negotiated them. The Government appeared not to have censored the content of these ads. Many newspaper columns criticized the terms of the treaties, and accounts of meetings by political and professional groups opposed to the treaties appeared frequently. However, in the last ten days before Plebiscite day, groups opposed to the treaties complained of difficulty in obtaining radio and TV time and newspaper coverage.

4. What is the method of voting in a plebiscite?

The voter appears at the polling place, presents his or her national identity card to the Poll Committee, and signs his or her name and identity card number on a Precinct Register. The voter is then handed a plain manila envelope and then goes into a private voting booth. In the booth are two stacks of ballots: "yes" ballots are of one color and "no" ballots are of another color. On each ballot is printed either "yes" or "no" and the following words: "I am in agreement with the new Panama Canal treaty, the Treaty on Permanent Neutrality of the Canal and the Operation of the Canal, the Appended Agreements and Annexes Signed between the Government of Panama and the United States on 7 September 1977." The voter selects either a "yes" ballot or a "no" ballot, places it in the manila envelope leaves the booth and deposits the envelope, in a sealed ballot box. The box is on a table where the three members of the Poll Committee sit. The voter then puts a thumb print by his or her name on the voting register, and a voting official perforates the voter's national identity card to prevent multiple voting by the same person.

5. How are the ballots counted and what measures are taken to ensure an accurate count?

When the polls close, the sealed ballot boxes are publically opened and envelopes counted. The number of envelopes must not exceed the number of names on the list of persons who voted. If there are more envelopes than recorded voters, the difference is eliminated by discarding at random enough envelopes to equalize the number of envelopes and voters. The ballots are then removed from the envelopes and the number of "yes" and "no" votes tallied. A report of the vote result is sent to the National Electoral Commission as well as to a District Polls Committee. The District Committee also received all the voted ballots and is required to check the accuracy of the reports of the individual Precinct Poll Committees. Then the District Committee makes a report to the Provincial Polls Committee which further certified the vote results of the various Precincts in its Province and issues a final report to the National Electoral Tribunal.

6. What provisions were made for independent poll watchers?

Panamanian law authorizing the plebiscite does not specifically provide for independent poll watchers. But of the three members of each Precinct Committee, one is a citizen appointed by the National Electoral Tribunal from a list of names submitted by a local community board, and the second members are chosen by the Tribunal from lists of educators, students and professional, civic, cultural and religious groups. The third is selected by the Tribunal directly. The Panamanian Government also invited university rectors from North and South America to observe the plebiscite. Erik Suy, United Nations Undersecretary-General and legal counsel, represented the N.H. Secretary-General at the plebiscite. Additionally, many members of the international press were in Panama on Plebiscite Day to observe the voting process.

In conclusion, Mr. President, knowledge of the democratic plebiscite procedure gives me greater confidence that Panamanian sentiment on the treaties has been fairly measured after open and free debate. The plebiscite in Panama thus stands not only as a democratic ratification of the treaties, but I am hopeful that it is a large step in the ratification and adoption of the democratic process by the Government and for the people of Panama.

DEFENDING THE CANAL IN THE AGE OF TERRORISM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, my support for the new Panama Canal treaties is predicated upon my belief in the need for the United States to make the necessary mature adjustments to the realities of the modern-day world. In other words, if our policies are such that they encourage cooperation, why risk the prospects for confrontation, particularly when such confrontation would involve high costs to this country?

The debate over the new Panama Canal treaties is fraught with considerable emotion and much misinformation. It is time we come down to earth and realistically assess what these treaties give us and the potential costs we avoid by the Senate giving its advice and consent to ratification.

Therefore, it was with considerable interest that I read a column in the November 1 Baltimore Sun, written by Arthur S. Collins, Jr., a retired general whose last field assignment was as Deputy Commander in Chief, U.S. Army in Europe. General Collins also served a tour in Panama during his military career.

Entitled "Defending the Canal in the Age of Terrorism," the article by General Collins places the debate over the new treaties in its proper perspective. I think it is particularly relevant to note General Collins' following perception:

Consider how a few dozen terrorists confounded and tied up a strong, economically healthy West Germany; examine the cost to the British of trying to enforce a peace in Northern Ireland; recall the destruction in Lebanon when terrorists and guerrillas got out of control. From a military point of view, none of these situations compares to the problems the United States would encounter if it had to defend the Panama Canal unilaterally.

This is the era of the extremist, the terrorist, the guerrilla. Extremists with terrorist tendencies abound in the Free World and the Third World. Defeat of the treaty would provide the cause and the slogans they need to create conflict in Panama where there is a strong sense of nationalism. Guerrillas would be easy to recruit and the local populace would be sympathetic and provide sanctuary, support, and good intelligence * * *

General Collins goes on to point out what would be in store for the United States should we continue a presence in the Panama Canal Zone in the absence of acquiescence of the Government of Panama and the people of Panama.

If nothing else should have been learned from our experience in Indochina, it is that if one does not have the full support of the populace, disaster is inevitable.

Yet, the sloganeering surrounding the debate on the new treaties does not serve the best interests of the United States nor the taxpayer. Who will pay the price should the treaties fail in the Senate? It is the average American—the average taxpayer. It is the average American whose son could be called upon to serve in a senseless conflict that could have been avoided. And what will we accomplish by this measure of last resort? The end result could be the same as it was in Vietnam.

I urge my colleagues to give careful consideration to the analysis of General Collins. Is this the scenario we really want to bring home once again to the American people? Or do we avoid confrontation and in the process gain the cooperation of the Panamanian people to assist us in protecting an important asset?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the column be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DEFENDING THE CANAL IN THE AGE OF TERRORISM

(By Arthur S. Collins, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—Consider how a few dozen terrorists confounded and tied up a strong, economically healthy West Germany; examine the cost to the British of trying to enforce a peace in Northern Ireland; recall the destruction in Lebanon when terrorists and guerrillas got out of control. From a military point of view, none of these situations compares to the problems the United States would encounter if it had to defend the Panama Canal unilaterally.

This is the era of the extremist, the terrorist, the guerrilla. Extremists with terrorists tendencies abound in the Free World and the Third World. Defeat of the treaty would provide the cause and the slogans they need to create conflict in Panama where there is a strong sense of nationalism. Guerrillas would be easy to recruit and the local populace would be sympathetic and provide sanctuary, support, and good intelligence. Cuba would almost surely offer these "democratic freedom fighters" training cadres and light weapons from Soviet arsenals.

The Canal Zone is 10 miles wide, about 51 miles long, and covers an area of 647 square miles. Defense of so small an area appears to be a minor problem for a world power. However, the realities of geography, international agreements, and today's world make it most difficult to defend this area and respect the rights of Panama. A dense jungle with triple canopy growth covers much of the Zone and makes surveillance of the open and unobstructed Canal Zone borders ineffective. Trails are few, and numerous streams and water obstacles make troop movement difficult. This is an ideal area for guerrilla activities. So much for the area of operations. How about the most likely enemy?

Small, lightly armed forces, operating from just outside the Zone, could suddenly emerge from the jungle to attack canal facilities or ships in the canal. From the Canal Zone borders to any target in the Zone—a set of locks, school, housing area, power plant, or whatever the target might be—is at most five miles. Hostile groups could strike from either side of the Zone so selection of targets and timing of attacks would be made easy for guerrillas operating from secure bases in Panama. Ammunition, arms, radios and other equipment could be hidden in the small villages that dot the borders of the Canal Zone.

Portable rockets and mortars would complement the small groups attacking U.S. installations. Locks and maintenance and support facilities would be key target areas and all are within range of these weapons; attacks would be frequent. A rocket hitting a school, fuel farm, or tanker could be devastating.

A determined terrorist organization would plan attacks on Madden Dam and Gatun Dam. Damage to these dams would create serious problems in maintaining enough water in Gatun Lake to permit passage of ocean-going ships, but they are difficult targets for ambush and booby traps.

Canal Zone installations can all be defended if enough manpower is assigned to the task; there are, however, so many historical examples of well defended facilities destroyed by small, well trained raiding parties, that any planned defense of the canal must recognize the reality. It is difficult and costly to be always on the defensive and always on the alert. The United States as a nation does not respond well to prolonged aggravating situations which are not quickly resolved. Day-in and day-out, U.S. troops and civilians will suffer a few casualties, and the numbers will mount.

In brief, a small well directed hostile group would have an enormous capacity for inflicting damage on U.S. citizens and embarrassing the United States. Their attacks would be disruptive, sometimes damaging, often deadly, and most difficult to stop.

Such a situation would be less likely to occur if the Panamanian government had a direct hand in the continued operation of the canal. They could stop these attacks far better than a "gringo intruder" from the north. In fact they would have to, because if the canal is closed Panama will lose the revenues from tolls provided for in the treaty, and many Panamanian citizens would be out of work. If the treaty is not ratified, however, the Panamanian government might not have much control, nor much interest.

Patriotism is not unique to the United States; emotions run strong in small nations too, and resentment of the United States is long standing. So it is not unlikely that the government of Panama would stand back; after all, it wouldn't be their property under attack.

This is the critical fact: Without the active support of the Panamanian people and government, the only way guerrilla and rocket attacks could be curtailed—curtailed, never eliminated—would be for U.S. Forces to invade Panama's territory to drive guerrillas away from the zonal borders and thereby make them less effective. The resulting military venture would be a nasty chore for which the American people are not suited by temperament or inclination.

Various estimates have been made on the size of U.S. forces required to protect the canal if the treaty is not ratified. These estimates are dependent on the degree of support the United States could expect from Panama. Realistically, we should assume that if the treaty is not approved, the United States can expect little support from Panama or its people.

If hostilities erupt, the most likely scenario would be a series of small attacks continuing over a period of several years, with the unpleasant duty of defending the canal falling on U.S. troops. Under these conditions, the smallest number of troops for a minimally effective defense of the zone would be 100,000. If Panama were invaded it would take a lot more.

There is no need to belabor the point. The canal could be defended, but its continued operation could not be assured. The jungle is not a healthy place to be and for troops always on the defensive, not knowing friend from foe, it is a corrosive and frustrating environment. U.S. troops will suffer casualties and world opinion will be against them.

Like Vietnam there will be no heroes. Both the nation and the armed forces, especially those on the ground, will pay a bill that will include large, hidden economic and psychological future payments.

Even were the treaty ratified, terrorists could still commit acts of terrorism. However, in that case, the Panamanian government would use its police, security agencies, and armed forces to oppose the terrorists. The Panamanian people would not long have sympathy for those who have put them out of work by closing their canal.

If Panama asked for U.S. military help it would be gladly given and gratefully received. If the canal were closed by hostile action, world opinion almost certainly would be on the side of the Panamanian government. These are all important advantages that flow from Panama's active involvement in defense of the canal.

It is time those determined to "save" the canal set aside their emotion, study the treaty, consider the alternatives, and decide from whom and for what they are "saving" the canal.

TESTIMONY OF PROFESSOR RAOUL BERGER BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES CONCERNING PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ALLEN, Mr. President, on November 3, 1977, the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary convened to receive the testimony of Raoul Berger in connection with the subcommittee's investigation of certain constitutional issues associated with the Panama Canal Treaties. Professor Berger is the foremost legal authority on the U.S. Constitution and is the author of the recently published best seller, "Government by Judiciary." He is best remembered for his work, "Executive Privilege," which had tremendous impact on the course of history during the Watergate controversy.

His testimony before the subcommittee yesterday was highly significant in that he stated very forcefully the view that no property belonging to the United States in the Isthmus of Panama can be transferred to Panama by treaty alone, but that authorization by the Congress is specifically required by article IV, section 3(2) of the U.S. Constitution. Professor Berger expressed the further opinion that any treaty purporting to transfer such property, even if ratified by the Senate, would be void.

Inasmuch as the subcommittee has received overwhelming requests for copies of Professor Berger's testimony, I ask unanimous consent that his statement be printed in the Record, so that it will be easily available to Members of Congress and interested members of the public.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT BY PROFESSOR RAOUL BERGER BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS HEARINGS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

You have invited me to comment on the relation between the Article IV, Section 3 (2) power of Congress to dispose of property of the United States and the treaty power, in light of the statements respecting the relation by Herbert J. Hansell, Legal Advisor, Department of State,¹ and Ralph E. Erickson, Deputy Assistant Attorney General.² Although I am in favor of the Panama Canal Treaty, I share your solicitude for the preservation of constitutional boundaries and your concern lest the function committed to Congress by diminished. I have long held the conviction that all agents of the United States, be they Justices, members of Congress, or the President, must respect these boundaries. No agent of the people may overleap the bounds of delegated power. That is the essence of constitutional government and of our democratic system.

Long experience has led me to be skeptical of arguments by representatives of the Executive branch when they testify with respect to a dispute between Congress and the President, for they are then merely attorneys for a client, the President. It was for this reason that Justice Jackson dismissed his own prior statements in the capacity of Attorney General as mere advocacy, saying, a "judge cannot accept self-serving press statements for one of the interested parties as authority in answering a constitutional question, even if the advocate was himself."³ The Hansell-Erickson testimony did not serve to diminish my skepticism.

The effect of these hearings ranges beyond the Panama treaty. The Panama cession will constitute a landmark which, should the State Department prevail, will be cited down the years for "concurrent jurisdiction" of the President in the disposition of United States property. Acquiescence in such claims spells progressive attrition of Congressional powers; it emboldens the Executive to make ever more extravagant claims. I would remind you that Congressional acquiescence encourages solo Presidential adventures such as plunged us into the Korean and Vietnam wars. Congressional apathy fostered the expansion of executive secrecy. Then as now the State Department invoked flimsy "precedents," for example, the pursuit of cattle rustlers across the Mexican border, to justify presidential launching of a full scale war.⁴ If Congress slumbers in the face of such claims it may awaken the Samson shorn of his locks.

Earlier judicial statements that this or the other executive practice has been sealed by long-continued Congressional acquiescence⁵ need to be reexamined in light of more recent judicial opinions, more conformable to the Constitution, that Congress may not abdicate its powers,⁶ and a fortiori, it cannot lose them by disuse,⁷ that usurpation can not be legitimated by repetition.⁸ Senatorial insistence on respect for constitutional boundaries will warn the Executive against encroachments on Congress' powers; it will alert foreign nations to the fact that treaties for the cession of United States property must be subject to the consent of the full Congress.

Mr. Erickson, addressing himself to the question whether Article IV, Section 2 (3), "pursuant to which Congress has the power to dispose of property of the United States is an exclusive grant of legislative power to the Congress or whether the Congress and the President and the Senate, through the treaty power, share that authority," handsomely states "the answer to this question is not simple and although free from doubt."⁹ That doubt counsels against encroachment on a power explicitly conferred on Congress; a clear case for establishment of "concurrent jurisdiction" is needed in the teeth of that express grant.

In support of the claim that the President and Senate enjoy "concurrent power" to dispose of United States property. Messrs. Hansell and Erickson invoke a melange of dicta, without weighing even stronger statements that Congress' disposal power is "exclusive." Thus the Supreme Court declared that Article IV "implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property which could interfere with this right or obstruct its exercise."¹⁰ Echoing such judicial statements, an opinion of the Attorney General stated in 1899 that "The power to dispose permanently of the public lands and public property in Puerto Rico rests in Congress, and in the absence of a statute conferring such power, can not be exercised by the Executive Department of the Government."¹¹

Such statements respond to two cardinal rules of construction. First there is the rule that express mention signifies implied exclusion, which the Supreme Court has employed again and again: "When a statute limits a thing to be done in a particular mode, it includes the negative of any other mode."¹² The rule was invoked by the Founders; for example, Egbert Benson said in the First Congress, in which sat many Framers and Ratifiers, that "it cannot be rationally intended that all offices should be held during good behaviour, because the Constitution has declared [only] one office to be held by this tenure."¹³ The fact, emphasized by Hansell, that "The property clause contains no language excluding concurrent jurisdiction of the treaty power" is therefore of no moment. Having given Congress the power to dispose of public property, it follows that the President and Senate were "impliedly excluded" therefrom. Second there is the settled rule that the specific governs the general:

where there is in an act a specific provision relating to a particular subject, that provision must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the act, although the latter, standing alone, would be broad enough to include the subject to which the more particular provision relates.¹⁴

In terms of the present issue, the specific power of disposition governs the general treaty provision.

Under these rules it is of no avail that, according to Hansell, "there is no restraint expressed in respect to dispositions" in the treaty power itself. For this Mr. Hansell relies on Geofroy v. Riggs:

The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the . . . departments. . . .¹⁵

Only the treaty power is "expressed"; Geofroy does not call for express restraints—it suffices that they can be found in the Constitution. The "implied exclusion" is "found" in the Constitution by virtue of the express grant of disposal power to Congress under the rule of express mention, and of the fact that the general treaty power is limited by the special Congressional power of disposition. These principles are reflected in the Supreme Court's statement in Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States:

Since the Constitution places the authority to dispose of public lands exclusively in Congress, the Executive's power to convey any interest in the lands must be traced to Congressional delegation of its authority.¹⁶ To this the State Department responds that Sioux Tribe "did not deal with the relation between the treaty power and the Congressional power under Article IV, Section 3, cl. 2," Hansell labelled it "dicta."¹⁷ By this test the Hansell-Erickson collection of dicta falls to the ground, for almost all were not uttered in the context of that relation.

The Executive branch employs a double standard—what is dictum when the language is unfavorable to it becomes Holy Writ when the dictum reads in its favor. Erickson, for example, tells us that—

"Jones against Meehan is cited as an example by reason of the quote and the language there, which it seems to me is of significance, irrespective of the particular facts involved."¹⁸

Messrs. Erickson and Hansell can not have it both ways. In truth, dicta carry little weight when a particular issue has not been decided. Chief Justice Marshall dismissed his own dicta in Marbury v. Madison when they were pressed upon him in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 399 (1821), on the ground that dicta do not receive the careful consideration accorded to the question "actually before the court." The statements here quoted respecting "exclusivity" carry weight because they reflect traditional canons of construction. The foregoing considerations should suffice to dispose of a number of other Hansell-Erickson arguments for "concurrent jurisdiction," but I shall consider them for the sake of completeness.

To escape from the exclusivity of Congress disposal power Mr. Erickson argues: "To begin with, Article IV, Section 3, clause 2, uses the same terminology, 'Congress shall have power,' as Article I, Section 8, which in our opinion, permits treaty provisions relating to such matters to be self-executing [i.e., without Congressional action], at least to the extent that the inherent character of the power or other constitutional provisions do not make the power exclusive to Congress."¹⁹

Erickson's qualification is a concession that some Article I powers can not be concurrently exercised by the President. The Department of State concedes that "treaties may [not] impose taxes."²⁰ Why is that power more "inherently" exclusive than such other Article I, Section 8 powers as the power to establish post offices, to provide and maintain a navy, to declare war, to coin money, etc., all of which manifestly can not be exercised by treaty. Erickson proves too much.

Second, he urges:

"Article IV, Section 3, clause 2, is included in a portion of the Constitution which deals with the distribution of authority between the Federal and State governments. It does not purport to allocate powers exercisable by Congress or pursuant to treaty."²¹

But Section 3 (2) unmistakably does "allocate powers exercisable by Congress": "The Congress shall have power to dispose of . . . property belonging to the United States." Hansell argues that the placement of the property article in clause 4 . . . provides strong evidence that the property clause does not restrict the treaty power."²² That the "placement of a power in one or another Article is without significance for its scope is readily demonstrable: (a) "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason" is located in the Judiciary Article III; (b) Congress' powers to make "exceptions and regulations" respecting the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction is lodged in Article III, Section 2; (c) The provision that "Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors" is placed in the Executive Article II, Section 1 (4). Does this authorize the President by treaty to declare the punishment of treason, to regulate the Court's appellate jurisdiction, or to interpose in the choice of electors? Whether located in Article I or Article IV, "Congress shall have power" means on and the same thing—the power resides in Congress, not in the President. It needs constantly to be borne in mind that the President has circumvented Senate participation in treaty-making by affixing the label "Executive Agreements" to treaties, without constitutional warrant,²³ so that claims made on behalf of the Senate and the President can be turned to his own advantage.

Mr. Hansell also attaches significance to the close linkage between the Article IV "power to dispose" and "the power to make all needful rules and regulations" respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States, and cites Geofrey v. Riggs for the proposition that "the treaty power can be used to make rules and regulations governing the territory belonging to the United States, even in the District of Columbia."²⁴ Geofrey presented the question whether a citizen of France could take land in the District of Columbia by descent from a citizen of the United States. Local law withheld the right, but in keeping with national solicitude for protection of citizens abroad, a treaty provided for reciprocal rights of inheritance in such circumstances for citizens of both signatories. In consequence the treaty overrode the local provision; but this hardly stretches to the "making of rules and regulations" by treaty for the District of Columbia. Were this true, the President could by treaty take over the governance of the District of Columbia, in spite of the Article I, Section 8 (17) provision that "The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatever over such district." Assume notwithstanding that the treaty power does indeed comprehend the "making of rules and regulations governing the * * * District of Columbia," does the "close" linkage with the "power to dispose" comprehend a disposition of the White House by treaty? Such arguments verge on absurdity.

Messrs. Hansell and Erickson have cited a string of cases in support of "The power to dispose of public land * * * by treaty."²⁵ Some, such as Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. 211 (1872), and Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1 (1899), have frequently been cited in your hearings. Let me begin with Hansell's citation of Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920), for it quickly illustrates how farfetched are the State Department's interpretations. Missouri v. Holland arose out of a State challenge to the treaty with Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds which annually traversed parts of the United States and of Canada. Justice Holmes, addressing the argument that the treaty infringed powers reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, stated:

"Wild birds are not in the possession of any one, and possession is the beginning of ownership. The whole foundation of the State's rights is the presence within their jurisdiction of birds that yesterday had not arrived, tomorrow may be in another State, and in a week a thousand miles away."²⁶

Consequently the State could assert no "title" in migratory birds. By the same token, the United States could lay no claims to "ownership" of the birds, and Missouri v. Holland is therefore wholly irrelevant to the power by treaty to dispose of property belonging to the United States.

Holden v. Joy and Jones v. Meehan will repay close analysis because they involve Indian treaties which constitute one of the pillars of the argument, to quote Erickson, that "the United States can convey its title by way of self-executing treaty and that no implementing legislation is necessary."²⁷ To begin with Jones, both Hansell and Erickson quote: "It is well settled that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the Executive authority of the United States."²⁸ The treaty had "set apart from the tract hereby ceded [by the tribe] a reservation of six hundred and forty acres * * *" for an individual Indian; and the issue was what kind of title did he take. The Court quoted from an opinion of Attorney General Roger Taney, destined before long to succeed Chief Justice Marshall:

"These reservations are excepted out of the grant made by the treaty, and did not therefore pass with it; consequently the title remains as it was before the treaty; that is to say, the lands reserved are still held under the original Indian title."²⁹

The Court held that "the reservation, unless accompanied by words limiting its effect, is equivalent to a present grant of a complete title in fee simple."³⁰ That explanation presumably responded to the fact that tribal lands were generally held in common; individual titles were all but unknown, so that such title had to be secured through the machinery of the treaty. But that is far from a disposition of government land because, as Taney explained, the "reserved" title remained in the Indians. Many, if not most, of the cases of Indian treaties involve just such "reserve" provisions.³¹

The quotation from Holden v. Joy, Erickson acknowledges, is dictum; notwithstanding Hansell relies on it as "a clear statement of the law."³²

"It is insisted that the President and the Senate, in concluding such a treaty, could not lawfully covenant that a patent should be issued to convey lands which belonged to the United States without the consent of Congress, which cannot be admitted. On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political."³³

What bearing the last clause has on Congress' "power to dispose" of public lands escapes me; this Delphic utterance surely does not overcome the clear terms of Article IV. As to the "many authorities," the Court's citation could hardly be farther afield. To avoid cluttering this statement with a minute analysis of each case cited by the Court for the assertion that "a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title * * * without an act of Congress," I have abstracted them in an appendix attached hereto, so that you may see for yourself that half of the cases thus cited are altogether irrelevant, and that the rest concern "reserves" under which, as Taney observed, no title had passed to the United States but remained in the given

Indiana. In considering such dicta, it is well to bear in mind Chief Justice Taney's statement that the Court's opinion upon the construction of the Constitution is always open to discussion when it is supposed to have been founded in error, and that its judicial authority should hereafter depend altogether on the force of the reasoning by which it is supported.³⁴

By that standard the Holden dictum is no authority at all. The inappositeness of Holden is underscored by the facts. In May, 1828, and February, 1833, "the United States agreed to possess the Cherokees of seven million acres of land west of the Mississippi." It "was the policy of the United States to induce Indians . . . to surrender their lands and possessions to the United States and emigrate and settle in the territory provided for them in the treaties," so an exchange of land was provided. But a third treaty, that of December, 1835, proved necessary, whereby the Indians ceded their lands to the United States in consideration of $5,000,000 to be invested in the manner stipulated. The Indians considered that the prior treaties, confirmed by the new, did not contain a sufficient quantity of land, so the United States agreed to convey an additional tract in consideration of $500,000 to be deducted from the $5,000,000.³⁵ This may be viewed either as a purchase and sale or an exchange: "the Cherokees were competent to make the sale to the United States and to purchase the lands agreed to be conveyed to them . . ." And the transaction was authorized by the Act of 1830, which empowered the President to set aside land west of the Mississippi for the reception of such tribes as chose to emigrate, and to "exchange" such lands with any tribe.³⁶ The 1830 act served to ratify the Act of 1828, and "ratification is equivalent to original authority."³⁷ "It is well settled that Congress may . . . 'ratify . . . acts which it might have authorized' . . . and give the force of law to official action unauthorized when taken."³⁸ Although the subsequent 1833 and 1835 treaties differed in some particulars from the authorization, the purpose was the same—"to induce the Indians . . . to emigrate and settle in the country long before set apart for that purpose."³⁹ When, therefore, the Court, speaking to the contention that the President and the Senate "could not lawfully covenant that a patent should issue to convey lands which belonged to the United States without the consent of Congress," stated that "a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress conferring it," it was making a statement that was unnecessary to the decision, because Congress had authorized the conveyance.

As to other treaties, Hansell tells us, "the precedents look two ways." Some have been "contingent upon congressional authorization." The "precedents supporting the power to dispose of property by treaty alone," he states, "can be found in the boundary treaties with neighboring powers, especially in the treaties between the United States and Great Britain of 1842 and 1846 for the location of our northeast and northwest boundaries . . ." "Settlement of boundary disputes are not really cessions of United States property. The Oregon boundary dispute proceeded from an inflated claim: 'Fifty-Four Forty or Fight'; the British, on the other hand, claimed land down to the forty-second parallel. Only when the dispute was settled by treaty—at 49 degrees—could either party confidently assert that it had title."⁴¹ Consequently, as Samuel Crandall, a respected commentator, stated, "A treaty for the determination of a disputed line operates not as a treaty of cession, but of recognition."⁴²

Among other examples of alleged treaty transfers of property, Hansell instances the return to Japan of the Ryukyu Islands.⁴³ By Article III of the 1951 Treaty of Peace with Japan, the United States received the right to exercise "all and any powers of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of those islands. . . ." While Japan renounced in Article II, "all right, title and claim" to various territories, it made no similar renunciation with respect to the Ryukyus.⁴⁴ Quoting the Legal Advisor of the State Department, that "sovereignty over the Ryukyu Islands . . . remains in Japan . . .", a District Court stated that "Sovereignty over a territory may be transferred by an agreement of cession," but it concluded that there had been no cession.⁴⁵ The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals quoted a statement by Ambassador John Foster Dulles, a delegate to the Japanese Peace Conference, that the aim was "to permit Japan to retain residual sovereignty," and held that the treaty did not make "the island a part of the United States, and it remains a foreign country for purposes of" the Federal Tort Claims Act.⁴⁶

"In the history of transfers of property to Panama," Hansell tells us, "we have had a mixed practice."⁴⁷ By the 1903 Panama Convention, Panama granted to the United States "all the rights, power and authority within the Zone . . . which the United States would possess if it were the sovereign of the territory . . . to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority * * *⁴⁸ The words "if it were sovereign" signal an intent to stop short of a cession of sovereignty. That is confirmed by an Opinion of the Attorney General. Considering the Tariff Act levy of duties on articles imported "into the United States or into any of its possessions," he stated that "the Canal Zone is not one of the possessions of the United States within the meaning of that term as used by Congress in the tariff act, but rather is a place subject to the use, occupation, and control of the United States for a particular purpose."⁴⁹ In Luckenbach S.S. Co. v. United States, Chief Justice Taft stated, "Whether the grant in the treaty amounts to a complete cession of territory and dominion to the United States or is so limited as to leave titular sovereignty in the Republic of Panama, is a question which has been the subject of diverging opinions," which he found it unnecessary to decide,⁵⁰ and is therefore still open. Instead he relied on a "long continued course of legislation and administrative action [that] has operated to require that the ports in the Canal Zone are to be regarded as foreign ports within the meaning" of the Act governing the transport of "mail between the United States and any foreign port,"⁵¹ itself a hint that the Panama Treaty is no more a cession than the Japanese Treaty respecting the Ryukyus.

It does not follow, however, that the interests of the United States do not constitute "property of the United States." The grant of "use and occupation * * * in perpetuity" constitutes "property" no less than the familiar lease of realty for 99 years. Then there are the installations that cost billions of dollars. Disposition of these no less requires the consent of Congress than does that of territory. In 1942, the President by Executive Agreement promised to transfer certain installations to Panama subject, however, to Congressional approval.⁵² A similar provision is to be found in the Treaty of 1955.⁵³ These are executive constructions that speak against Messrs. Hansell and Erickson.

In sum, Messrs. Hansell and Erickson have failed to make out a case for "concurrent jurisdiction" with Congress in the disposition of United States property. If the President is to fly in the face of the express "power of Congress to dispose" it must be on a sounder basis than the arguments they have advanced. In my judgment, the Panama Treaty should contain a provision making it subject to approval of the Congress.

285 U.S. 204, 208 (1932): "General language of a statutory provision, although broad enough to include it, will not be held to apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same enactment." Buffum v. Chase Nat. Bank, 192 F.2d 58, 61 (7th Cir. 1951). In this light, the fact, stressed by Hansell, that the Framers contemplated that a treaty could affect "territorial" rights, Hansel 5, is not decisive, for the treaty would yet be subject to the special Congress "power to dispose." There is no evidence in the records of the Convention that the Framers intended in any way to curtail that power, or to give the President a share in it. Were the matter less clear, we should yet "prefer a construction which leaves to each element of the statute a function in some way different from the others" to one which causes one section to overlap another. United States v. Dinerstein, 362 F.2d 852, 855-856 (2d Cir. 1966).

Holden v. Joy: its citations for treaty power to dispose of property.

A. "Reserve" cases (title remains in Indians)

(1) United States v. Brooks, 51 U.S. (10 How.) 442 (1850).

Indian cession to United States; supplement to treaty provided that Grappe's representatives "shall have their right to the said four leagues of land reserved to them * * *" (450, 451). Held: treaty "gave to the Grappes a fee simple title to all the rights the [Indians] had in these lands * * *" (460).

(2) Doe v. Wilson, 64 U.S. (23 How.) 457 (1859). Indian treaty ceded land to United States, making reservations to individual Indians. "As to these, the Indian title remained as it stood before the treaty was made; and to complete the title to the reserved lands, the United States agreed that they would issue patents to the respective owners." (461-462).

(3) Crews v. Burcham, 66 U.S. (1 Black) 352 (1861). Cession by Indians with reserves (355). "The main and controlling questions involved in this case were before this court in the case of Doe v. Wilson, 23 How. 457 * * *" (356).

(4) Mitchel v. United States, 34 U.S. (9 Pet.) 711 (1835). Prior to the Spanish cession of Florida to the United States, the Indians had made a cession to Spain, "reserving to themselves full right and property" in certain lands. (749). Held: "by the treaty with Spain the United States acquired no lands in Florida to which any person had lawfully obtained" title. (734, 756). Issue: title of purchaser from Indians to reserved lands.

(5) The Kansas Indians, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 737 (1866). Treaty exchange of lands; Indians reserved lands for each individual (739, 741). Issue: was such land taxable by Kansas.

B. Irrelevant Cases:

(1) Meigs v. McClung, 13 U.S. (9 Cranch) 11 (1815). Held: land claimed from defendants did not lie within territory ceded to the United States by the Indians. (17).

(2) Wilson v. Wall, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 83 (1967). Treaty provided that certain Indians would be entitled to 640 acres for self, and additional acres, roughly speaking, for each child. (84). Issue: whether an Indian held land governed by the latter clause in trust for his children. (86). Court said "Congress has no constitutional power to settle the rights under treaties except in cases purely political," (89) the clause quoted in Holden v. Joy. The reason, it explained, was that "The Construction of them is the peculiar province of the judiciary * * *". id. In other words, interpretations of treaties is for the courts.

(3) American Insurance Co. v. Canter, 26 U.S. (1Pet.) 511 (1828). Insurer brought a libel in the District Court, South Carolina, to obtain restitution of 356 bales of cotton carried by ship that was wrecked on the Florida coast. A Florida territorial court had earlier awarded 76 percent salvage to salvors, who sold the Canter. (540). Issue: did the territorial court have jurisdiction. No mention of grant by United States.

(4) Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 515 (1832). Worcester, a white missionary was convicted of residing within Indian territory without a State license. The treaty with the Indians placed them under the protection of the United States, gave it the sole right of "managing all their affairs." Held: the Georgia act can have no force in the Indian territory. (561).

(5) Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253 (1829). Re grants made in the ceded territory by Spain prior to January 24, 1815, the article provides "that those grants shall be ratified and confirmed like Indian "reserves * * * the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be by the Act of the Legislature," i.e. Congress. (314-315).

Some additional Hansell citations for power to dispose by treaty.

(1) Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957). Military Code provided for trial by court martial of "all persons * * * accompanying the armed forces" of the United States in foreign countries. Wife of Army Sergeant convicted by court martial in England of his murder. Held: Bill of Rights requires jury trial after indictment.

(2) Asakura v. Seattle, 265 U.S. 322 (1924). Seattle ordinance restricted pawnshop license to United States citizen. (339-340). Japanese attacks as violation of treaty provision: citizens or subjects of each signatory "shall have liberty * * * to carry on trade, wholesale and retail * * * upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects * * *" (340). Held: can't deny the Japanese equal opportunity. (342).

(3) Santovincenza v. Egan, 284 U.S. (1931). Italian subject dies in New York, leaving no heirs or next of kin. (351). Italian consul claims under "most favored nation" treaty clause. Held: The treaty-making power is broad enough" to cover "the disposition of the property of aliens dying within the territory of the respective parties * * *". Any "conflicting law of the State must yield." (40)

iii

Some additional Erickson citations for self-executing treaty conveyances.

(1) Francis v. Francis, 203 U.S. 233 (1906). Indian treaty ceded land to United States, but reserved certain tracts for use of named persons. (237). Quotes Jones v. Meehan; when treaty makes "a reservation of a specified number of sections of land * * * the treaty itself converts the reserved sections into individual property * * *" (238). It was in these circumstances that the Court said, "a title in fee may pass by treaty without the aid of an act of Congress, and without a patent," (241-241) the reason being that title to the reserved land remained in the Indians.

(2) Best v. Polk, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 112 (1873). By Indian treaty "reservation of a limited quantity [of land] were conceded to them. (113). One section "had been located to an Indian." (113, 116). Thereafter, the United States issued a patent to James Brown. Held (117), "the Indian reservee was held to have a preference over the subsequent patentee."

ADDENDUM TO STATEMENT BY RAOUL BERGER BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

The statement by Attorney General Griffin B. Bell (hereafter cited as A.G.) before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 29, 1977, reached me on Saturday afternoon, October 29, 1977, too late for inclusion of my comments in the body of my statement. Only three points made by the Attorney General seem to me to call for additional comment, and of these I shall speak in turn.

i

The Percheman Case

The Attorney General cites United States v. Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 511, 88-89 (1833) to prove that "the Court held self-executing certain clauses of the Florida Treaty with Spain which related to the regulation of property rights in newly acquired territory." A. G. at p. 10. At the cited pages it appears that Article 8 of the treaty provided:

"All the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty * * * in the said territory ceded by his Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands * * *

This Article, Chief Justice Marshall remarked, "must be intended to stipulate expressly for that security of private property which the laws and usages of nations would, without express stipulation, have conferred * * * Without it (Article 8), the title of individuals would remain as valid under the new government as they were under the old * * * the security of (pre-existing) private property was intended by the parties * * *

In short, the treaty provided that prior Spanish grants to private persons should be ratified and confirmed, a provision far removed from presidential "regulation" of public territory. Moreover, Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 314-315 (1829), a case cited by the Attorney General (A.G. at p. 3), held with respect to the self-same provision that "the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be by the Act of the Legislature," i.e. Congress. The citation to Percheman illustrates why I approach an Attorney General's statement with something less than awe.

Remarks in the Legislative History of the Constitution

(1) The Attorney General asserts that "the members of the Convention were fully aware of the possibility that a treaty might dispose of the territory or property of the United States," (A.G. at p. 5). He begins with the remark of George Mason in the Constitutional Convention: "The Senate by means of a treaty might alienate territory etc. without legislative sanction." A.G. at p. 6; 2 Farrand 297. This was during a debate on a resolution that "Each House shall possess the right of originating bills," when Mason seconded Strong's motion to "except bills for raising money for the purposes of revenue, or for appropriating the same." The Senate, said Mason, "could already sell the whole Country by means of Treaties," plainly an extravagant overstatement, made at a time when the treaty was not under discussion. His "alienate territory" remark may merely represent a strategic retreat from his untenable "sell the whole country" remark.

There follow a group of utterances that have reference to boundary disputes, i.e. conflicting claims to ownership to be settled by treaties of peace.

(2) When the treaty power was under discussion, Williamson and Spaight moved "that no Treaty of Peace affecting territorial rights should be made without concurrence of two thirds of the [members of the Senate present]." A.G. at p. 6; 2 Farrand 543. Similarly, Gerry, speaking for a greater proportion of votes on "treaties of peace," said that here:

"The dearest interests will be at stake, as the fisheries, territories, etc. In treaties of peace also there is more danger to the extremities of the Continent" has reference to boundary disputes which do not really involve territory owned by the United States.

(3) "Sherman and Morris proposed but did not formally move," the Attorney General states, "the following proviso:

"But no treaty (of peace) shall be made without the concurrence of the House of Representatives, by which the territorial boundaries of the United States may be contracted * * *"

A.G. at p. 6; 4 Farrand 58. Farrand adds that "The subject was then debated, but the motion does not appear to have been made." Id. Why was the motion not made after debate? Presumably, the matter was postponed for consideration with Article IV. Section 3(2) would come up for discussion. During this subsequent discussion of "The Legislature shall have power to dispose of * * * the territory * * *", it is singular that no mention was made of an exception for disposition under the treaty power. 2 Farrand 466. Non-mention is the more remarkable because such an exception would carve out an area of undefined magnitude from the power conferred, a matter which would affront the democratically minded who placed their faith in the House. It seems more reasonable to infer from the history that Article IV, Section 3(2) was designed to set at rest the fears that territory might be ceded without the concurrence of the House.

(4) The Attorney General cites an amendment proposed by the Virginia Ratification Convention as exhibiting the "awareness of the Founding Fathers that the Constitution authorizes self-executing treaties disposing of the territory and property of the United States":

"No commercial treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of the members of the Senate [not merely of those present]; and no treaty ceding, contracting * * * the territorial rights or claims of the United States * * * shall be made, but in cases of extreme necessity; nor shall any such treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively."

A.G. at p. 7; 3 Elliot. Debates on the Federal Constitution 660. The Attorney General's reading paradoxically transforms Virginia's anxiety to have greater safeguards, i.e., three-fourths of both Houses rather than the bare majority that satisfies Article IV, into an argument for excluding the House altogether. Like the earlier remarks, the Virginia proposal testifies to the importance that the Founders attached to the disposition of territory—no cession except "in cases of extreme necessity"—and it counsels against reading the equivocal "treaty-making" to encroach upon the "power to dispose" that requires the vote of both Houses, not merely the Senate. In any event, it may be asked, should the post-Convention view of one State be permitted to override the plain terms of Article IV.

(5) Hugh Williamson, a delegate to the Convention, wrote to Madison some nine months after its close, to recall to him "a Proviso in the new Sistem which was inserted for the express purpose of preventing a majority of the Senate * * * from giving up the Mississippi. It is provided that two-thirds of the members present in the Senate shall be required in making treaties. * * *"

A.G. at p. 7-8; 3 Farrand 306-307. The Mississippi presented a gnawing boundary question which threatened the expansion of the West and was only settled by the Louisiana Purchase. Boundary treaties do not really involve the disposition of territory or property of the United States but the adjustment of conflicting claims, even when some believe their claims to be more valid than those of the opposing party.

To my mind, the history is at best inconclusive; the remarks quoted by the Attorney General are confined to adjustment of boundary disputes, with one exception, by treaties of peace. Treaties of peace present special problems, and such citations do not add up to general concurrent jurisdiction over the disposition of government territory or property. To go beyond such territorial adjustments collides with the rationale of Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 554-555 (1967). With respect to the common law immunity of judges from suit for acts performed in their official capacity, the Court declared:

"We do not believe that this settled principle was abolished by Section 1983, which makes liable 'every person' who under color of law deprives another of his civil rights * * * we presume that Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish the doctrine."

Thus, the all-inclusive "every person" was held not to curtail an existing common law immunity in the absence of a specific provision. The more equivocal treaty-making power demands an even more exacting standard. Before it be concluded that it in any way diminishes the explicit grant to Congress of "power to dispose" of territory, a clearly expressed intention to do so is required. That requirement is not satisfied by the random remarks collected by the Attorney General.

The Attorney General concedes that:

"The specific power granted to the House of Representatives and Congress in fiscal matters (Article I, Section 7, clause 1 and Article I, Section 9, clause 7, money bills and appropriations power) preclude making treaties self-executing to the extent that they involve the raising of revenue or the expenditure of funds. Were it otherwise, President and Senate could bypass the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the pursestrings."

A. G. at p. 4-5. Now, sections nine and seven are couched in quite dissimilar terms. One, Section 9(7), is framed in terms of flat prohibition: "No money shall be withdrawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. * * *" Section 7 (1), on the other hand, merely provides that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House." Yet, the Attorney General reads Section 7(1) to preclude the President and Senate from "bypass[ing] the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the pursestrings." What is there that distinguishes "All bills * * * shall originate in the House" from "The Congress shall have power to dispose. * * *"? The impalpability of the distinction is underlined by the State Department's concession that "treaties may [not] impose taxes." Nothing in this Article I, Section 8(1) "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes" distinguishes it from the Article IV "The Congress shall have power to dispose. * * *"

If the President may not by treaty "bypass" the power of the House to originate revenue-raising bills, or the power of Congress to tax, no more may he "bypass" its "power to dispose" of the territory and property of the United States.

FORMER SECRETARY OF JOINT UNITED STATES-PANAMA LAND COMMISSION SPEAKS ON U.S. TITLE TO LANDS IN CANAL ZONE

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, many people have been trying to perpetrate the myth that the United States somehow "stole" the Canal Zone or did not pay the fair value for it. The truth of the matter is that we paid Panama $10 million in gold, and we paid France $40 million for the improvements France had erected in its bankrupt failure to build a canal. We also paid all individual property owners in the Canal Zone for their individual rights.

Nor did we simply pay property owners who held authentic titles in the sense of Anglo Saxon law. We bent over backwards to insure that even squatters were paid for their improvements.

Mr. President, I know this is a fact because one of my constituents, Mr. J. C. Luitweiler of Tryon, N.C., now 87 years of age, was the secretary of the Joint Land Commission by means of which property owners in the Canal Zone were compensated.

He has written me an extremely interesting and important letter testifying to his firsthand knowledge of what transpired in this situation. The letter in itself is an historical document that contributes to our knowledge of those events.

I want to thank Mr. Luitweiler for taking the time to share with me his intimate knowledge of those historical facts.

I might also add, Mr. President, that every one of the titles thus transferred is registered in the U.S. district court in Balboa and is available there for inspection by any interested parties. I understand that duplicates are also in Archives in the United States. Let no one then say that we seized the territory and did not pay just compensation. The facts are otherwise.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter sent to me by Mr. Luitweiler be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Hon. JESSE HELMS,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HELMS: I listened recently to your and Senator Thurmond's interview on Station 4 on the Panama Canal proposed treaty. There is so much published about this matter which is grossly inaccurate, that I'm glad you had this interview.

We didn't take or buy the Canal Zone from the Republic of Panama. By treaty with Panama we agreed to pay Panama $25 million for the right to continue the construction of the Canal the French had started. In addition we made a deal with the French to acquire whatever rights they had. Ownership by our government of the land of the Canal Zone came about much later by reason of the terms of the treaty with Panama, which gave us the right to acquire by expropriation whatever land and property the United States considered necessary for the construction, maintenance and defense of the Canal. It wasn't until 1913 that Col. Goethals, the builder of the Canal, asked President Taft to invoke this provision of the treaty to acquire all of the Canal Zone land. The Canal Zone was flanked by an almost impenetrable jungle. Col. Goethals had the idea that allowing the Canal Zone itself to return to its original jungle state would be the best defense the Canal could have against outside attack.

So, again according to this treaty with Panama, a joint commission was set up, consisting of two Americans and two Panamanians, a judicial body to evaluate the value of the land and property expropriated. It was a procedure similar to the well-known right of eminent domain whereby an American state condemns land and pays the owners for it when it desires to put through a superhighway. There was nothing high-handed about this. In fact it had the whole hearted approval of the then government of Panama. The President of Panama appointed two outstanding Panamanians (incidentally who had been at one time presidential candidates) to be members of this Joint Land Commission. As a clear indication that it had the full approval of the government of Panama at that time, the President of Panama offered the Commission the use, without payment, of the legislative assembly hall for its court hearings, and additional quarters in the Panamanian government palace for the judges' chambers and offices for the Secretariat of the Commission. The writer of this letter was appointed by the two American and Panamanian members as the Secretary of the Commission. As Secretary he sat in all the court proceedings and attended the deliberations in the Commission's chambers and signed the many orders of payments "By order of the Commission". At the age of 87 I am perhaps the only one alive who has personal knowledge of these happenings.

Col. Goethals, in the building of the Canal, had virtually autocratic powers on the Canal Zone. When the American Commissioners first arrived from the North, he offered to provide the Commission quarters at his headquarters on the Zone. He had fully expected that the Commission would be under his thumb and would follow his dictates as did everyone else working in the Canal Zone. This was countered by Dr. L. S. Rowe, the first president named by the Commission, who told Col. Goethals that the Commission was a judicial body and in no sense under his direction. So the relations between Col. Goethals and the Commission from the outset were strained and became stormy as the year passed.

The first and underlying issue that arose was the question whether the Commission would apply the laws of the United States or the Spanish Civil Law which was the law of Panama. Col. Goethals had been advised by his attorney, Judge Feuille, that the thousands of squatters scattered over the Canal Zone had no title to their homes they had established and could be evicted at will by the Canal Zone authorities. Under American law squatters do not acquire title except after 30 years of adverse possession. Thousands of negroes from the Caribbean islands had come to work first for the French and had continued to work for the Americans. But there were few indeed who had been on the Zone for 30 years. In contrast, under the Civil Law of Panama squatters cannot be evicted except upon payment of the value of their improvements.

The Commission debated for a month or more this question whether they would apply the American law or the Spanish Civil law. The Panamanian members of the Commission were very able men. They spread before the two American Commissioners (both of whom spoke Spanish) law books to make their point that the Spanish Civil law should govern. The Americans finally accepted the Panamanians' views and it was announced that anyone living on the Canal Zone should be paid fully for what they owned before eviction. Moreover, once the Americans conceded the point, they went along with the Panamanians that the payments should be generous and also that humanitarian considerations should enter into the fixing of the award.

I can recall as though it were yesterday the rules they laid down. A mud thatch hut which can be erected almost overnight, should be given a value of $50. Small plantings of an orchard of a few banana and other fruit trees should be paid for with another $50. If there was a wife and children, another $50 should be added for each of them. And finally, if the squatter was a Panamanian citizen, the award should be doubled. To avoid cluttering the court's calendar with the testimony of thousands of small claimants, the application of this formula was delegated to the Secretary. After he had established the facts, the Secretary would present to the Commission the names of the claimants and the schedule of payments due him, which would be approved by the full Commission and the awards would be published: "By order of the Commission—J. C. Luitweiler, Secretary".

When the decision of the Commission first became known to the Zone authorities it aroused the wrath of Col. Goethals. Agents were sent out all over the Zone to evict squatters and burn down their homes. Another measure was taken, applied especially to small towns that had sprung up, to have the occupants of buildings sign leases that gave the lessor, the Canal Zone authorities, the right to evict tenants on short notice.

To counter these actions by the Zone authorities, the Commission's Secretary was authorized to employ agents of the Commission to canvas the Zone, taking the names of occupants of buildings and the primitive huts, note the number in the family and list their possessions. Most of the reports that came back to the Secretariat were very simple: Name and number of occupants and mud, thatch hut and a few banana trees.

There was of course the hullabaloo over this, but the Panamanian populace loudly acclaimed the Commission for its generous treatment of the evictees. Payments of the claims were duly and promptly honored the very day they were presented to the Zone's Disbursing Office. In total amount these small claims probably amounted to hundreds of thousands of dollars, but this was a pittance compared with the cost of the Canal project costing hundreds of millions.

Of course, the American members of the Commission and its Secretary soon became persona non grata to Col. Goethals. At the end of the year the Secretary, stricken with a severe case of malaria, was invalidated home. The two American members of the Commission resigned in disgust and went home also. The work of the Commission was still far from finished. So Col. Goethals had two other Americans named in replacement, men more of his own persuasion! The Secretary wasn't invited back! When this new Commission reconvened, there were some large cases on the calendar, such as a large cocoa plantation owned by an English firm, which the old Commission had had before it and had considered the amount of the claim exorbitant.

The new Commission quickly deadlocked. Pursuant to the provision of the treaty in such case the Spanish government was authorized to appoint an arbiter, which was done, naming a Spanish Admiral who had faced the Americans in the Cuban war. I do not know precisely what was the final outcome, but I'm sure it wasn't favorable to the Americans.

It should be clear from this recital that all the property on the Zone was expropriated and paid for by the U.S. Government. There was no "high-handed taking" of the Canal Zone. At the time the Canal was opened (1914), the Panamanians were very happy with the outcome. In subsequent years when I passed through Panama en route to South America on several trips I never heard any complaints that the Americans had mistreated Panama or its people. In fact, the Panamanians were the chief beneficiaries of the building of the Canal and the resulting commerce.

Cordially yours,

J. C. LUITWEILER.

OUR CONSTITUENTS ORGANIZE FOR THE CANAL TREATIES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the breadth of the experience and political philosophies of supporters of the Panama Canal Treaties is very impressive. The membership of the recently organized Committee of Americans for the Canal Treaties, Inc. reflects this diversity among those who believe that ratification of the new treaties is in the best interests of the United States. Of the 157 committee members to date, just those currently or formerly of my State of California bears out this observation: Serving on the committee are former President Gerald Ford, who currently resides in California; Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley; former Secretary of the Treasury George P. Shultz; the Honorable Shirley Temple Black; Lew Wasserman, president of MCA; businessmen and philanthropists Armand Hammer and Norton Simon; the Honorable William S. Mailliard, former U.S. Congressman from San Francisco and Marin County; and John Calhoun of Mill Valley.

I welcome the establishment of this committee and I am proud of the participation in it by Californians. This Committee of Americans not only demonstrates broad bipartisan support for the treaties, but will work actively to educate the American public about the treaties and their implications for the United States and Panama. A continuing educational effort is necessary, I believe, because a recent Gallup survey, reported in the Washington Post on October 23, 1977, revealed "a serious lack of knowledge about the treaties, with about 4 in 10 Americans aware that the United States has the right to defend the canal, only about one in four aware that the canal is to be turned over in the year 2000, and only about one in seven aware that aircraft carriers and supertankers cannot use the canal."

I am certain every Member of the Senate is aware of the tremendous interest in and need for information about this issue from the great number of requests from constituents for copies of the treaties and answers to specific questions about them. The first advertisement by the Committee of Americans for the Canal Treaties, Inc. begins this educational process by pointing out that, from Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower to Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter, American Presidents have seen the need for a new Panama Canal Treaty:

Thirteen years ago, President Lyndon Johnson conferred with ex-Presidents Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower. They all agreed that a new treaty was needed to insure our country's interests in the Panama Canal as a secure passage-way from ocean-to-ocean.

Every President since—Republican and Democrat—has actively pursued this goal.

Our Presidents knew that a new Panama treaty would be in the best interests of every American and would make for a stronger America.

Ratification of the new treaties will prove a dramatic step forward in U.S.-Latin American relations, and enhance U.S. prestige around the world—while protecting our nation's real interests.

The treaties, now before the Senate, provide for continuous U.S. operation of the Canal—through a U.S. agency—until the end of the century. We will keep all the military bases we need to defend the Canal. And, starting with the year 2000, our permanent right to protect the Canal will continue.

Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, a vigorous advocate of a strong national defense, summed up his support this way:

"These treaties fully serve and greatly promote our national security interests. The Joint Chiefs of Staff share that view. These treaties deal with today's realities; and, they provide the security we need for the future."

Yes, the U.S. permanently retains the right to defend the Canal * * * and, the U.S. Navy will always go to the head of the line to pass through the Canal in time of emergency.

Like any nation today, Panama expects to exercise its sovereignty over all its territory. The new treaties meet Panama's just aspirations—while guaranteeing America's right to protect our real interests in an open, safe, and efficient Canal. The treaties will give Panama greater economic benefits from the operation of the Canal—but these benefits will come from Canal tolls and revenues, not from the U.S. taxpayer.

These are some of the reasons why the new treaties are supported by people throughout the country—from all walks of life and of different political philosophies. People like John Wayne, George Meany, General Matthew Ridgway, William F. Buckley, Jr., Vernon Jordan, Shirley Temple Black, Margaret Truman Daniel, General Maxwell Taylor, Governor Jerry Apodaca, James J. Kilpatrick, and Shana Alexander.

Mr. President, the broad and bipartisan membership of the Committee of Americans for the Canal Treaties, Inc., should be of interest to my colleagues. I ask unanimous consent that the list of members from the committee's advertisement be printed in the Record. I note that additional people join the committee daily.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—NO. 24

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in paragraph 6 of article IV of the Executive Agreement in Implementation of Article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty, the following language appears:

Since the Republic of Panama is a signatory to the Latin American Denuclearization Treaty (Tlatelolco), the United States shall emplace no type of nuclear armament on Panamanian territory.

In my judgment, Mr. President, this provision could have very great adverse effect on the strategic defense posture of the United States, yet this provision has been carefully salted away by our negotiators in this little-known clause in one of the many executive agreements, annexes to executive agreements, annexes to annexes, agreed minutes, protocols, exchanges of letters, and unsigned understandings which in sum contain the real meat of the Panama Canal Treaty rather than the provisions of the treaty itself. So, buried in this obscure executive agreement, which I doubt that more than a handful of people in the country have actually had an opportunity to examine—we find buried in this executive agreement a major military provision directly affecting the strategic defense both of the Panama Canal and of the United States.

Now, I am reasonably sure that the administration, and certainly the Department of State, would assert that this provision buried away here in this lengthy executive agreement could have no adverse effect on the defense of the United States or of the canal and, in fact, I have little doubt that representatives from the Department of Defense might readily parrot the same point of view. Certainly, the leadership down at the Department of Defense has shown no reluctance to follow precisely the lead of the Department of State; but, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States is entrusted with the duty of making an independent judgment with respect to all aspects of these proposed treaties, notwithstanding the various advocacy positions adopted by certain of the departments in the executive branch.

So we have a duty in the Senate to make an independent judgment, based on all of the information available to us, on the effect and on the potential effect of this peculiar and highly significant prohibition hidden away in this executive agreement of some 53 pages—longer than both treaties combined, Mr. President—and I am not even including in that page count this 53-page executive agreement. Sharp eyes, Mr. President, are required for this job, I can assure you, but there it is buried away in this executive agreement that the Latin American Denuclearization Treaty would prohibit the United States from having at any time any nuclear weapons in Panama or what is now the U.S. Canal Zone.

On October 31, 1977, this Monday just past, Mr. President, Egyptian authorities refused to allow the British nuclear submarine HMS Dreadnought to pass through the Suez Canal. This British nuclear submarine was on its way through the Suez Canal on an official voyage to visit Iran. The Dreadnought was part of a task force on this official visit of state.

You know, Mr. President, if you leave Great Britain by sea and you wish to go to Iran, the best route, rather obviously, is through Gibraltar, through the Mediterranean, through the Suez Canal, and on into the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. You do not have to be much of a navigator to figure that out. But, Mr. President, the British nuclear submarine Dreadnought is not going to take that route because the Egyptians have let the British know that the canal is not open to the nuclear submarine Dreadnought. So, Mr. President, if the Dreadnought is still proceeding to Iran, then the Dreadnought is going around Africa, and Africa, Mr. President, is a right large land mass. Perhaps we here in the Senate could mark the progress of the Dreadnought if we could obtain that information. It might be interesting for us to follow her majestic voyage past the Canary Islands, around the Gold Coast, down into the Bight of Biafra, on around past the Congo, past Angola, past South West Africa, past Capetown, back up around Mozambique, past Madagascar and four or five other countries along the way, past Somalia, and back again where she would have been several weeks or months before at the entrance to the Red Sea—at the other entrance, Mr. President, to the Suez Canal.

So the Dreadnought, Mr. President, has got quite a voyage ahead of her—those nuclear reactors in the Dreadnought are sure going to work overtime, Mr. President—if she indeed wishes to represent the United Kingdom on this official visit to Iran. I would venture the guess, Mr. President, that the Dreadnought may find it impossible—nuclear reactor or not—to make her rendezvous there at the entrance to the Red Sea with the other ships of the Royal Navy in this task force en route to Iran. The Dreadnought is going to have to be a very amazing vessel to catch up with those other non-nuclear-powered ships that the Egyptians did permit to pass through the canal.

Now, Mr. President, I regret as much as anyone the embarrassment which must have been suffered by our good ally, the Government of the United Kingdom. I regret very much that HMS Dreadnought was forced to wait at the northern end of the Suez Canal for a period of several days while the rest of the Royal Navy Task Force she accompanied was allowed through the canal to complete this official visit to Iran. But, Mr. President, there is a lesson to be learned here for the United States. The lesson is a very clear lesson, and the lesson taught should be heard loud and clear.

Perhaps, therefore, Mr. President, it would be helpful to examine the position in this incident asserted by the Government of Egypt. Egypt, Mr. President, simply told the British that passage of nuclear vessels through the Suez Canal would be barred until the signing of an international agreement on safety measures and security guarantees for such vessels. That was it, Mr. President. That was, at least, the reason the Egyptians gave to the press. No prediction was made about when such an agreement might be signed nor about the number of nations which would be required to sign it. But one thing is sure, Mr. President, and that is that the Dreadnought did not proceed through the Suez Canal.

I would like to remind the Senate of the voyage of another vessel, the recollection of which I believe should be of value. I refer to the voyage of the battleship Oregon from the west coast of the United States around the Horn of South America and on into the Atlantic and then the Caribbean where the Oregon played a vital role in the victory of the United States in the Spanish American War. There was no Panama Canal then, Mr. President, and every American was caught up in the excitement of the journey of this great warship as she progressed around the entire land mass of South America in an effort to reach the Caribbean in time to affect the outcome of battle in favor of our country. The cruise of the Oregon lasted 70 days, Mr. President, and while I am sure the Dreadnought is faster than the old Oregon and while I recognize that a different continent is involved, the principles are identical and the distances are equally overwhelming.

How long would it be, Mr. President, before the pro-Marxist dictatorship in Panama decided—should these proposed treaties be ratified—how long would it be before the Panamanian dictator decided that it would be convenient to interpret this executive agreement provision I have quoted so as to justify the prohibition of the passage of a U.S. nuclear-powered or nuclear-armed warship? The provision reads this way—and I quote it again because I believe this is an important point which cannot be overlooked, and I might say that I am going to make sure that it is not overlooked because it is a very important point—this provision reads as follows:

The United States shall emplace no type of nuclear armament on Panamanian territory.

How long would it be before the Panamanian dictatorship interprets the Spanish text of this provision as a prohibition on the passage of U.S. nuclear war vessels? How long would it be before this pro-Communist government in Panama decides that its adherence to the Latin American Denuclearization Treaty makes it imperative to divert all U.S. nuclear warships seeking to transmit the Isthmus of Panama? How long would it be, Mr. President, before this avowed ally of Communist Cuba determines, as have the Egyptians in the case of the British, that U.S. nuclear vessels may not pass through the canal until sufficient numbers of nations have signed some obscure international protocol on even more obscure alleged safety measures and so-called security guarantees respecting the passage of such ships?

On Saturday, Mr. President, I was honored to be the principal speaker at the launching of the nuclear submarine Birmingham (SSN 695). At that time, I expressed the hope that the Birmingham would be a symbol of our determination to resist tyranny and a symbol of the will and might of our good country. I addressed the distinguished guests, Mr. President, but I spoke to the workers in the shipyard when I said, "You have taken cold steel and made it live." I shared their pride in their great accomplishment, and I would share also their sorrow should they see the day when this magnificent vessel they constructed was turned away from her course by a petty gangster dictator who had obtained, through the ineptness and folly of our diplomats, a deathhold on our canal.

This is my final speech in a series of 24 speeches in this session of the 95th Congress, and I thank Senators for the attention they have given my remarks.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a wire service report under date of October 31, relating to the Dreadnought be printed in the Record, together with an article published in the San Diego Evening Tribune entitled "Admiral Opposes Canal Treaties."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CAIRO, Oct. 31.—Suez Canal authorities have refused to allow the British nuclear submarine Dreadnought through the canal at the request of the Egyptian Atomic Energy Commission, the semi-official newspaper Al-Ahram said today.

The report followed a statement yesterday by Egyptian harbor authorities denying any knowledge of the incident.

Al-Ahram quoted a senior Suez canal official as saying transit permission for the 3,588-ton Dreadnought had been refused because maritime regulations required ample prior notice and the request came at short notice.

The newspaper said Foreign Minister Mohammed Riad would explain the Egyptian position to the British ambassador in Cairo today.

It said Egypt had told all naval powers since 1974 that passage of all nuclear vessels through the canal would be barred until signing of an international agreement on safety measures and security guarantees for such ships.

The British defense ministry said yesterday that the Dreadnought has been at the northern end of the canal since Thursday when the rest of a royal navy task force en route to Iran for an official visit was allowed through the canal.

ADMIRAL OPPOSES CANAL TREATIES

(By Adm. Horacio Rivero)

The central issue can be narrowed to two questions.

Is the Panama Canal important to the security of the United States?

Will the security requirements be satisfied if the U.S. cedes the canal and zone to Panama?

Some proponents of the new Panama Canal treaties have deemphasized the strategic and commercial importance of the canal and its current value to our Navy.

The President, for instance, stated to the press: "Any large ship, an aircraft carrier, for instance, can no longer pass through it" and "In the last 12 months only four or five Naval vessels" have transited the canal.

Ambassador Sol Linowitz, one of the treaty negotiators, in his speech before the American Legion convention August 19, 1977, stated: "It is no longer vital, clearly no longer as useful as it once was for the shifting of combat forces."

The President was obviously misinformed. For it is not "any large ship" but only the 12 attack aircraft carriers, out of a naval inventory of almost 500 ships, that cannot use the canal, and it is not its utilization in normal peacetime that is important to the Navy, but the availability of the canal for redeployment of naval vessels in time of war or in time of crisis or in anticipation of war, as the international situation may demand.

In time of need some of the attack carriers can be redeployed around South America at high speed, taking advantage of their high endurance; those powered by oil might be accompanied by a fast replenishment ship (AOE) to insure their arrival with a full fuel load, while the three nuclearpowered ones could proceed on their own at an even higher speed. It is for the other types of naval vessels—the cruisers, destroyers, submarines, frigates, amphibious and mine warfare ships and logistic support ships which constitute the bulk of the Navy and do not have the great endurance at high speeds possessed by the attack carriers that the canal provides the greatest benefits. Of course it would be desirable for the attack carriers to be able to use the canal also; this can be made possible in the future by enlarging the canal locks or constructing additional, wider locks alongside the present ones, a project of reasonable magnitude. A sea level canal is not only not required, but would represent a fabulously expensive solution which would result in a canal infinitely more vulnerable than the present one.

A Navy like ours, which has been reduced in size to the point that it cannot be described as a two-ocean Navy, must have one means for quick and timely transfer of its ships from one ocean to the other, as demanded by strategic and operational needs. This is obviously important in wartime but equally important in periods of crisis or of international tension. The strategic mobility which is a characteristic of naval vessels and the ability to utilize this quality that we currently obtain from possession of the Panama Canal balance to a degree the risks inherent in the naval force level deficiencies. Without unquestionable assurance that the canal will be available under all and any circumstances, these risks would loom much larger.

The importance of the canal for "the shifting of combat forces" was well demonstrated in World War II and in the Korean and Vietnam conflicts. It has also been shown in time of crisis.

For instance, during the Cuban missile crisis, when military operations to remove the missiles by force were at one point imminent, it was possible to reinforce rapidly the Atlantic Fleet with a brigade of Marines from the Pacific, with their armament, ammunition, and full equipment, providing a most valuable addition to the Atlantic Fleet forces. If the canal had been in the hands of a government under Cuban or Soviet influence, or sympathetic to those countries, could the safe and timely passage of the ships have been assured in those circumstances?

To the opinion of Ambassador Linowitz is opposed that of four former chiefs of naval operations, one of whom had previously commanded the Atlantic and the Pacific fleets and later became chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In their words: "Contrary to what we read about the declining strategic and economic value of the canal, the truth is that this interoceanic waterway is as important, if not more so, to the United States than ever." It is doubtful if any knowledgeable naval officer would dispute their view.

The commercial importance to the canal is also great but it is secondary to the military aspect. Ships with beam of slightly more than 100 feet cannot use the locks, but they constitute but a small fraction of the merchant vessels of the world. In any event, the passage of both merchant and war vessels in normal time of peace is a matter of convenience, in that it permits the saving of time and money. It is a different matter in time of war, or in preparation for war operations.

The question remains whether the security requirement can be equally well satisfied by a regime of control and occupation different from the existing one—that is if the canal is neutralized and placed under the control of another country and the U.S. military presence is removed, which are the stated objectives of the new treaties.

The proposed Panama Canal Treaty provides for assumption of sovereignty over the Canal Zone by Panama six months after final ratification, but until Dec. 31, 1999, the U.S. will have primary responsibility for the security and defense of the canal and is authorized to maintain forces in the Republic of Panama for this purpose. During that period the U.S. will be in a position to enforce its rights of passage, even if the current for a future Panamanian government should choose to interfere with them, although our ability to prevent or thwart violent action against our personnel and property and against the canal will be substantially reduced because of the absence of the protection of a U.S.-occupied and owned zone. Thereafter only Panamanian military forces would protect the Canal.

The Canal Neutrality Treaty would become effective concurrently with the Canal Treaty and provides that the canal shall be open, both in peace and war, to the war vessels of all nations without distinction, including those of nations at war with the U.S.

From that date the U.S. would not be able legally to deny passage to vessels that may pose a threat to the U.S. and after 1999 it would have neither the legal right nor the in-place military capacity to do so.

It is argued by the proponents of the treaties that their ratification, the elimination of the Canal Zone and the phasing out of the U.S. military presence would enhance the security of the canal and the assurance of its availability to all. In the words of Ambassador Linowitz before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries: "The greatest danger to our security interest in the canal would be an effort to maintain and continue the present status." The implication is that it is the U.S. presence which gives rise to the security threats to the canal and that these threats would be reduced if the U.S. military presence were removed, and the canal neutralized.

The argument rests on the fear of sabotage and plots which might result from anti-American feeling generated by our continued presence in the Isthmus of Panama. Removal of our forces may reduce the causes of anti-American feeling, but will not necessarily remove the possibility of sabotage, either by disaffected Panamanians intent on changing their regime or by Soviet-inspired or other anti-American groups desiring to cause damage to the United States at a time of international crisis or in time of war, or would it remove the external threat. Rather, it would increase the probability that any sabotage attempted or any external attack would be successful.

There is also in the argument the underlying assumption that the security interests of the U.S. would be served by permanent neutralization of the canal. It is clear that the security interests of the U.S. demand that the availability of the canal for its own ships be assured and that it be denied to its enemies.

This in turn demands differentiation between use by the U.S. and use by its enemies or potential enemies whenever, in the sole judgment of the U.S. government, the security of the U.S. requires it. Such differentiation is incompatible with the principle of neutrality, would be made illegal by the Neutrality Treaty and after 1999 would be impracticable for the U.S. to effect.

It is argued that in time of war, through rersort to "force majeure," the U.S. could denounce or ignore the provisions of the treaty and effectively deny passage to enemy vessels, with or without Panamanian acquiescence or concurrence. (No one has suggested that this might be done in time of tension or in advance of hostilities, to prevent redeployment of potentially hostile ships.) If Panamanian agreement is obtained and as long as U.S. military forces remain within Panamanian territory this would be readily possible. After 1999 it would be necessary to reintroduce military forces, not into U.S. territory where they now are, but into the territory of the Republic of Panama under Panamanian terms and after inevitable delays.

A more likely scenario is one in which Panama would not agree to abrogation or violation of the treaty either in time of war or in periods of international tension which might or might not lead to war but which would demand the taking of prudent measures of increased security, including the denial of passage to potentially hostile ships. This scenario is assured if Panama should be under a Communist, Communist-oriented or neutralist government, and may occur even with a nominally friendly government in power which may wish to demonstrate its independence of dictation by the U.S.

In such circumstances the U.S. would be forced to take military measures against Panama in Panamanian territory in clear violation of that country's sovereignty, under conditions where our forces stationed there would be at a decided disadvantage.

After 1999 a full-scale invasion would be required which would undoubtedly succeed but might well result in the canal being rendered unusable for a protracted period, since Panama would be in position to damage or destroy key installations, including the locks and Gatun Dam, if it should choose to do so, before U.S. forces could be introduced to provide protection.

It has been maintained by proponents of the treaties that the U.S. will retain the right to intervene at any time to protect the canal. A careful reading of the treaties will disclose that they contain no provision whatsoever for intervention. Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty contains the following wording:

"The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the canal shall remain permanently neutral * * *"

Even if this wording were to be stretched to imply a U.S. right to intervene, it could only be claimed to enforced neutrality—since Panama will be the sovereign, and in actual possession of the canal after a certain date, a request for intervention would have to originate with Panama.

PANAMA CANAL TESTIMONY

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on October 28, 1977, the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers received the testimony of Mr. Karl Bendetsen on the subject of the Panama Canal Treaties. Mr. Bendetsen is well-known to many Senators, but I might mention that he was Under Secretary of the Army during the administration of President Truman and was for a period of many years Chairman of the Board of the Panama Canal Company. Mr. Bendetsen, after his service in Government, returned to private industry where he became chairman of the board and director of Champion International Corp., a company with facilities in many States and a company employing many thousands of American citizens. Mr. Bendetsen is both a lawyer and an engineer, and his life typifies the best in public service and private initiative.

Mr. Bendetsen's testimony before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers is, in my judgment, the best existing statement of all of the facts which ought to be considered in assessing the Panama Canal Treaties. The study he has given to this topic is truly remarkable, and the contribution he is making to the public discussion of this issue is invaluable.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Mr. Karl Bendetsen be printed in the Record so that it will be easily available to the Congress and to interested members of the public.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT RE PROPOSED CANAL ZONE TREATIES

(By Karl R. Bendetsen)

I. INTRODUCTION

By way of introduction, between 1948 and 1952, I served as Under Secretary of the Army. Among my many duties was that of Chairman of the Panama Canal Company. By delegation from The President of the United States to the Secretary of the Army and from him to me, I was made the responsible agent for supervising the reorganization of the Canal Zone and its activities pursuant to an Act of Congress, Public Law 841, 81st Congress, 2nd Session (64 Stat. 1038) approved September 26, 1950. This Act, adopted under the leadership of former Congressman Clark W. Thompson of Texas, constituted the first basic change in the permanent Canal operating organization from that originally established in 1914 pursuant to the Panama Canal Act of 1912.

Under the Act of 1912, in time of peace, the Canal was operated on an appropriations basis, under a single civilian agency as an interoceanic public utility headed by a governor. In war, that Act placed the Canal Zone and all of its functions under the supreme control of the Commanding General of the U.S. Army on the Isthmus.

The concept of the Act of 1950 was significantly different from that of the Act of 1912. A new corporation was chartered by the Congress known as the Panama Canal Company. The Panama Railroad Company, a New York corporation, was merged into the Panama Canal Company. The new company was placed under the control of a Board of Directors under a Chairman. The President of the Company became the general manager of business operations on the Isthmus. The Governor of the Canal Zone serves ex-officio, as President of the Canal Company.

The Panama Canal Company was charged with the operation of all of the transit, tollmaking, navigational and commercial activities on a self-sustaining basis. It became the sole taxpayer and was required under the Act to fund all governmental functions in the Zone which were strictly separated from the public utility functions.

Following my resignation as Under Secretary of the Army in the late fall of 1952, I was requested to remain as Chairman. This request was repeated by President Eisenhower in 1953 and I remained as Chairman until the end of that year when the pressure of my other obligations and those associated with the chairmanship of the Canal Company came into conflict, simply because of the unavailability of adequate time to do both.

I will first set forth briefly some important highlights bearing upon the historical background which culminated in the Isthmian Canal Convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama signed at Washington November 8, 1903. Having briefly described the streams of influence which converged in that Convention, I will then arrange a series of observations and comments relative to the pending Panama Canal Treaties.

Immediately upon ratification, and wholly without any consideration whatever, these treaties would:

- (a) Extinguish United States jurisdiction in the Canal Zone;
- (b) Terminate its juridical, legal and national presence there;
- (c) Terminate the all-inherent rights of the United States under the 1903 Convention;
- (d) Place all U.S. citizens there resident, including members of the Armed Forces of the United States and their dependents, under Panamanian jurisdiction;
- (e) Convey all U.S. right, title and interest in all of the land and all of the fixed installations and property there except for certain temporarily excluded properties; and
- (f) In thirty months, terminate all police power and all vestiges of governance, both executive and judicial.

II. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

A. The treaty of 1846 with Colombia (New Granada)

On December 12, 1846 at Bogota, a new American chargé d'affaires, Benjamin Allen Bidlack of Wilkes Barre, Pennsylvania, acting entirely without instructions of any kind, on his own initiative, negotiated and signed a treaty. This treaty which he negotiated with the President of New Granada, Sr. Tomas Cipriano de Mosquera, proved to be critical and important. Its vital section was Article XXXV. Under the provisions of this Article, New Granada guaranteed to the United States the exclusive right of transit across the Isthmus of Panama (the State of Panama, a province of New Granada) "upon any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed." In exchange, the United States guaranteed "positively and efficaciously" the "perfect neutrality" of the Isthmus and New Granada's rights of sovereignty there. It was this agreement by which the Panama Railroad was to be made possible.

The United States Senate did not act on ratification for a year and a half and then only when a new and special envoy was sent to Washington, the very able Pedro Alcantara Herran to lobby for the agreement. The Bidlack Treaty, as it has been commonly called, was Bidlack's only diplomatic triumph. He died seven months after the treaty was ratified. Prior to Bidlack's appointment as an envoy to Bogota, he had served briefly as a member of Congress.

B. The Discovery of gold in California and the war with Spain

Although there were dreams and visions of a waterway connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through some pathway across the Isthmus connecting North and South America, Central America nevertheless remained a backwater until January of 1848, when gold was discovered in California at Sutter's Mill.

There were only three routes to California. They were the Plains across, the Horn around, or the Isthmus over. Thousands chose the "Isthmus over." It was a bruising experience. Many never made it at all—neither the men nor the mules. Uncounted men died of snakebite, cholera, yellow fever and malaria, and of a thousand hardships and miseries. But on they came. After all, it was 13,000 miles around the Horn from New York to San Francisco. It was 5,000 miles by way of the Isthmus. Those who went from New Orleans to San Francisco across the Isthmus were to save 9,000 miles.

So it was the discovery of gold in California that first heightened intensively the interest of the United States in a route across the Isthmus. Ultimately, however, it was not gold; it was the war with Spain and the dramatic voyage of the battleship Oregon from the west coast of the United States around the Horn. Our first true battleship, the Oregon, was in San Francisco when the Maine blew up in Havana harbor and victory in the Caribbean was said to depend on her. Every American was caught up in the excitement. She was a fine vessel and she got there in time to play a part in the Battle of Santiago Bay, but it took her almost seventy days. This was the great catalyst. But much was yet to happen.

C. The Panama Railroad

It was a man named John Lloyd Stephens who visited Nicaragua and the State of Panama. He became convinced that Panama was where the future lay. He organized the Panama Railroad Company, a New York corporation. The railroad was begun in 1850. It was finished five years later at a cost of $8 million, six times beyond anyone's estimate. It was the world's first transcontinental railroad, the most expensive line on earth. A one-way ticket at that time was $25 in gold. It was a bonanza.

Panama had been known as a pesthole since its earliest Spanish settlement. Horror stories came out of Panama as the railroad was pushed ahead. Probably more than 6,000 or maybe even twice that number died in the effort to build it. They died of cholera, dysentery, yellow fever, malaria, smallpox. There was then no cure known for any of them.

Thanks to Benjamin Bidlack and Article XXXV of his treaty, to U.S. initiative, the Isthmus at Panama was spanned. And the United States was obliged, as well as privileged, under the treaty to keep the railroad open and to protect it against all comers, by force of arms if need be. U.S. naval vessels customarily stood off at Colon and Panama City.

D. President Grant

Surprisingly to many who may still think that President Grant had no initiative, it was he who directed a series of practical investigations seeking to find the most advantageous route for an interoceanic canal. He considered such a canal absolutely essential to the future of the United States and of great benefit to the whole world. Grant authorized and directed under the leadership of Admiral Ammen (a friend since boyhood) seven expeditions to Central America between the years 1870 and 1875. Throughout the nineteenth century there had been many theoretical and conjectural claimants to knowledge about where a canal should be built but none of them really knew what he was talking about. Remarkably however, as early as 1552, a Spanish priest designated Panama, Nicaragua, Darien and Tehuantepec as providing the best choices. Among these, he thought Panama and Nicaragua to be favored. The Grant expeditions were carefully done. President Grant commended to the people of the United States "An American Canal, on American soil."

E. The French effort

Much has been written about the French effort led by Ferdinand de Lesseps. He was the hero of Suez, a sea-level canal bearing no real relationship to the gigantic problems at Panama. He organized an International Congress which met in Paris in 1879 to consider an Interoceanic Canal. The Congress wrestled with the problems of which route and whether it should be a sea-level or a lock canal. However, de Lesseps "railroaded" through a decision for a sea-level canal, despite the fact that a French engineer, Adolphe Godin de Lepinay, presented a plan for a lock canal which turned out to be almost exactly the precise canal which the United States ultimately built. It was his plan that was eventually adopted in 1906 by John F. Stevens, the Chief Engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission appointed by President Theodore Roosevelt. Congress by an Act approved June 29, 1906 formally approved the recommendations of John Stevens after protracted and lively debate on the merits of Lepinay's concept.

The French effort collapsed in 1889 and the Panamanian Isthmus returned to the jungle.

F. The canal at Panama was second choice

In 1899, the United States established the Isthmian Canal Commission for exploration purposes. Rear Admiral John G. Walker was President of the Commission.

The objective was to recommend a route somewhere across the Isthmus as well as the type of canal to be built.

Nicaragua was recommended. It had popular support across the United States and very strong support in the Congress, particularly in the Senate under the leadership of then Senator Morgan.

G. The Spooner Act

A period of intensive struggle known as the Battle of the Routes was waged. Finally, however, Congress on June 28, 1902 passed the Spooner Act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. This Act favored the route across the Province of Panama.

The President of the United States was directed to acquire from the Republic of Colombia "perpetual control of a strip of land" not less than six miles in width from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean and thereupon to excavate, construct and "perpetually maintain, operate and protect thereon a canal," which would afford convenient passage of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft then in use. The President was also directed to provide for the perpetual maintenance and operation of the Panama Railroad and to have "jurisdiction over said strip and the ports at the ends thereof to make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as may be necessary to preserve order and preserve the public health thereon and to establish judicial tribunals as may be agreed upon thereon as may be necessary to enforce such rules and regulations."

When the French effort collapsed, a new French company was created by the French to obtain what might be salvaged out of the wreckage of the French effort. The name of this company was the New Panama Canal Company (Compagnie Nouvelle). The Spooner Act provided in Section 3, that when the President had acquired the necessary territory for the United States from the Republic of Colombia, he was authorized to pay the French company $40 million for its rights and equipment and "to the Republic of Colombia such sum as shall have been agreed upon."

It is important to recall however that Section 4 of the Spooner Act provided for an alternative. If the President proved to be unable to obtain for the United States "control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia" he, the President, was authorized to obtain control by treaty of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua for the construction and the perpetual maintenance, operation and protection of a canal via the Nicaraguan route.

There followed the adoption of the Spooner Act, after months of arduous negotiation between then Secretary of State Hay and Tomas Herran, charge d'affaires, a very favorable canal treaty for the United States. The treaty was concluded and signed January 22, 1903 and ratified by the United States Senate on March 17 of that year. Colombia did not act.

Communications between Washington, D.C. and Bogota were difficult at best. It took three arduous weeks to reach Bogota over land and the cable connection was intermittent. The Colombian Senate was called into session on June 20, 1903 to consider ratification of the treaty. However, things did not go smoothly and the Colombian Senate ultimately declined to ratify the treaty. One of the reasons not generally understood was because the rights of the New Panama Canal Company (Compagnie Nouvelle) were due to expire in the course of several months and the Colombians naturally had in mind that upon the expiration of those rights, Colombia would be eligible to receive the $40 million payment scheduled to go to the French company in addition to the $10 million specified in the pending treaty.

It is important to underscore here clearly that the treaty called for a payment of $10 million and an annuity of $250,000. Many people have called this annuity rent and many members of the State Department have currently so described the annual annuity as rent. It is not. The $250,000 payment was to be made in lieu of the annual annuity paid to Colombia by the Panama Railroad Company which was itself to be acquired by the United States. It is this same $250,000 annuity, later increased to $2,300,000 which has been paid to Panama.

There were a number of unfortunate misunderstandings between Colombia and the United States which also contributed to the rejection of the treaty. Herran so devoted himself to bringing the ill-fated Colombia treaty to a successful conclusion that sheer exhaustion cost him his life.

H. Was the Panama Canal Treaty forced upon Panama?

A great body of outrageous propaganda has been fabricated and a web of falsehoods has been spun by the Department of State and loudly declaimed by Panama's dictator, all designed to generate false impressions—impressions which many people erroneously entertain.

These false notions are that the Canal Zone was wrested from the Panamanians under duress; that the U.S. Naval forces were brought to bear to obtain the treaty with Panama by which she ceded the Canal Zone in perpetuity. The State (or Province) of Panama seceded from Colombia eagerly and avidly. The leaders knew what they were doing. They sought their own enrichment and the vast benefits they knew would accrue to the new nation by selling and ceding the Zone in perpetuity. They were zealous in their efforts to dissuade the United States from dealing with Nicaragua and Costa Rica to acquire a Canal Zone and construct a canal across the Isthmus there. She seceded. The United States recognized the Republic of Panama. The United States sheltered and defended the fledgling Republic from Colombia after secession.

It is errant nonsense to contend that force was used against the State of Panama soon to become the Republic of Panama to secede from Colombia. It is total fabrication to assert that the Panamanians did not want the treaty.

It is true that Dr. Manuel Amador and Sr. Federico Boyd raised initial objections; it is true that Secretary of State Hay observed that there are provisions to which some Panamanians might object and it is also true that on behalf of Panama the treaty was not signed by a Panamanian. What treaty between nations has ever been unanimously hailed? Very few. This one was unanimously ratified by the Panamanian Parliament before the United States Senate did—Amador and Boyd joined.

I. Was Panama under duress?

Eight men made the Republic of Panama. They were Joé Augustin Arango, Dr. Manuel Amador, Federico Boyd, Nicanor de Obarrio, Carlos C. Arosemena, Manuel S. Espinosa, Tomás Arias, and Ricardo Arias. They knew that following the rejection by the Colombian Senate of the Treaty which had been negotiated with Colombia, the United States would switch rapidly and inexorably to the favored Nicaraguan route.

These men, all citizens of Colombia, resident in the State of Panama, desired for themselves and their associates the enormous and continuing benefits to be derived from the United States, from the payments that would be made, the mighty undertaking of construction and the successful operation of the canal. The first meeting of the movement to secede was held July 25, 1903. Following this, Arango, Amador and Arosemena became the nucleus of the conspiracy against Colombia. The people of Panama had a low regard for the government in Bogota.

It should be remembered that under the treaty with Colombia of 1846, pursuant to Article XXXV, the United States had a duty to guard the neutrality of the Panama Railroad. The conspirators never had direct word from any agent of the United States that if they conducted a revolution and seceded from Colombia they would be protected from an attack from Colombian troops, but they believed that this would be the case, as indeed it was.

On November 2, 1903, Commander Hubbard, the Captain of the U.S.S. Nashville, received secret and confidential orders via the American Consul at Colon to:

"Maintain free and uninterrupted transit. If interruption threatens by armed force, occupy the line of the railroad. Prevent landing of any armed force with hostile intent, either government or insurgent, either in Colon, Portobello or other point. Send copy of instructions to the senior officer present at Panama on arrival of U.S.S. Boston. Have sent copy of instruction and have telegraphed Dixie to proceed with all possible dispatch from Kingston to Colon. Government force reported approaching Colon in vessels. Prevent their landing if in your judgment this would precipitate a conflict. Acknowledgment is required."

The uprising occurred at 6 p.m. on the evening of November 3, 1903. The presence of the ships of the United States standing off Panama and Colon prevented Colombia from retaking the Province of Panama. The Panamanians had seceded in order to obtain the Canal and the beneficence of the United States. No pressure had been applied to them at any time. No United States troops were landed. Some Colombian troops joined the rebels. The others voluntarily withdrew. There was no engagement. No shots were exchanged or fired. 30The conspirators now having formed a provisional government designated Philippe Bunau-Varilla as their "Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the Government of the United States of America." By November 8, 1903, he was installed in Washington ready to negotiate. The conspirators had designated Bunau-Varilla because they felt he was in a position to secure their objective. They were entirely correct. He served them well. They and he had a mutual interest in the outcome and so a pervasive understanding.

At the signing ceremonies of September 7, 1977, Torrijos observed of the 1903 treaty: "It was never signed by a Panamanian."—another blatant effort to generate false impressions and erroneous inference.

The treaty was signed by Secretary of State Hay and Bunau-Varilla November 18, 1903. Its text was cabled to the provisional government and also sent by ship. On November 26, 1903, the provisional government stated that the treaty would be ratified. It was unanimously approved by the provisional government of the New Republic of Panama on December 2, 1903, even though Amador and Boyd had previously and only temporarily been opposed to it for reasons which are not clear. The United States Senate ratified the treaty on February 23, 1904, by a vote of 66 to 14.

J. The treaty

The United States was empowered to construct a canal through a zone ten miles in width. Colon and Panama City were not to be a part of the zone. However, sanitation, sewerage, water supply and maintenance of public order in these terminal cities were placed under United States control. Four little islands in the Bay of Panama—Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco—were granted to the United States. In addition, the United States had the right to expropriate any additional land or water areas "necessary and convenient" for the construction, operation, sanitation or defense of the Canal. In return, the United States guaranteed the independence of Panama. The treaty granted to the United States "*all the rights, power and authority * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory * * * to the exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority.*" The State Department contends that this did not put the United States in the place of the sovereign. This amounts to stating that no nation—neither the Republic of Panama nor the United States is sovereign.

The questions of sovereignty and title were presented squarely before the United States Supreme Court in the case of Wilson vs. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24 when it ruled on these questions. In its opinion, the Court stated inter alia: "*It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect and that the territory described does not belong to this nation * * " The territory whereby the Canal Zone was ceded to the United States was ratified by an Act of Congress (33 Stat. 2234).

The Panama Republic had been born under the protection of the United States. It brought the conspirators what they most wanted not only for themselves but for all the people of Panama. Manuel Amador, its first president, inaugurated February 20, 1904, presided over what he described as boom times and an end to centuries of plague. A new nation had been born free of debt. It was a nation with an endowment in the form of $10 million in gold. The government set aside $750,000 for working capital; $2 million for public works. Six million was invested profitably in first mortgages on New York City real estate, the income from which provided adequate revenues for the Republic.

III. THE PENDING TREATIES—THE PANAMA GOVERNMENT AND DEFENSE

A. What would be their immediate effect?

The American people thus far, to the extent that they have been informed at all, have been given the impression that the treaties would be gradual in application. In what amounts to the most important respect of all, in my opinion, this is not so.

If the Panama Canal Treaties were to be ratified by the United States Senate, chief among the immediate results would be:

(1) Article I would provide that the Isthmian Canal Convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama signed in Washington November 18, 1903 would be immediately terminated and totally superseded. Whatever rights in and to the Canal Zone which the United States would have following the effective force of the treaty would rest entirely upon new and limited grants made by Panama to the United States.

Clearly there is no moral basis on which to predicate Panama's demand for surrender of the Canal Zone and termination of the 1903 Treaty. Let us now turn to the practical aspects.

(2) The United States would acknowledge the Republic of Panama as sovereign over the territory of what is now the Canal Zone.

(3) The Canal Zone would cease to exist.

(4) United States citizens in the former Canal Zone (employees, military personnel and their dependents) would no longer be under United States jurisdiction. All of them would be under the civil and criminal jurisdiction of Panama. Unless waived by Panama, offenses by any of them would be tried and upon conviction sentenced by Panama.

(5) The United States would cease to have police power in the former Canal Zone.

(6) All police, fire protection, street maintenance, street lighting, street cleaning, traffic management and garbage collection in the former Canal Zone will be provided by Panama. (United States pays ten million dollars per year for this, adjusted upward for inflation in Panama.)

(7) Defense of the Canal becomes joint under a combined Board of senior military officers of equal numbers of Panamanian and U.S. officers.

(8) The Panama Railroad and all other land and fixed properties (not specifically otherwise delineated in the implementary agreements for the life of the new treaty) become the absolute property of Panama at once. 30(9) Article III provides that the Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States the rights to manage, operate and maintain the Panama Canal in accordance with the terms of the Panama Canal Treaty and its related agreements.

(10) Article XI provides that upon the coming into force of the treaty:

"The Republic of Panama shall resume plenary jurisdiction over the former Canal Zone."

During a 30-month transition period, Panama would permit the authorities of the United States to have the primary right to exercise criminal jurisdiction over United States citizen employees of the Panama Canal Commission and their employees and over members of the United States forces and civilian components and their dependents:

(i) for an offense committed during the 30 months within the former Canal Zone and (ii) for any offense committed prior to the effectiveness of the treaty. For the 30-month transition period, the United States shall retain police authority and maintain a police force in the former Canal Zone. The courts may continue to function during the 30-month period except that such courts may not take any new civil cases but may only dispose of pending civil cases."

B. What about the transfer of property?

Article XIII provides that upon termination of the new treaty "The United States of America transfers, without charge, to the Republic of Panama, all right, title and interest the United States of America may have with respect to all real property including nonremovable improvements thereon, not already so transferred when the new treaty becomes effective."

The United States not only receives no compensation, it pays the Republic of Panama for having created the Canal. The treaty states that during the period the new treaty is in force, the United States will provide Panama with a "just and equitable return on the national resources which it has dedicated to the operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal." These payments from revenues require 30 cents per net ton adjusted upward for any increases in tolls over the years. This would amount to from $50 to $60 million per year. In addition, a fixed annuity of $10 million which will constitute a fixed expense of the Panama Canal Commission—over and beyond this, an annual amount of $10 million additional to the extent that operating revenues exceed the expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission. If in any year the expenses do exceed the revenues, this unpaid additional $10 million or any unpaid portion thereof is cumulative, and so that in any year when the operating surpluses exist, such surplus shall be applied to the cumulative backlog. What Panamanian resources?

C. What about defense?

Article IV—Protection and Defense appears to stipulate that the United States during the life of the treaty has the primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal. As stated above, defense is to be joint. It will NOT be as it is now.

The rights of the United States to station, train and move military forces within the Republic of Panama are very specifically limited by another agreement. This agreement is entitled "Agreement and Implementation of Article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty." This collateral agreement which is not called a treaty but which nevertheless would be carried into force by the treaty defines the legal status of our armed forces, the use of areas and installations and the movement of our forces.

With respect to our armed forces, Article VI of this collateral agreement provides inter alia the authorities of the Republic of Panama shall have criminal jurisdiction over the members of the Forces (U.S. Armed Forces), the civilian component thereof and their dependents. Within the perimeter of a defense site, offenses committed by such personnel which are criminal acts according to the United States law are by permission of the Republic of Panama subject to the United States. In other cases, Panama also would agree to waive, subject to review, criminal jurisdiction when an act committed off the base is solely against the property or security of the United States.

Acts committed off the base arising out of an official act or an omission in the course of an official act are subject to Panamanian criminal jurisdiction unless waived. The joint committee will review a certificate of the United States that such an offense was committed in line of duty but there is no provision as to what happens if the joint committee does not agree. Quite obviously, the offense would be subject to Panamanian criminal jurisdiction.

The agreement and implementation of Article IV with certain exceptions is not unlike agreements entered into by the United States governing "Status of Forces" with nations in which we have stationed our forces on bases in a host country, such as for example the Philippines or the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy or Spain, and to some extent the agreement with Japan. Such agreements can work only if the host country so wishes and so desires. In reading this long supplemental agreement of XXII Articles, it would require an exceptional abundance of goodwill on the part of Panamanians to work at all.

Some provisions such as Article XVIII are somewhat ludicrous, for example. It provides that the United States may furnish educational, sanitary and medical services to the members of its armed forces, their civilian components and dependents. For the most part, it is we who have undertaken to teach sanitation to the Panamanians and it is quite difficult to understand why on a military base for the duration of the main treaty it must be by permission. I do not think this is the case in other Status of Forces treaties, some of which in the past I have negotiated myself for the United States.

D. Other defense aspects of importance

Of the fourteen military bases now in the Canal Zone, only four will remain available to the United States and these will be under direct Panamanian civil and political jurisdiction. As previously noted, Article IV of the agreement and implementation of Article IV of the treaty indicates that whereas the U.S. forces have responsibility for control of entry to defense sites, the Republic of Panama may share in the exercise of this control in a manner to be agreed upon in the Joint Committee. Any signs which delineate the existence of a defense site used by the United States are to be in English and Spanish and on each sign it will be necessary to say and state in both languages that "The sign is erected under the authority of the Republic of Panama."

The emplacement of any type of nuclear armament whatsoever is prohibited to the United States under paragraph 6 of Article IV of the agreement and implementation of Article IV of the treaty.

Even within defense sites, the Panamanian flag occupies the position of honor and is flown on each of them. Flying the flag of the United States is permitted but the joint committee will determine the manner of displaying the flags. At the entrance to a defense site, only the flag of Panama will be flown.

E. There is no right to intervene after treaty expiration Much has been said by the State Department and by The President concerning longterm defenses. It has been unequivocally asserted that even following the expiration of the proposed new treaty, the United States will have the right to defend and protect the neutrality of the Canal.

It is alleged that a grant of right to the United States to this effect is contained in the auxiliary agreement entitled "Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal." No such right is granted and no such right would exist authorizing the United States to intervene for the defense or the neutrality of the Canal after the pending treaty expires. All it says in this regard is found in Article IV: "The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral * * *."

F. What about enemy ships in time of war?

Whereas now in time of war, as in the past, the United States could deny entry and passage of the vessels of any nations with whom we might be in a state of war, once this treaty and its collateral and subordinate agreements have been ratified, no such right will exist. The proposed agreements specifically authorize the passage of the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of any and all nations in peace or war.

Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt declares that the United States has no right to deny passage to an enemy vessel. He denies that the United States has any right to guarantee the neutrality of the Canal. He denies that the United States may say when the neutrality of the Canal has been violated. He stated publicly:

"We did not want that with the excuse of neutrality, the United States would maintain a guarantee over the State of Panama. This was another cause of discussion that kept the negotiations detained until the United States gave up on the idea of having a guarantee of neutrality over the Canal."

United States officials say that we have some sort of an "understanding" with the Panamanians that Article IV means that the United States does have a "right." Dr. Escobar, the chief negotiator, and the real center of power in Panama says this is not so.

It will be recalled by many that Mr. Kissinger said that he had an understanding with the Soviets as to the meaning of a certain critical provision of the SALT I Treaty. It developed, however, that the Soviets denied that there was any such understanding and certainly did not restrain themselves from action respecting strategic weapons and missile sites that would have been a direct violation of the alleged "understanding."

G. Does this treaty generate friendly relations with Panama?

If we have opened up a new era of cordial relations with Panama, how is it that Dr. Escobar continues to defame and slander the United States before his own people in Panama at every conceivable opportunity? With combustible rhetoric he continually incites the students into confrontation and does so with regard to the period after the treaties take effect. He characterizes the United States as a reluctant and imperialist nation. On August 12, 1977, he advised these students that if they are disenchanted with what he described as some of the "ugly features" of the new treaties, they should strike out on their own. In this enlightening address, Dr. Escobar said to the students:

*"In the past when we set bombs against our oligarchy (in Panama), when we challenged the regimes established in our country we never asked anyone for permission, you have never asked anyone for permission * * . When one wants confrontation, one puts his knapsack on his back, his bomb at his waist and goes to stage the confrontation."

The United States personnel (military, civilian and dependents) will be totally subject to the sovereign power and jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama. Fixed installations and the property not temporarily and specifically otherwise designated will be immediately theirs.

There is nothing in any of the treaties that could possibly prevent the Panamanians from nationalizing the entire operation whenever it chose as did Egypt, contrary to its obligation in the case of Suez. When Britain, France and Israel undertook to enforce the commitments of Egypt, it was the United States that prevented these nations from so doing. We thus laid the foundation not only for what is happening to us now but for that which will lie ahead whenever the Panamanians consider it in their special interest to do so. The Panamanians largely despise the United States. They remember the precedent of Suez.

As noted, the treaty provides for joint defense under a joint Board composed of equal numbers of Panamanian and U.S. officers. No one is in command. As in all such cases, the host country which will also be the sovereign possesses the absolute power of decision. This would seem to place a high premium on friendly relations, shared objectives and philosophies, and an abundance of goodwill. Is it there? Consider the following:

At Fort Cimmaron, there is a Panama National Guard Training Center. The soldiers in training have a chant. Perhaps for them, it is similar, for example, to the chant of U.S. Army Airborne units: "Airborne, Airborne All the Way." It is different, however, in Panama. It goes like this:

"Que Muera Gringo
Gringo Abajo
Gringo Al Paredon"

translated into English, this means:

"Death to the gringo
Down with the Gringo
Gringo to the wall"

Mutual trust? Joint defense: A friendly climate with an abundance of goodwill? When Torrijos was returning from the treaty signing ceremonies convened with such fanfare, he had something else on his mind other than a feeling of warmth and cooperative friendship with the United States. The English translation of a message sent to Castro as reported by the Spanish news agency on September 10, 1977 follows:

"In returning to my country and flying over the sky of Cuba, I salute you with my everlasting friendship; I wish that the Cuban people under your well-aimed direction will continue its forward march towards progress. In Latin America, your name is associated with the sentiments of dignity that is channeled to the termination of all forms of shameful colonialism."

The friendly words of the head of the Panamanian government? Friendly to the United States, that is?

IV. OTHER VITAL CONSIDERATIONS

A. We are assured that the canal is or soon will be obsolete—not so

We are soothingly assured that the Canal in reality is obsolete and really is not important to our security or our economy. It is true that our thirteen largest aircraft carriers cannot transit the Canal. All the rest of our surface and undersea naval ships can do so and plans for future construction of frigates, cruisers and destroyers will all remain canal-configured.

The Canal is one of the four vital choke points of the world. The Canal as a U.S. waterway which we are free to use and deny to our enemies in wartime gives the United States a striking, strategic advantage that Russia can never have. Geography dictates that the Soviets divide their navy into four separate fleets incapable of mutual support or reinforcement. Only between the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean via the Suez Canal can the Soviets shift warships as they frequently do.

We have relied heavily on the Panama Canal in every serious military crisis of the century as a means of concentrating our fleet in areas of greatest danger. We need the anchorage facilities there that we now have. We need the airfields there.

I have heard it argued that it is obsolete because supertankers cannot transit the Canal. Supertankers? No supertanker can even enter any port of the United States. Supertankers were designed expressly to go around the Cape of Good Hope. If we were relegated to Drake Passage around Cape Horn or through the Straights of Magellan through the Tierra del Fuego, a very hazardous route, our defense would be impaired as would our sealane life lines. Our Alaskan oil will go through the Panama Canal. Very large tankers, in fact most of the tankers afloat in the world, can transit the Canal. The first Alaskan oil cargo will shortly transit the Canal.

B. What do the Soviets say about the canal?

I quote from the edition of the Weekly Review of the Intelligence Digest of August 24, 1977 published by Intelligence International Ltd., 17 Rodney Road, Cheltenham, Gloucestershire, England:

"Perhaps the most revealing insight into Communist strategy involving the Panama Canal has come from a Soviet Army officer, a Major Sergel Yuworov, writing in the official Soviet military organ Red Star. As reproduced in the Cuban magazine Bohemia, Major Yuworov wrote: 'Due to its privileged location as the juncture between South America and the rest of the continent, including the Canal that permits United States warships to operate simultaneously in the Atlantic and Pacific, it—the Canal Zone—must be considered by the Soviet Union as a priority Zone. A second zone (from which to attack Panama) is the Central American Isthmus, located to the north of Panama. The Canal itself can be attacked as well from Colombia.' As a third choice, Yuworov points to 'converting Cuba, and implicitly Puerto Rico, into bases from which Moscow's plan can be consummated.'"

Quite a mouthful from a Soviet officer writing in the Red Army's official journal!

On the question of defense, it is absurd to say that by ceding the Canal to the Panamians, our capacity for defending the Canal and guaranteeing its security will be increased. With the property in the hands of an irresponsible government or a government dominated by Marxists as Panama's government is, it could decide to close the Canal to our ships of war, to our navy, and where would we be then? The proposed treaty as already stated specifically permits the ships of a nation in a state of war with the United States to transit the Canal.

C. Will the new treaty protect from or expose canal to sabotage?

One of the forcefully repeated arguments made by The President and the State Department is that if we do not surrender the Canal through this treaty, Panamanians will sabotage the Canal, whereas the new treaty will eliminate this hazard. Well, this type of reasoning should expose itself to real question. Sabotage by whom? There are far left radical students in Panama today who object to the proposed treaty and there was a crazed Panamanian in Stockholm who immolated himself simply because the treaty gives to the United States the right to manage it and underwrite the costs until 1999 and provides for a limited U.S. presence there. It is very difficult now to sabotage the Canal. It will not be difficult after the pending treaty is ratified and the Zone ceases to exist. It is almost impossible now. It will be easy if the treaty is ratified. Certainly after the treaty is approved, they would have a far better opportunity to sabotage the Canal than now when we give up substantially all of our police power in the Zone because there will be no Zone—it will all be Panama.

If Panamanians with or without the tacit approval of its Marxist-dominated government were to sabotage the Canal, it would cut off about 25% of Panama's gross national product. The indirect benefits flowing to Panama now are at this level. The Panamanians know that their livelihood depends upon the continued operation of the Canal as it stands now. Attempts at sabotage in the past have been thwarted by our own police and security forces which under this treaty we will no longer be able to maintain. So, in fact, for those radical students who consider the United States an imperialist power, as does Dr. Escobar, this treaty increases the opportunity for sabotage and surrenders a vital, strategic and tactical defense instrumentality of the United States which we cannot afford to surrender.

The Panamanians themselves have enjoyed nearly the highest standard of living on the average of any other nation in Latin or Central America due to the beneficence of the United States, and they know it. Most Panamanians who are fearful to speak out—they are afraid of their dictatorship—know that their government could not effectively operate the Canal anyway, but their lips are sealed by their fear.

D. Who is Omar Torrijos and how did he come to power?

Omar Torrijos did not seize power from the old oligarchy nine years ago. That coup was led by Majors Boris Martinez, a subordinate of Torrijos, who was kept innocent of the coup because of his excessive drinking problem. Major Martinez was an active, determined Communist.

When the Communist party of Panama, however, headed by Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, Juan Materno Vasquez and Marcellino Jaén decided on March 6, 1969 to purge Martinez, Jaén, who is married to Torrijos' sister Toya, persuaded Bethancourt and Vasquez to make Torrijos the head of the national guard, and later in 1972 the chief of government. Martinez was purged because he wanted to move too fast, faster than Bethancourt, the brains of the Communist party in Panama, thought they should move. He felt they could obtain much more by moving more slowly and not risk a countercoup.

Torrijos has been frequently described as the son of rural schoolteachers. This is correct. Both his mother, Joaquina, and his father, José have been identified as founders of a Communist cell in Veraguas Province. It is now the most powerful and influential cell in Panama.

Omar Torrijos was a member of the Marxist organization of "Young Veraguas" when he attended the normal school of the Province of Veraguas. Drew Pearson on November 19, 1968 later identified him as a member of the Communist party of Panama. During July 1977, a Soviet economic mission to Panama confirmed a treaty establishing a free zone for the Soviet Union in Panama. A discussion took place at that meeting in which the Soviets stated they would consider financing and constructing a new sea-level canal for Panama across the Isthmus.

E. What about a sea-level canal? Is one needed for defense?

Immediately after World War II, the idea of a sea-level canal was thought to have great urgency from a defense standpoint during the immediate reaction to the atomic bomb. Many studies since then have established that both a lock canal and a sea-level canal are obviously equally vulnerable to atomic attack and that both require extensive protection with air cover and sea forces, anti-submarine, surface and submarine. For all of this, we need the air fields in the Zone and we need the bases there over which we are surrendering control.

A sea-level canal across the Isthmus would be a foolhardy undertaking because of the geology of the Isthmus, let alone the nature of the Panama government. The uniquely intractable geologic formations were primarily the cause of the French collapse. It was only because of the superior capabilities and resources of the United States that we were able successfully to excavate the main channel known as the Culebra (Gaillard) cut. Not only that, it would be foolhardy to undertake it after this treaty goes into effect, if it does go into effect, given the characteristics of the Panamanian Marxist dictatorship with its axes with Moscow and Havana.

F. We should not agree to refrain from negotiating for and creating a new canal in Nicaragua

What is even more foolhardy about the treaty if it is ratified is that we commit ourselves not to construct another canal between the oceans anywhere else during the life of the treaty. We also agree not to negotiate with any third state for a new route in the western hemisphere (Article XII).

If the United States were to undertake to establish a canal which would accommodate vessels of deeper draft and broader beam, it should be created in Nicaragua, not Panama. The geology is different and though the distance from shore to shore is longer, the land bridge is no longer than the narrow neck of the Panamanian Isthmus. In Nicaragua, either a sea-level or a lock canal could be built.

Because of the Pacific sea snake and other marine life indigenous to the Pacific Ocean, a sea-level canal might well imperil the important food fisheries of the Atlantic. There is no mixing of the seas now.

G. Would this usher in a new era of cordial and friendly relations with all of the nations of Latin America?

The President, Secretary Vance, negotiators Bunker and Linowitz and other spokesmen endlessly repeat the theme that the proposed treaties would establish an era of good feeling, of friendly, cordial and constructive relations with all of the nations of the western hemisphere. There is no doubt that this is in fact NOT so.

These assertions have been made because of the presence in Washington for the signing ceremonies of most of the heads of government or chiefs of state of Latin America at President Carter's invitation extended through the Secretary General of the Organization of American States to attend the signing ceremony? Their presence is not evidence which supports these extravagant claims. Only four Latin American states have supported Panama's demand for this treaty. Torrijos knows it too. He has so stated.

In May of 1977, very likely around May 15, twenty Mexican women journalists visited Panama and were received by Torrijos. Among these journalists was one, Marlise Simons, a Dutch journalist now living in Mexico City. Ms. Marlise Simons was once on the staff of the Washington Post.

On May 19, 1977, the Washington Post printed a byline article by Marlise Simons with regard to the mentioned interview with Torrijos. In it she quoted Torrijos as having stated to the twenty Mexican women journalists that he was supported by only four Latin American nations in his quest for the Panama Canal. He named them as Venezuela, Colombia, Costa Rica and Mexico.

The news stories of these twenty journalists were widely reported in the Latin American press.

It is well known that the chiefs of state and heads of government of our Latin American neighbors do not feel themselves in a position to have declined the President's invitation regardless of their feelings regarding the proposed treaty. To my knowledge, to my certain personal knowledge, there are several Latin American states, the governments of which are against these treaties. They can hardly bring themselves to believe that the United States government could bring itself to do this. They consider that it will foster an increase and not a decrease in terrorist and subversive activities in their own states. They consider that Panama and Cuba form an axis with Moscow. They consider that their own security will be diminished by these actions. I wish I could quote which nations, but it should be evident that I am not in a position to do so. I should add that they consider that these treaties will be followed by an insistent demand on the part of Fidel Castro that the United States abandon its naval base in Guantanamo. When one has in mind the Soviet view of the Caribbean Sea, the Panama Canal, the entire Isthmus, we would do well to avoid any action which would increase the pressure on the United States to abandon Guantanamo.

They cite an article in the Washington Evening Star of twenty years ago in May of 1957 which carried a story that the Soviet Union had launched a propaganda offensive against the United States and Central America to incite Panama into demanding control of the Panama Canal. It worked.

They wonder why Linowitz was appointed as a negotiator in view of his general reputation as favoring unilateral disarmament by the United States.

When Bunker and Linowitz returned from Panama in triumph to be received by President Carter on a Sunday, it was later learned that the treaties had not yet been drafted, and that there were great complexities and difficulties with language translation that would take many days before the general agreements which had been initiated could be put into treaty language. Yet within a few days after their return, it was announced that The President had read every word of the treaties and stated that he was well satisfied. How could The President have read every word of nonexistent treaties?

According to the World Bank, Panama's external debt is in excess of $1,600 million. The rank and file of Panamanians have not benefited. Where has the money gone? Who are the principal lenders? And who did benefit?

In any event, Panama is close to bankruptcy. The proposal is that we yield to unjustified demands wholly devoid of any moral basis by a nearly bankrupt, Marxist-oriented, Communist-affiliated, Yankee-hating nation.

H. To whom is it proposed we surrender?

Is the Senate of the United States familiar with the recent statement of Marcelino Jaén, a Marxist and a member of the ruling Marxist triumvirate who installed Omar Torrijos? He is, as it will be recalled from the foregoing, a brother-in-law of Omar Torrijos. On July 19, 1977 when Panama signed an economic pact with the Soviet Union, he stated publicly and I quote:

"With the signing of this document that constitutes the final draft of an agreement in which the governments of the U.S.S.R. and Panama have participated, is an event of deep historic significance, not only for our country but for the American continent as well, who are always facing strong forces that represent a philosophy that is contrary to the destiny of Latin America."

Let us remember, it is not really Omar Torrijos, a man with a heavy drinking problem with whom we are dealing—it is Romulo Bethancourt Escobar, Marcellino Jaén and the Lenninist-Marxist party of Panama supported by Cuban agents of Fidel Castro with whom we are dealing. It should also be noted that it was reported that during the negotiations with U.S.S.R. completed on July 19, 1977 as stated above, that there was an extended discussion on July 16, 1977 not only for the financing and construction for Panama of a new sea-level canal by the U.S.S.R. but also for the establishment of a Soviet naval base in Panama. In Article XII of the proposed treaty, it will be recalled, the United States may not negotiate with any other state to create a new canal. Panama undertakes NO reciprocal obligations.

We are frequently admonished that we must appease the Panamanian demands or face violence. In 1974, the then Ambassador of Panama to the United States said that if Panama is unsuccessful in its demand for the Canal and the Zone, "three will be no canal for anybody, not for us, not for the United States, not for the world."

Is it not clear that we propose to surrender in order to appease? In so doing, we do not enhance our security and defense—we critically impair both. And we would create conditions wherein sabotage would be easy, whereas it is difficult—next to impossible now except by a transiting vessel.

I. What about Colombia?

There are those who say that if any nation has a reason to be critical of the United States it is Colombia by reason of the events of 1903. What should be realized is that in 1922 the United States and Colombia amicably settled their differences in a treaty negotiated during the Wilson Administration. Under it, Colombia obtained certain transit rights through the Canal and it referred to the Canal Zone "title to which is now vested entirely and absolutely in the United States." Under that treaty, the United States paid Colombia $25 million in five annual installments as an indemnity for the loss of Panama in return for Colombia's agreement to recognize the independence of Panama. The $25 million was paid and accepted. Any legal question about our acquisition in 1903 was put permanently at rest. So also was any moral question.

J. Do we pay rent to Panama? Absolutely not

Members of the State Department and other government officials seeking to push the American people into a misunderstanding, hopefully to obtain ratification, cite as "proof" of the fact that the Canal Zone does not belong to the United States that the United States has always paid rent to Panama. The fact is—the United States is not and never has been obligated to pay rent. The $250,000 per year required by the original treaty of 1903 was in lieu of the $250,000 per year annuity which had been agreed to be paid to Colombia in the Hay-Herran treaty, in consideration of the grant by Colombia to the United States of the right forever to operate the Panama Railroad. Inasmuch as the Panamanian conspirators who seceded from Colombia were aware of this, they expected and received not only the $10 million payment which Colombia would have received but also the $250,000 railroad operating annuity which Colombia would have received. The annuity over the years has been increased but it is not and never has been at any time rent. It is now $2.3 million.

K. What about the watershed which is essential to the operation of the lock system of the canal?

The canal lock system cannot operate without a constant and abundant supply of huge quantities of fresh water. These water sources are Madden, Miraflores and Gatun Lakes and the Chagres River. Protection of the watershed unquestionable and certain is indispensable to the future operations of the Canal. Without such assured protection, the requisite availability of vast amounts of flowing fresh water would vanish. Approximately two-thirds of this vital watershed lies in the Canal Zone itself. As you know, upon the coming into force of this pending treaty, the Canal Zone would wholly cease to exist and would become Panamanian property under its sovereignty and jurisdiction with small parts by permission of Panama set aside for use and occupancy by the United States in carrying out its "management contract" to operate the Canal until the year 2000 at the sole cost and expense of the United States.

The contiguous land area portion of this watershed lies outside the Zone in Panama. This important one-third portion of the watershed which lies outside of the Zone boundary has been virtually destroyed by a relentless assault on the flora. By whom? By Panamanian peasants and farmers living in these areas. The Government of Panama knows about this and does nothing about it. When the Canal Zone ceases to exist as it will, these assaults may well continue and be carried forward into the remaining two-thirds of the watershed. In that case, and there is nothing in the treaty to prohibit this, the jungle will disappear as it has in the other thirds and the Zonian two-thirds of this irreplaceable watershed will progressively become desertized as the contiguous one-third is becoming.

While Article VI entitled Protection of the Environment provides for a joint commission on the environment to be established with equal representation from both sides, the Commission only concerns itself with the implementation of certain provisions of the treaty and does not concern itself with that which would then be going on within Panama (in what was formerly the Canal Zone) as the implementation of the treaty by the parties relates only to those areas temporarily reserved for the use and occupancy of the United States for housing, for military bases, some training and for canal operations. This Article has no application specifically to the protection of the watershed, all of which will lie in Panama and none of which would come under the active care of either party once the treaty goes into force. These lakes and the river now in the Zone—those portions now in the Zone—would survive by themselves if left alone, but will not survive at all if they are treated in the same way as the portions of the watershed which have always been in Panama have been treated during the years since the Canal commenced operation. So the treaty has no protective environmental provisions in this regard—certainly no enforceable ones—and Article VI by its plain language clearly does not have this subject in mind.

L. What about the allegations of the vulnerability of the Panama Canal to sabotage or the threats of sabotage if the proposed treaty is not ratified?

On September 12, 1977, General Omar Torrijos said that the Canal "is as indefensible as a newborn baby." Is this true? The answer is "No, it is not true." Since 1942, the Canal has been provided with protective and with emergency devices capable of putting ships through the Canal even if every gate and every lock were to be destroyed. A bomb, a conventional bomb, that is, could not disrupt Canal traffic for an extended period of time. Neither could a ship which exploded within the locks stop traffic for extended periods. The dams also have special protection from outside attack. So long as the Canal Zone continues to exist, sabotage of the lock system is next to impossible in such a manner as to put the Canal out of commission for an extended period. When the Canal Zone ceases to exist, which it will upon the coming into force of this treaty, these protective devices will themselves become vulnerable. Present jurisdiction plus the included police power and the protective shield of the ten-mile wide zone are essential.

The treaty makes no provision for the continuation of the Zone in order to assure or more particularly to avoid the creation of a vulnerable situation which will arise when both the Zone and U.S. police power become extinct. The treaty, if approved, will extinguish both. This is a fatal flaw. Contrary to the contentions of the proponents, the continued existence of the Canal Zone and our jurisdiction assure the security of the Canal. The treaty will strip away that security and render the Canal vulnerable to the attack of saboteurs and terrorists.

M. The Protocol of 1914 to the 1903 treaty

If the proposed treaty is confirmed by the Senate, the United States will no longer have a treaty right to deny passage to belligerent ships. To the contrary, the United States will be obligated to allow such vessels to transit the Canal if they can reach its approaches. The United States now possesses that right and always until now considered it to be a valuable right. Soviet naval power is multiplying and over the last 25 years ours has been steadily diminishing both relatively and absolutely. Why would we then agree to forego this valuable treaty right?

On October 10, 1914, an agreement between Panama and the United States was signed whereby belligerent ships could be denied the use of Panamanian waters and Canal Zone waters. Ships using Panamanian waters would be denied the use of Canal Zone ninety days. This would make more attractive to such belligerent vessels to sail around the Horn.

This agreement indirectly had the effect of modifying the neutrality provisions of the 1903 treaty and I am told with the tacit consent to Britain with whom in 1901 the second Hay-Pauncefote Treaty superseded the first treaty upon assurance to Britain who surrendered her rights to construct a canal in return for a promise that ours would be neutral and open. I might add, by the way, that the words of neutrality in the 1901 Hay-Pauncefote Treaty with Britain are not dissimilar from those incorporated in the neutrality treaty which the Administration contends gives the U.S. the right to intervene in defense of the Canal after the year 2000. I have never heard anyone contend that the Hay-Pauncefote neutrality treaty with Britain in 1901 gave Britain the right to intervene in the Canal Zone which is U.S. territory. In an agreed minute to the principal pending treaty which minute has reference to paragraph 1 (c) of Article I (covering abrogation of prior treaties and the establishment of a new relationship) this 1914 agreement would cease to exist. It would be expressly abrogated and the United States would lose its existing treaty rights whereby belligerent vessels can be denied the use both of Panamanian and Canal Zone waters. This is a very important treaty right which should be preserved and carried forward perpetually.

N. The transfers of property and the payments to Panama

The proposed treaties would cede and surrender and transfer to Panama without consideration vast properties outright, including the Panama Railroad. This would be done immediately upon the coming into force of the principal treaty, if it is confirmed by the Senate. The Railroad is vital to Canal operations, maintenance and Canal emergencies. Also included in the immediate transfer to Panama and its sovereign jurisdiction to the exclusion of the United States would be all of the land areas of the Zone. These land areas which were ceded to the United States are U.S. territory subject to the exclusive right of the United States to exercise sovereignty over them. Not only that—lands within the Zone which was ceded by the 1903 treaty in perpetuity were later purchased by the United States from the individual Panamanian owners who owned land within the ten-mile wide Zone.

Between the coming into force of the treaty and the year 2000 and perpetually thereafter, all of these lands will belong to Panama from the beginning. The United States will have the use and occupancy, not the title, and no jurisdiction of limited small areas for housing and Canal transit operations in order to carry out "the management contract" which the United States undertakes in the form of this treaty—at its own sole cost and expense. The transfer of title is not delayed until the year 2000.

The Canal Zone immediately ceases to exist. We cede it lock, stock and barrel immediately. These valuable properties become Panama's free, including the important Panama Railroad which the United States should continue to operate so long as the United States has the obligation to operate. Certainly the Canal Zone as is in all respects, including U.S. jurisdiction, should remain intact until the year 2000.

Not only are lands an extensive operating asset given forthwith without any consideration whatsoever, but also under paragraph 4 of Article XIII, the United States is committed to pay annually over the 22-year period to Panama $60 million or more out of revenues and $10 million a year for the municipal services Panama will undertake to provide. This latter $10 million per year is indexed to the rate of Panamanian inflation! This paragraph goes on to say that all of this is "a just and equitable return."

These payments which could aggregate $1.6 billion over the 22-year period are in accordance with the treaties stated to be in addition to all of the other transfers of property which in and of themselves are made wholly without consideration to provide in accordance with paragraph 4 of Article XIII "a just and equitable return on the national resources which it [Panama] has dedicated to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal * * *". What management? What operation? What maintenance? What protection and defense? It should be borne in mind that these required payments which are cumulative may not be generated from tolls because in the year 1976 after increases in tolls between 1974 and 1976 of approximately 50 percent, the operations were in deficit. Unless tolls are increased still further by substantial percentages, which would not seem to be justifiable, and the tolls do not generate the payments that Panama expects and the treaty provides, the deficit will be paid nevertheless by the U.S. Treasury.

This means, of course, it will be paid by U.S. taxpayers; by your constituents out there—in the south, in the midwest, in the mountain states, in the far west, in the northeast. These people already have to be either very rich or very poor even to be sick or to help send their sons and daughters to college today. Not only that, of course the investment of the United States in the Canal Zone, presently between $5 and $6 billion, will also be on the backs of the U.S. taxpayers—never to be recovered as was intended by Congress and promised to the American citizens by the Act of 1950.

Traffic through the Canal is estimated to grow at 3 percent to 3½ percent per year. This percentage is very probably substantially below the rate of inflation which the United States will endure by reason of the monetization of the Federal deficits and therefore without substantial increases in toll rates, a growth of 3½ percent per year in the volume of traffic would not ever overcome the current deficit which will be further increased by these cumulative payments which over time would aggregate $70 million per year. The treaty imposes upon the United States all of the burdens and accords none of the benefits. At the same time, it gravely impairs the security of the Canal, rendering it highly vulnerable to acts of sabotage whenever these seem to be in the interest of radical students of terrorists or of unstated Marxist reasons approved by Moscow.

There are no provisions to insure any sort of good faith performance upon the part of Panama. There are no adequate provisions to protect the operations there and adequately to secure the Canal during the 22-year period when the United States bears the burden at its own sole cost and expense under conditions wherein the United States assumes great responsibility but surrenders to Panama all of its authority. Panama becomes the exclusive sovereign over the entire area. It becomes the host country, the host nation. The United States has a management contract responsibilities without commensurate authority which cannot be successfully discharged.

O. What about the assertions that if this treaty is not ratified, the United States will face another Vietnam?

There have been repeated allegations from official sources in the Administration that the United States will face another Vietnam in Panama if the proposed treaty is not ratified. The President has stated that if the treaty is not ratified, he will defend the Canal Zone even if it requires 100,000 troops. At a later time, this figure was raised to a higher number. It was said that the Canal would be defended even if it requires 200,000 troops. Is there any validity to such allegation?

Panama is a relatively small country of approximately 1.5 million people. Its resources are limited. A major guerrilla war comparable to Vietnam is wholly beyond her resources. She could not mount such an operation unless she were to be substantially and continuously supplied with vast quantities of ammunition, weapon systems, communications equipment, an elaborate guerrilla command structure and huge numbers of personnel. These would have to be provided by another nation. Do the proponents of this treaty seriously assert that a major offensive of this nature would be launched against the U.S. Canal Zone, that is to say, against U.S. territory with the direct support of another nation or nations? By whom?

It is not clear that if some other nation or nations provided the support for such a major attack upon U.S. territory that it would risk the beginning of World War III? Does it not seem that it is an imposition upon the citizens of the United States to induce them to support the Senate of the U.S. in ratifying the proposed treaty by suggesting that the United States will face another "Vietnam War" in Panama if it is not ratified?

P. The proposed treaty cannot be considered in isolation from our past defeat in Vietnam and from other aspects of U.S. credibility

If we are induced to approve this treaty by a Marxist-dominated government, this would be another building block in the structure which the Soviets have been successfully and relentlessly erecting to fence in the United States and subject her to Soviet will. As every Russian knows, and as every member of the Politburo and Soviet Aparatchik believes devoutly, all non-Marxist social and governmental systems are anathema to the Soviet Union and the United States is the enemy. Somehow there are many people in the United States and seemingly within the government of the United States who apparently do not understand this. They do not understand or appreciate that we are at the mid-stage of a shift in relative power and influence to the Soviet Union that is of historic proportions, and which promises, unless arrested severely, to have enduring significance. The rise in Soviet standing in the world can be traced almost exclusively to the increase in relative Soviet military capabilities. She has projected her power through Cuba to Panama.

There are many other ways of dealing fairly and equitably with Panama as a neighboring state short of immediately surrendering the U.S. territory embodied in the Canal Zone and simultaneously terminating our jurisdiction there.

If we are induced by the will-o'-the-wisp of wishful thinking that Marxists can ever be appeased by the proposed treaty or by anything less than our surrender to their will, we will have crossed the Hubicon and will expose the Canal to whatever may be the Marxist design. Whether ratification is approved or refused will make no difference in Marxist objectives and designs. However, it will make a quantum favorable difference in the capacity of the United States to retain its independence if ratification is declined. The United States will have the respect of most of the nations in the western hemisphere and of western Europe and of our allies in the far east if we otherwise deal fairly and equitably with Panama while declining absolutely to surrender our territory as proposed by the pending treaties in reliance upon Marxist promises.

The proposed treaty is wholly against our national interest. The consequences will be wholly adverse. There is no such thing as world opinion. On the other hand we are being closely watched by our remaining friends and allies. To them the proposed treaty cannot be brewed in isolation. If confirmed, it will be viewed by friends, neutrals and foes alike as yet another U.S. surrender. No observer will regard it as an act of noble purpose and of magnanimity.

Q. If the canal is to be transferred to Panama on December 31, 1999 certain amendments are essential

If the Senate in its wisdom ultimately decides that the Canal should be nevertheless transferred to Panama at the end of 1999, then these considerations are vital: First, that the watershed be protected;

Second, the necessity for providing protection of the Canal from sabotage and acts of terrorism;

Third, the maintenance of the right to deny passage to belligerent ships;

Fourth, the necessity that the United States be free to negotiate for and build a canal elsewhere on the Isthmus;

Fifth, the requirement that the United States have authority commensurate with its responsibility between now and the end of 1999 which in turn requires that the Canal Zone and U.S. protection continue to exist until then. Neither the Canal Zone nor any of the fixed or operating properties should be given to Panama until the end of the 20th century.

Meanwhile, progressive measures would be taken to train and employ Panamanians so that at the end of the century Panama would man all positions and be in a position to take over. At that time, U.S. protection would come to an end. The Zone would be extinguished. All properties would be conveyed. Thereafter, the United States should be prepared to accept the Canal at risk and whatever other consequences might ensue. With these considerations in mind, the treaties should be amended as follows:

1. No transfers of jurisdiction, authority or property should occur until December 31, 1999 and the Canal Zone should remain intact, with all and in full the properties and the facilities, under the authority of the United States to the exclusion of the exercise of jurisdictional authority by Panama during the 22-year transitional period.

2. During this period and until December 31, 1999, the 1903 treaty as amended by amendatory treaties, minutes, notes, understandings and executive agreements prior to the signing of the proposed treaties and their minutes, notes and subordinate agreements would remain in full force and effect.

3. The treaties should be amended further to provide that Panama agrees that she will not grant or accord to any other nation any military, naval or air bases in Panama or in Panamanian waters and that she will not permit the stationing of naval, air or military forces or of quasi or paramilitary forces of any other nation in Panama or of such individuals or units, other than individual diplomatic personnel, except as agreed to by the United States during the transition period ending December 31, 1999.

4. Article XII, paragraph 2(b) should be deleted. The United States should be free to negotiate for and build an Isthmian Canal if it so desires outside of Panama.

5. The neutrality treaty should be amended to make clear that the United States may take such measures as it believes necessary for the defense of the Canal at any time after the year 2000 and to this end as in the case with other friendly countries, Panama should in the mutual defense interest of the parties, provide after the year 2000 air, naval and military bases in order to give meaning to the defense of the Canal following its surrender at the start of the year 2000.

6. The treaties should be further amended for the payment of an increased annuity to Panama during the transition period but no other payments should be made. Accordingly, Article XIII, paragraph 4, should be deleted. 307. Specifically, the protocol of 1914 which provides the United States with treaty rights to deny belligerent ships of any class or nature, whether warships supporting logistic ships, maintenance ships, fleet trains, etc. the use of the waters of Panama and of the Canal, should remain in full force and effect. To this end, the treaty should be amended so as to strike the provisions by amending Article I, paragraph 1, as follows:

Strike the words "Upon its entry into force," substitute therefor "On January 1, 2000."

Strike Articles III, IV, V, VII, VIII, IX.

Amend Article X by striking paragraph 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following: "During the transition period ending December 31, 1999, the United States agrees to provide for an orderly phasing-in to all positions of Panamanians so that as of January 1, 2000 all operations will be conducted by Panama and by Panamanian employees or other personnel hired by Panama. To this end, the United States will progressively establish during the transition period employment and labor regulations which will contain terms, conditions and prerequisites for all categories of employees of the Panama Canal Company whose positions will be fully absorbed when the Panama Canal Company ceases to exist on January 1, 2000.

The foregoing amendments necessitate in addition that the following additional amendments be made in order that all remaining provisions be compatible with each other:

Strike Paragraph 8 of Article X.

Strike from Paragraph 9 of Article X the words "Panama Canal Commission" wherever it appears therein or elsewhere in the treaty and substitute "Panama Canal Company."

Strike Article XI.

Strike Article XII.

Strike Article XIII.

8. Add an additional Article providing that all minutes, executive agreements, implementation agreements, letters of understanding and all other understandings associated with the pending treaties, including the agreements and implementation of Article III and Article IV are to be set forth in detail as an attachment to the proposed treaties and incorporated by reference in the Panama Canal Treaty so that any and all amendments to any of the foregoing will require the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States of America.

V. RECAPITULATION

A. While the treaty of 1903 was not signed by a Panamanian as Torrijos stated during the signing ceremonies in the Pan American Union on September 7, 1977, it was signed by a duly appointed Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary designated by the government of the New Republic of Panama, namely Philippe Bunau-Varilla. The Panamanian government ratified the treaty December 2, 1903. The United States Senate did not ratify it until February 23, 1904.

B. Thereafter, Tomas Arias, the Secretary of the new government of Panama sent a note to the United States government:

"The Government of the Republic of Panama considers that upon the exchange of ratifications on February 26, 1904 of the treaty for opening an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama, its jurisdiction ceased over the Zone."

C. As cited above, in 1907 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Canal Zone was "ceded" and that the United States owned it absolutely.

D. The presence of the U.S. Naval forces off of Colon and Panama City were to prevent the landing of Colombian troops. No United States troops were landed. Panama was neither under duress nor coerced. It sought independence and avidly sought the treaty. In fact, some Colombian troops joined the Panamanians.

E. In 1936 and 1955, the 1903 treaty was expressly reaffirmed in further treaties which made certain minor adjustments to the treaty of 1903. The amendatory treaties were duly ratified.

F. One expects remarks from Torrijos such as he made during the September signing ceremonies that "United States recognized the need to correct an error instead of prolonging for an eternity an injustice and to correct an historical mistake." This is the kind of language he uses to fire up his people.

What error? What injustice? What historical mistake?

Where would Panama be today were it not for the events of 1903? Probably still a part of Colombia. If thinking Panamanians were really aware of their history, they would feel gratitude toward the United States. Both Panama and Colombia have derived tremendous benefits from the Canal. So has the rest of the world.

G. Shortly after the Wilson Treaty with Colombia mentioned above which was not ratified until 1922, and sometime during 1923, Charles Evans Hughes, then Secretary of State, said

"It is an absolute futility for the Panamanian government to expect any American administration, no matter what it is, any President, or any Secretary of State, ever to surrender any part of these rights which the United States has acquired under the treaty of 1903."

H. CLOSING SUMMARY

Congress in 1902 in the Spooner Act empowered President Roosevelt to acquire from Colombia land across the Isthmus of Panama for a ship canal if Colombia would grant perpetual control.

A treaty for a 10-mile wide zone was negotiated by the plenipotentiaries of Colombia and the United States but the Colombian Senate rejected the treaty in August of 1903 for several reasons cited heretofore. Later on, when it was too late, Colombia wanted to accept it.

On November 3, 1903, Panama, a restless province of Colombia, started a revolution, wholly bloodless as it turned out. President Roosevelt, to protect the Panama Railroad and to protect American citizens from imminent violence, kept Colombian troops at a distance with a nearby show of gunboats and marines. No United States forces were landed. Some Colombian troops joined the revolution.

A new Panamanian government was formed on November 4, 1903. Two days later, on November 6, 1903, Secretary of State John Hay officially recognized the Republic of Panama. No pressure whatsoever or of any kind had been put upon Panama by the United States.

On November 18, 1903, Secretary Hay concluded and signed a treaty with the Panamanian Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary in Washington, D.C. on substantially the same terms and on identical money terms previously offered Colombia. It guaranteed the independence of Panama.

The treaty was unanimously ratified by the new Panamanian government on December 3, 1903; the U.S. Senate gave its advice and consent to the treaty on February 23, 1904.

The United States under the treaty paid $10 million for the 10-mile wide zone across the Isthmus and an annuity for the right to operate the Panama Railroad (as explained heretofore—not in any sense rent) of $250,000. This annuity was increased in a 1955 treaty to $2,300,000. The treaty describes the zone as “lands granted” to the United States. Panama has repeatedly stated that the zone was “ceded.”

The U.S. Supreme Court in 1907 ruled the Canal Zone was ceded and that the United States had perfect title.

Under Articles VI and XV of the 1903 treaty through a Joint Commission, the United States bought the land from the owners of the land within the Zone and acquired title in all cases in fee simple. Substantial amounts of money were paid to these owners.

Having first rendered the disease-infected Canal Zone habitable by a three-year sanitation program that conquered both the death-dealing yellow fever and malaria (largely) the United States completed the Canal in 1914 at a then cost of $366,650,000. The first ship passed on August 3, 1915. The United States has an investment there now of approximately $6 billion.

In 1922, Colombia, the nation that felt aggrieved by the events of 1903, made a complete settlement fully adjusting all differences in a treaty negotiated during the Wilson administration and ratified in 1922 for which the United States paid Colombia $25 million.

Before closing, I comment on the report concerning the alleged bugging of the Panamanian negotiations. There was no finding that such did NOT occur. If it did and if pressure was applied by the Panamanians to Bunker and Linowitz upon discovery of the bugging by the Panamanians, who could be naive enough to suppose that either Bunker or Linowitz would reveal that they have been blackmailed into proposing the pending treaties and implementing agreements in their present form? Incidentally, the latter can be freely amended so as to modify the treaties themselves once the treaties are ratified.

During his 1976 campaign, President, then candidate, Jimmy Carter, stated unequivocally:

“I would never give up complete control or practical control of the Panama Canal Zone.”

The proposed treaties would immediately extinguish all U.S. control, practical or other. Panama would forthwith become the sovereign, exercising all sovereign power and control. Sovereign power and control are inseparable. If we surrender power as the treaty provides, we lose control.

In effect, we have a management contract at our expense for the next 22 years with the same responsibilities we now have for canal operations but with no control or authority. The latter would be vested in the host country—Panama—as it always is. Over that period, we have the privilege of disbursing to them somewhere between $70 and $80 million per year while underwriting all costs of operation, maintenance, repair and rehabilitation. Over and beyond these amounts, collateral agreements not covered by the treaties for economic aid and other purposes could, over the 22-year span, aggregate as much as $2.2 billion. Panama's population is 1.5 million. This aggregate would approximate nearly $1467 per capita for each Panamanian. On a per capita basis for the United States, this would be the equivalent of a payment of $322 billion.

Arguments that technically the United States is not the sovereign, notwithstanding that it now possesses in perpetuity the exclusive right to exercise sovereign power (to the exclusion of the exercise of such power by Panama) are meaningless and border on the absurd. These arguments are neither germane nor sensible. Unless the present power of the United States over the Canal Zone (and therefore over the Canal itself) remains undiminished, the government of the United States would place itself in the untenable position of accepting responsibility without authority. This we must not do. There can be no compromise here. It would not work. It never has whenever it is required to work.

The proponents contend that the language in the neutrality treaty which states that the parties will maintain “the regime of neutrality” gives the United States the right of intervention if necessary. These words are similar to those of the Hay Pauncefort Treaty of 1901 between Great Britain and the United States. No one has ever contended that this gave rise to any British intervention rights. And as noted hereinbefore, Dr. Escobar flatly denies that the words confer on the United States any such rights and he also flatly denies that the United States may decide what would constitute a breach of neutrality. In the premises, the word "neutrality" in Panamanian eyes would apply to everybody as the treaty itself states. So that the Soviets or their proxies, the Cubans, can be provided with naval base facilities at Colon or Panama City or both, and Panama undertakes no obligation not to be "neutral" in favor of Cuba and the U.S.S.R. Soviet naval facilities in Panama were discussed as recently as July 16, 1977 as hereinbefore mentioned, while the Soviet delegation was in Panama to conclude an economic treaty with Panama—naval facilities and a sea-level canal.

The real issue, the real choice, is whether we should stay or leave altogether. The answer should be clear. We cannot leave. We cannot surrender in the face of threats and duress even if there were an explosion if the treaties are not confirmed. But there will also be violence if the treaties are confirmed. The Panamanian radicals, encouraged by Escobar, promise this already. United States influence in this vital area is seriously impaired by the extension of Communist power and influence outward from Cuba and by our past defeats and retreats. The western world and our allies in the far east already doubt our resolve and will to defend ourselves. And so too, perhaps, do the Soviets.

There is ample room to deal fairly and equitably with other but much less important problems on the Isthmus without these treaties.

U.S. BANKS' INVESTMENT IN PANAMA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on October 25 I brought to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate information on the exposure of U.S. banks in Panama. That information was based on replies by the Federal Reserve Board and the Comptroller of the Currency to my request for the following data:

First. Total claims of U.S. banks—national banks only, in the case of the Comptroller's Office—including their foreign branches and subsidiaries, on Panamanian residents, broken down by maturity;

Second. The proportion of such claims which represent claims of U.S. and foreign bank branches in Panama, that is, excluding Panamanian banks and other Panamanian residents;

Third. For each of the 20 largest U.S. banks—national banks only, in the case of the Comptroller's Office—the percentage of total U.S.—or national—bank claims on Panamanian residents and the percentage of total U.S.—or national—bank claims on non-Panamanian banks in Panama, for each bank, but with the name, size and other identifying characteristics of the banks deleted;

Fourth. For each of the 20 largest U.S. national banks, total claims on Panamanian residents with more than 1 year remaining to maturity, as a percentage of total capital, but with the name, size and other identifying characteristics of the banks deleted.

Mr. President, I learned later that the data provided by the two agencies were not comparable. The Federal Reserve and the Comptroller's Office used completely different definitions of "total claims" on Panamanian residents in their responses to my request, despite the fact that both agencies were aware of my requests to each and collaborated in compiling the data used in their responses. The inability of the two principal Federal bank regulatory agencies to coordinate their replies and apply a common definition to a simple request for information is symptomatic of the confusion and inconsistency inherent in our fragmented Federal bank regulatory system. This incident points to the wisdom, and urgent need for adoption of S. 684, which would consolidate the bank regulatory functions of the existing agencies—the Federal Reserve, the Comptroller's Office and the FDIC—into a single Federal Bank Commission. I hope we will move promptly in the next session of Congress to adopt this critical reform measure before the three separate, uncoordinated agencies fumble more seriously their responsibilities relating to our banking system.

Mr. President, I regret any inconvenience to my colleagues and the public which may have been caused by misleading and erroneous material inserted in the Record on October 25 at pages S17730 and S17731. I ask unanimous consent that the new and corrected material received from the Federal Reserve Board and the Comptroller's Office, including tables, be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

BOARD OF GOVERNORS,
FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, D.C. November 2, 1977.

Mr. ROBERT W. RUSSELL,
Counsel, Committee of Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. RUSSELL: Enclosed is the information you requested to supplement Chairman Burn's letter of October 11, 1977, to the Committee. The supplementary information shows the distribution among 20 large banks (11 National banks and 9 State member banks) of external claims on Panama, external claims being defined as all claims other than claims on Panamanian residents held by a U.S. bank's Panamanian office and payable in Panamanian Balboas.

Column 1 gives the percentage distribution of these claims showing how much is accounted for by the three banks having the largest amount of external claims, the next 3, etc. Column 2 shows what proportion of external claims on one group of borrowers, Panamanian offices of non-Panamanian banks are accounted for by each group.

As Table 1 of the October 11 letter shows, external claims on Panamanian offices of non-Panamanian banks represent $463 million of the $1,433 million in total external claims. Of the $1,433 million in total external claims, $802 million is held by national banks and $631 million by State member banks.

It should be noted that the three banks having the largest amount of external claims are not the same banks as those having the largest amount of total claims, due to the varying amount of local office business conducted by banks. Therefore, the individual banks included in each three bank aggregate in this table are not necessarily the same banks included in each grouping in Table 3 of the October 11 letter.

Also enclosed is the listing of foreign branches of member banks which you requested.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL G. MARTINSON,
Foreign Banking Analyst.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, D.C., October 11, 1977.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am pleased to respond to your letter of September 19 requesting information about U.S. bank claims on Panamanian residents.

Enclosed are four tables prepared by our staff which provide the information in question. These tables are derived from several different sources. Table 1 was prepared from data collected by the Federal Reserve as of year end 1976 from a group of approximately eighty U.S. banks; these data were published in a press release issued on June 3, 1977.

Tables 2, 3 and 4 were prepared from data as of mid-1977 collected in a new survey on bank exposure conducted by the Federal Reserve in cooperation with other bank supervisory authorities. Twenty large U.S. banks reported total claims on Panama amounting to $2.2 billion in this survey, compared with $2.8 billion of claims on Panama reported in the earlier survey noted above for a larger group of banks. Data collected in the new survey are still being processed by our staff and may be subject to further revision. If significant revisions should occur later in the course of the editing process, I will provide you with a revised set of tables.

Data in Table 3 have been combined into groups of three banks in order to preserve the confidentiality of data for individual banks.

I hope this information will be useful to your Committee. Please let me know if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR F. BURNS.

Enclosures.

Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the data initially supplied by the Comptroller concerning the claims of U.S. nationally chartered banks on Panamanian residents did not include claims denominated in the local Panamanian currency, the balboa. I do not know the Comptroller's reasons for excluding these claims. They are significant, amounting to $709 million as of June 30, 1977, and, because the balboa is by treaty permanently fixed at par with the dollar, claims in the two currencies are largely interchangeable.

Once local currency claims are included and the data on foreign currency revised the Comptroller reports that U.S. national banks had $1.7 billion in claims on Panamanian residents as of June 30; $1 billion of the total was in foreign currency claims, principally in dollars, with the remaining $700 million denominated in balboas. The 20 largest national banks held $1.5 billion, 89 percent, of the claims.

The revised data provided by the Comptroller make it clear that the U.S. banks most involved in Panama are nationally chartered banks not State-chartered banks as previously reported. The Federal Reserve Board reported that the 20 U.S. banks with the largest claims in Panama—which includes a few large State-chartered banks as well as the largest nationally chartered banks—had $2.162 billion in total claims as of June 30. Of the total, $1.432 billion was in foreign currency claims—principally dollars—and $730 million in local currency claims—balboas. By comparison the 20 largest U.S. national banks had $1.5 billion in claims on Panama, $802 million in foreign currency claims, and $709 million in local currency claims.

Mr. President, the revised submissions from the Comptroller's Office and the Federal Reserve Board contain few surprises. A few U.S. banks do most of the business done in Panama by U.S. banks. U.S. banks use Panama largely for short-term, interbank transactions and to book loans throughout Central America. When the maturities of the claims are considered no bank appears to have inordinate exposure in Panama. That conclusion must be tempered in the case of national banks, however, because the Comptroller does not collect data on the maturity structure of local currency claims, which are held principally by three or four large nationally chartered U.S. banks. It would behoove the Comptroller to collect data on the maturity structure of those claims.

THE PANAMA CANAL ISSUE

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senate Republican policy committee, under the able leadership of the senior Senator from Texas, John Tower, has been very active during this session of the 95th Congress.

Under the chairmanship of the Senator from Texas, the policy committee and staff have reviewed and analyzed numerous public policy issues including the economy, energy, tax policy, election reform, welfare reform, and foreign policy and national security. The studies addressed by Senator Tower and the committee staff to date have all been important national issues. Without exception, these studies have made a significant contribution to the debate on the issue, both in the Senate and in the Nation.

As chairman of the Republican conference I am most grateful to Senator Tower for his effective and farsighted leadership and for the excellent work of the policy committee. The Republican conference and the policy committee have enjoyed a close and effective working relationship during this Congress.

Recognizing that the Panama Canal treaties are a major issue facing the Senate and the American people, Senator Tower directed the policy committee staff to do a detailed analysis of the "Panama Canal Treaty" and the "Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal." The study is one of the best analyses I have seen on the issue of the Panama Canal. It is balanced and fair. It carefully considers the arguments of the major articles in both treaties pro and con.

I commend Senator Tower and the committee staff for this excellent analysis. I feel it would be helpful to all Members of Congress and, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the study entitled "The Panama Canal Issue" be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

PREAMBLE

Analysis: The long disputed issue of whether the United States or Panama is sovereign over the Panama Canal and the present Canal Zone is dealt with quickly and simply in the Preamble. The United States, "Acknowledging the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory," agrees with Panama to establish a new relationship. This provision is intended to resolve permanently the confusion over which nation holds sovereignty stemming from Article III of the 1903 Treaty between the United States and Panama. It reads as follows:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

Pro: Recognition by the United States of Panama's sovereignty is timely and long overdue. The colonial era ended years ago, and the continued exercise of sovereign rights in the Canal Zone by the United States is a vestige of a bygone era. Testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Commission on September 27, 1977, General George Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, emphasized the need to end American colonialism in Panama:

"I would say as a factor one of the elements that leads to our support of these new treaties is the impact, the favorable impact, ratification would have on all Latin America and the acceptance of the United States as living by the moral principles that we espouse in divesting ourselves of this last appearance of colonialism in Panama."

No one can honestly dispute the circumstances under which the United States acquired its "sovereign rights" under the 1903 treaty. It was gunboat diplomacy at its finest. Panama was in no position to resist the granting of those rights in 1903, but times have changed. It is now time for the United States to redress that infamous page in our history and restore to Panama its full sovereignty over the Canal Zone.

This is a time when foreign control and dominance by great powers is no longer tolerated by even the smallest nations. The Panama Canal Zone is the territory of Panama and should be turned over to the people and Government of that country. In today's world, what nation would accept a foreign presence that dominates its economy, cuts its territory in half and renders untold damage to its national pride. The United States wouldn't tolerate it for one day. As the colonial era has faded into history, the U.S. has shown great sensitivity to other nations where it held substantial treaty rights. These include, Japan, Okinawa, the Marianas, Spain, Libya, Greece and the Philippines. Why not in Panama?

Con: The 1903 Convention between the United States and Panama gave the U.S. sovereign rights over the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone "in perpetuity". The United States may well have conducted some gunboat diplomacy, but it was that very diplomacy which created the nation of Panama. Without it Panama would still be a province of Colombia today. It is difficult to measure all the benefits which came to Panama as a result of American involvement. The private French Company was bankrupt and incapable of completing the project. Only with American financing, engineering and resources was it possible to build the Canal. Since 1903 the United States has largely eradicated malaria and other serious health problems in the Isthmus. From the time the Canal opened the United States has operated it fairly, efficiently and without serious financial loss. Since it opened the Canal has returned approximately $642 million to the U.S. Treasury in interest on the original debt which has never been amortized. The American Government and the American taxpayer paid roughly $387 million in 1904-1914 to build the Panama Canal. The building, financing and operation of the Canal is something Panama or any other government could never have accomplished.

Panama has benefited financially from the Canal. For example, it is estimated that Panama is now receiving, directly or indirectly $250 million per year from Canal and Canal related operations. Since 1963 these benefits total $1.8 billion.

There is some question that the Canal will continue to be operated efficiently and fairly if Panama gains control of it. Since General Torrijos came to power in 1968 he has increased the national debt of Panama from $167 million to $1.5 billion. Certainly the economy of Panama is not strong enough to maintain the Canal should it become a big money loser.

The left-wing bias of certain Panamanian Government officials and the dismal human rights record of General Torrijos should be a warning to the United States Senate that the future of the Panama Canal is questionable at best.

In testimony before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary Harold Parfitt, the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, stated:

"I believe the general consensus is that the Panamanian Government itself is not Communist-leaning, but advisers in various places within the Government are in fact Communists."

In the field of human rights Panama is practically a total failure. In the view of Freedom House, an internationally respected organization which deals with human rights worldwide, Panama has a record worse than Argentina, Chile and even Cuba. In fact their record is the worst in all of Latin America.

The rights of sovereignty must be maintained by the United States if the Canal itself is to remain free, open and efficiently operated.

Several Supreme Court decisions including Wilson v. Shaw [204 U.S. 24 (1907)], lower court decisions and ruling of Federal agencies show that the Canal belongs to the United States. The 1903 Treaty is a valid binding document under international law. It grants to the United States the full rights of sovereignty and precludes the exercise of those rights by Panama. To replace the 1903 Treaty with a new one turning the Canal over to Panama will prove to be a serious mistake by the United States.

Article I: Abrogation of prior treaties and establishment of a new relationship Analysis: Paragraph 1 of Article I stipulates that upon ratification, the new Panama Canal Treaty terminates and supersedes the following treaties:

(a) The Isthmian Canal Convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, November 8, 1903.

(b) The Treaty of Friendship and Mutual Understanding and Cooperation, March 2, 1936.

(c) Memorandum of Understanding reached between the United States and Panama, January 25, 1955.

(d) All other treaties, conventions and exchange of notes between the two countries and all provisions covering the Panama Canal which appear in other treaties unless specifically retained by other provisions of this Treaty.

Under paragraph 2, Panama as the territorial sovereign grants to the United States "the rights necessary to regulate the transit of ships through the Panama Canal, and to manage, operate, maintain, improve, protect and defend the Canal." This authority is probably sufficient for the United States to operate, maintain and defend the Canal, although it is far from the total authority now held by the United States.

Paragraph 3 states that Panama "shall participate increasingly in the management and protection and defense of the Canal . . ."

Pro: The abrogation of previous treaties is necessary if a new relationship between the United States and Panama is to be established. The previous treaties, especially the 1903 Treaty, were unequal and unfair to Panama. There has been conflicting interpretation by the signatories over the sovereignty issue. It is timely and fitting that the old treaties be terminated. It is a long overdue magnanimous act by the United States.

Paragraph 2 of Article I adequately protects the rights of the United States to operate and defend the Canal through 1999 when the Treaty expires.

Under Paragraph 3 a good working relationship is established between the U.S. and Panama that will prepare Panama to operate the Canal after December 1999.

Con: Abrogation of the 1903, 1936, and 1955 Treaties by Article I is a mistake. The United States under this article gives up one of its most important economic and strategic assets. Furthermore, it terminates the American position in Panama without any compensation to the United States Treasury.

Paragraph 2 once again recognizes the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal and the Canal Zone. Since Panama is the grantor of the rights to the United States, the position of the U.S. is not unlike our position in other countries where the sovereign from time to time has chosen to terminate the grant of rights prematurely.

The joint relationship established under Paragraph 3 may well prove to be a source of friction between the signatories, especially in light of Panama's growing nationalism and deep-seated resentment about the American role in Panama.

Article II: Ratification, entry into force, and termination

Analysis: This treaty shall be ratified in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the signatories. Instruments of ratification shall be exchanged in Panama at the same time the Treaty concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal is ratified.

The Panama Canal Treaty goes into force six calendar months from the date when the instruments of ratification are exchanged.

Paragraph 2 stipulates that this Treaty terminates at noon Panama time, December 31, 1999.

Pro: This article meets the requirement under Article II Section 2 of the United States Constitution requiring that all treaties be approved in the U.S. Senate by 2/3 majority of all Senators present and voting.

There is no requirement for this treaty to be approved by the House of Representatives. The Supreme Court rulings on this subject have all applied to Federal-State relations. The Court has never addressed the question of this power as a limitation on the treaty making powers of the President and the Senate. There are many precedents, both legislative and legal that clearly show the President may dispose of Federal property by treaty and by action of executive agencies. To cite one of many examples, the U.S. ceded the Ryukyu and Daito Islands to Japan in 1972 by treaty without House of Representative approval of the transfer.

Con: The wisdom of the founding fathers in giving the Senate the constitutional responsibility of approving treaties is vindicated once again by the treaties on the Panama Canal. The major responsibility of the Senate in this case is to determine if American interests regarding the Panama Canal have been adequately protected in the two treaties submitted by the Carter Administration. Clearly the treaties are inadequate, and it falls to the United States Senate to bring these inadequacies to the attention of the American people.

A major constitutional requirement that the Carter Administration is attempting to ignore is Article IV, section 3, clause 2, which grants to Congress the power to dispose of Federal property:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States . . ."

There is no question that the United States holds and owns property in the Panama Canal Zone. While the Carter Administration has chosen to ignore this constitutional requirement, it should be remembered that the House of Representatives has not. Recently 50 members of the House filed suit in the Supreme Court to protect the constitutional right of the House to vote on the disposal of U.S. property. Once this right is asserted by the House, it cannot be constitutionally denied. In a treatise on the treaty and property disposal power of Congress published August 4, 1977 the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress said:

"* * * the Supreme Court has constantly ruled that Congress' power to dispose of federal territory and property is exclusive."

Whatever power the President has to convey property by treaty is delegated by Congress and is not exclusive to the treaty making power. Such authority can be withdrawn by the Congress. Finally as the Congressional Research Service points out, transfers of property to Panama have occurred in the past and almost without exception, these transfers have been approved by the House of Representatives.

Article III: Canal operation and management

Analysis: Paragraph 1 restates the rights granted to the United States by Panama whereby the U.S. will manage, operate and maintain the Panama Canal and the subsidiary works, installations and equipment. The U.S. agrees to exercise these rights in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

Paragraph 2 allows the United States to exercise the following key powers:

- (a) Use all the necessary installations and areas without cost except as provided in this Treaty, to carry out its responsibilities in operating and maintaining the Canal.
- (b) Make such improvements and alterations as it deems appropriate.
- (c) Make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules respecting navigation and maritime matters. Panama may lend its cooperation when necessary to enforce these rules.
- (d) The U.S. has the right to establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for use of the Panama Canal.

Paragraph 3 creates a new governing body, the Panama Canal Commission to operate the Canal through 1999. The Commission shall be a United States Government Agency:

(a) The Panama Canal Commission is to be supervised by a 9 member board, five of whom shall be U.S. nationals and 4 of whom shall be Panamanian nationals nominated by the Government of Panama for appointment to the Board by the United States.

(b) Under subparagraph (b) the Republic of Panama may request the removal of a Panamanian member from the Commission and the United States is obligated to honor the request. If the U.S. wishes to remove a Panamanian member, the two signatories will consult in advance to reach agreement covering the removal.

(c) From the time the Treaty goes into force until December 31, 1989, the Administrator of the Panama Canal Commission shall be an American, with a Panamanian serving as Deputy Administrator. From January 1, 1990 until December 31, 1999 the Administrator shall be a Panamanian and the Deputy shall be an American. Panama shall propose the above Panamanian nationals to the United States for appointment by the U.S.

(d) Should the United States remove the Panamanian from his position as Administrator or Deputy Administrator, Panama shall propose another of its nationals for appointment by the U.S.

Paragraph 5. The Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse the Republic of Panama for costs incurred by that Government in providing the following public services which are currently provided by the Canal Zone Government: police and fire protection, street maintenance, traffic management and garbage collection. The Commission shall pay $10 million annually for the above services. Every three years during the life of the Treaty this sum shall be reexamined by the signatories to determine if readjustments are required.

Paragraph 6 reserves to Panama the responsibility to provide customs, immigration, postal, court and licensing services.

Paragraph 7 requires the U.S. and Panama to establish a Panama Canal Consultative Committee composed of an equal number of high-level representatives from each country. This committee shall advise the U.S. and Panama on matters of policy affecting the Canal's operation including general tolls, employment and training programs to increase the participation of Panamanians in the operation of the Canal.

Paragraph 8 requires that there shall be growing participation of Panamanian nationals at all levels to prepare, in an orderly and efficient way, for the assumption of full operating control of the Canal by Panama upon the termination of this Treaty.

Paragraph 10 stipulates that upon entry into force of this Treaty the Panama Canal Company and the U.S. Canal Zone Government shall cease to operate within the Republic of Panama territory that formerly constituted the Canal Zone.

Pro: Paragraph 2 gives to the United States all the necessary power to operate the Canal as well as the necessary use of installations and facilities. Under subparagraph (b) the U.S. is free to make the necessary improvements or alterations for efficient management of the Canal. Subparagraph (c) is an important grant in that the United States is empowered to make and enforce all rules pertaining to passage of vessels and the rules of navigation. This power gives the United States the dominant role in operating the Canal. Under subparagraph (d) the U.S. is given near exclusive control over the setting, modification and collection of tolls which will protect American shipping from unwarranted fare increases for the duration of the Treaty. This is a critical right and properly protects U.S. interests through the end of the century.

Paragraph 3 which creates the Panama Canal Commission establishes a balanced workable relationship between the two signatories. The U.S. maintains a voting edge, with 5 members compared to 4 for Panama. No Panamanian can be appointed to the Commission without U.S. approval. The role of Administrator and Deputy Administrator is balanced and will go far in preparing key Panamanian nationals to administer and operate the Canal after December 31, 1999. Again the U.S. is protected because it has final approval authority over the appointment Panamanians to both positions for the duration of the Treaty.

Paragraph 5, in keeping with the Treaty's recognition of Panama's sovereignty over the Canal, properly transfers to the Government of Panama the responsibility to provide police and fire protection and to operate the legal system under which the Commission and its employees will operate. The $10 million annual payment for the services appears to be reasonable and fair.

Paragraph 7 gives to Panama a joint consultative role in determining the policy governing operation of the Canal and the setting of tolls. This will be a useful learning experience for the Panamanians.

Paragraph 10. The termination of the Panama Canal Zone and the Canal Zone Government heralds the end of a bygone era. This action will be applauded by all Panamanians, by the nations of Latin America and by the third world. It will signal the beginning of a new and more trusting relationship between the United States and Panama.

Con: Article III contains several contradictions.

Paragraph 1 appears to give the United States a unilateral right to manage, operate and maintain the Canal for the duration of the Treaty.

Subparagraphs (c), (d) and (g) of Paragraph 2 appear to reinforce the sole right of the United States to (c) "Make and enforce all rules pertaining to passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules with respect to navigation and maritime matters * * *" Likewise the U.S. is empowered to (d) "Establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal * * *"

Paragraph 3 and subsequent paragraphs then proceed to dilute and reduce the powers granted the United States in Paragraph 1 and 2. Among these are:

(a) Creation of a Panama Canal Commission governed by a Board of 9 members, 4 of whom shall be Panamanians, apparently with full voting rights.

(b) The United States must "reach agreement" with Panama before it can remove a Panamanian board member.

Paragraph 5 and 6 give to the Government of Panama control over the police, courts, immigration and customs. Regardless of what powers are granted to the United States under the Treaty, other more critical powers granted to and reserved to Panama could be used at some future time to harass U.S. operations and presence in the Canal Zone. Advocates of the Treaty will say that interference of this kind is prohibited under the various articles in the Treaty. Such idealistic pronouncements are quite meaningless should Panama choose to negatively exercise these newly acquired powers. Who holds the police and judicial powers is more critical than treaty provisions describing their use.

Paragraph 7 sets up a Consultative Committee of high ranking representatives from both sides which "shall" advise the signatories "on matters of policy affecting the Canal's operations" and "on matters such as general tolls policy * * *". This Committee, unlike the Board that governs the Commission, has "equal" representation. Its advice is not described as something that may be given, but something that "shall" be given. Thus, what first appears to be a unilateral right of the U.S. to operate and manage the Canal and set and collect tolls for the duration of the Treaty is modified by giving Panama a significant role in the entire scheme of things. Treaty advocates will undoubtedly argue that this special relationship will work, and one hopes it will. However, it must be recognized that Panama now has legal standing as part of the machinery of Canal operation and government. Under certain political circumstances, that status, combined with the newly acquired police and legal powers, could be used very effectively against the United States. Finally, in a dispute over toll policy the U.S. can point to paragraphs 1 and 2 as the source of its authority, but Panama can point to paragraph 7 claiming that it has a role in toll policy as well. As in most other provisions of the Treaty, the language is imprecise, unclear and quite contradictory.

Article IV: Protection and defense

Analysis: Paragraph 1 commits both the U.S. and Panama "to protect and defend the Panama Canal". Such action shall be pursuant to each nation's constitutional process and covers "the danger resulting from an armed attack or other actions which threaten the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it."

This appears to be a general and blanket right for both parties to take whatever actions necessary to defend the Canal.

Paragraph 2 specifies that "For the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal."

Paragraph 3, "In order to facilitate the participation and cooperation of the armed forces of both parties in the protection and defense of the Canal * * *." The Treaty establishes a Combined Board "comprised of an equal number of senior military representatives of each Party."

"The Combined Board shall provide for coordination and cooperation concerning such matters as:

- (a) The preparation of contingency plans for the protection and defense of the Canal based upon the cooperative efforts of the armed forces of both Parties;
- (b) The planning and conduct of combined military exercises; and
- (c) The conduct of the United States and Panamanian military operations with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal."

This provision of subparagraph (c) appears to give Panama through the Combined Board, the right and the responsibility to jointly and equally participate in the "conduct" of military operations carried out for the purpose of protecting the Canal.

Pro: Article IV is designed to give Panama a role in protecting and defending the Canal while reserving to the United States the "primary" defense role through December 1999. It would be unrealistic to exclude Panama from any defense role for the duration of the Treaty. Panama has an equal interest, perhaps a greater interest than the U.S. in keeping the Canal free, open and operating efficiently. Directly related to that interest is Panama's desire to protect the Canal from any kind of attack either foreign or domestic. By agreeing to give the Government of Panama a direct role and specified treaty rights under paragraphs 1 and 3, the United States has done more to protect the Canal against internal attack and subversion than any other defense arrangement could provide. Conversely, if Panama were completely excluded from any defense role, the domestic frustration and damaged pride of the Panamanian people would undoubtedly lead to internal attacks and sabotage against U.S. personnel in Panama or the Canal itself.

The role of the Combined Board is a workable and cooperative arrangement that will involve Panama in all aspects of defending and protecting the Canal.

Con: Like so many other provisions of the treaty Article IV is contradictory. Paragraph 1 gives the United States and Panama an equal role in defending and protecting the Canal. This shall be done according to the constitutional processes of both countries. Suffice it to say, the constitutional process of a left-wing dictator is considerably more flexible than it is for the United States.

The "primary responsibility" to defend and protect the Canal granted to the U.S. in paragraph 2 runs head-on into the "equal" role given Panama in Paragraphs 1 and 3. The membership of the Combined Board is equal. It does not favor the United States numerically nor is the U.S. given removal powers over the Panamanian members of the board. Furthermore, subparagraph (c) gives Panama through the Combined Board an equal role in the "conduct" of all military operations. The potential for mischief by Panama under these conflicting arrangements is enormous. It is not unthinkable that Mr. Castro may someday activate or support a guerilla movement in the Isthmus. He has, after all, done that in several Latin American countries and in Africa. The object of attack could be the Canal itself. With the defense arrangement under Article IV, Panama is in a position to thwart and sabotage any defense effort of the United States. Should Panama oppose a U.S. defense strategy or action, it will probably solidify Panamanian public opinion against the United States and make that defense effort very difficult and perhaps impossible.

Paragraph 2 which gives the U.S. "primary responsibility" is mere window dressing. Article IV, when read in its entirety, makes the defense and protection of the Panama Canal an equal and joint responsibility for the two signatories. To claim that the U.S. has the major or primary responsibility, as does the Carter Administration is simply not supported by the facts.

Paragraph 5 requires the U.S. to maintain its forces in "normal times" at a level not to exceed the number in the Canal Zone immediately prior to the time when this Treaty goes into force.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the two signatories have not decided what the U.S. force level shall be after the treaties are ratified. The word "normal" is not defined and may well become a serious conflict after ratification.

Article VIII: Privileges and immunities

Analysis: Paragraph 1 stipulates that installations, instrumentalities, archives and documents owned or used by the United States Government in Panama "shall be inviolable". "The two Parties shall agree on procedures to be followed in the conduct of any criminal investigation at such locations by the Republic of Panama."

Paragraph 2 states that the agencies and instrumentalities of the U.S. Government operating in Panama pursuant to this Treaty "shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama." Paragraph 3 allows the U.S. to designate 20 officials of the Panama Canal Commission who with their dependents shall enjoy diplomatic immunity under international law and practice.

Pro: Article VIII protects the United States during its remaining 23 year tenure in Panama. Paragraphs 1 and 2 provide that U.S. installations, instrumentalities, archives and documents "shall be inviolable" and "immune from the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama."

This provides adequate protection for the United States and its personnel who will continue to reside and work in Panama.

Since the United States has recognized the sovereignty of Panama over all its territory, including the Canal and the present Canal Zone, it would be inconsistent not to define the legal status of U.S. instrumentalities and agencies in Panama.

Con: The enunciation that U.S. installations, instrumentalities, archives and documents will be "inviolable" and "immune from Panamanian jurisdiction" is welcome. However, Article VIII does not exempt U.S. personnel from Panamanian jurisdiction for the duration of the treaty. Although Article XI provides that United States personnel shall be subject concurrently to U.S. and Panamanian law during the 30 month transition period, at the conclusion thereof Americans working in Panama become subject to Panamanian law, police and courts. The inviolability and immunity of U.S. agencies, instrumentalities and installations should have been applied as well to U.S. personnel. With Panama's sorry human rights record American personnel will undoubtedly be subjected to police harassment and a judicial process that will fall far short in protecting their U.S. constitutional rights.

Article IX: Applicable laws and law enforcement

Analysis: Paragraph 1 states, "In accordance with the provisions of this Treaty and related agreements, the law of the Republic of Panama shall apply in the areas made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty."

The question arises as to whether this is a general application of Panamanian law to the areas under U.S. control and whether it conflicts with paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article VIII which make all U.S. instrumentalities "inviolable" and "immune" from Panamanian jurisdiction.

Pro: This provisions is a blanket application of Panamanian law to U.S. operations and facilities. Paragraph 1 is qualified by the phrase "In accordance with the provisions of this treaty and related agreements * * * "What appears to be a conflict with paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article VIII does not follow because of the qualifier. The inviolability and immunity of U.S. operations and facilities from Panamanian law is thus protected by the qualifier.

Con: Again the draftmanship is unclear and imprecise. Obviously the United States wanted complete inviolability and immunity from all Panamanian law, while Panama hoped during the negotiating process to subject all U.S. operations, facilities and personnel to Panamanian jurisdiction. Consequently the language was compromised and purposely obscured. What should not be forgotten is that both powers will interpret the provisions of Articles VIII and IX to serve their own interests. Paragraph 2 of Article VIII should read that the U.S. shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama notwithstanding any other provision of this treaty, but it doesn't. Article IX, paragraph 1 should specify that U.S. operations and agencies shall be inviolable and immune from Panamanian jurisdiction regardless of the general coverage listed in the paragraph, but it doesn't. The contradiction and imprecise drafting could well prove to be a serious source of contention at some future date.

Article XII: A sea-level canal or a third lane of locks

Analysis: Paragraph 1 commits both parties "to study jointly the feasibility of a sea-level canal in the Republic of Panama * * *"

Paragraph 2(a) stipulates that no new interoceanic canal shall be built in the Republic of Panama during the lifetime of this treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this treaty or "as the two parties may otherwise agree * * *"

Paragraph 2(b) provides that the United States "shall not negotiate with third states for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two parties may otherwise agree."

In paragraph 3 the Republic of Panama grants to the United States the right to add a third lane to the existing Canal at any time during the lifetime of the treaty. The only requirement is for the U.S. to provide copies of the plans to Panama. There is no provision for meeting the cost of building the third lane of locks.

Paragraph 5 prevents the United States from using nuclear excavating techniques to build the third lane of locks or a new sea-level canal.

Pro: A new sea-level canal may one day be necessary to meet the shipping needs of world commerce and to accommodate super tankers and giant ore ships. In 1970 the Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Study Commission concluded that the most feasible site for a new sea-level canal would be Route 10 through the Republic of Panama. Thus, the prospect of building a sea-level canal in a third country is not very high. If such a Canal is built in Panama, it is only proper that Panama be a party to the process. Furthermore if a new sea-level canal is built, the U.S. under Article XII is given the right through 1999 to build it jointly with Panama. No other nation, such as Russia can be part of this process without U.S. approval.

Paragraph 5 stands on its own merits. No nation can allow another power to use nuclear devices within its borders without its consent.

Con: The real mistake and unwarranted concession in Article XII is the agreement by the United States for the duration of the treaty, not to negotiate with third states for the right to construct a new sea-level canal elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere without the approval of Panama.

This provision unduly binds the U.S. The Panama Canal may become obsolete and very unprofitable much sooner than expected. The Panamanians may try to nationalize the Canal, leaving the U.S. the option of invading Panama or doing nothing. The U.S. has no assurance that Panama will give its approval for a new Canal within its territory.

Should the United States attempt to get Panama's approval for a sea-level canal outside of Panama, one must assume that approval will not be forthcoming. Why should Panama approve a competitive canal when it can retain a monopoly as long as the new canal is not built?

Finally, the longer the U.S. waits, the less likely that a sea-level canal will be built. If Panama withholds its approval, the U.S. cannot even start negotiations until the 21st Century begins. Such a delay will probably make the cost prohibitive.

Article XIII

Analysis: Paragraph 1. Upon termination of the Panama Canal Treaty Panama assumes total responsibility for management, operation and maintenance of the Canal. It must be turned over by the United States, in operating condition and free of liens and debts.

Under paragraph 2, "The United States of America transfers, without charge, to the Republic of Panama all rights, title and interest the United States of America may have with respect to all real property, including non-removable improvements thereon" This transfer takes place generally at the time the treaty goes into force. Under subparagraph (d), certain other properties to be used by the United States pursuant to the provisions of this Treaty and for its duration are transferred at the time the Panama Canal Treaty is terminated.

Paragraph 4 states that Panama shall receive from the Panama Canal Commission "a just and equitable return on the national resources which it has dedicated to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal"

Subparagraph (a) requires the Commission to pay Panama $0.30 (based on U.S. dollar) per net Panama Canal ton for each vessel transiting the Canal once the Treaty goes into effect. This shall be adjusted periodically to reflect changes in the U.S. wholesale price index. Subparagraph (b) requires a fixed annuity of $10 million (U.S. dollars) to be paid to Panama out of Canal operating revenues. This figure shall be a fixed expense of the Panama Canal Commission.

Subparagraph (c) requires an additional payment of $10 million (U.S. dollars) to Panama to be paid out of Canal operating revenues to the extent such revenues exceed expenditures of the Commission. Should such revenue surpluses not be available in any given year, "the unpaid balance shall be paid from operating surpluses in future years in a manner to be mutually agreed."

Pro: Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article XIII are the heart of this Treaty. Panamanian control of its own territory and its greatest single national asset and resource will be realized by this article. Panama's long occupation by a foreign power will begin to terminate when the Treaty goes into effect. It should be remembered, however, that Panama must wait 22-23 more years before it acquires complete control over its own territory. In the words of General Torrijos, "Panama must walk for 23 more years with a stone in its shoe in order to remove the dagger from its heart."

Panama has been extremely patient particularly during the post-war era. When compared with past sacrifices made by Panama, the financial payments going to that government under this treaty are not excessive.

Some have argued that the United States should receive compensation for transferring to Panama the Canal, the Canal Zone and associated properties. While the worth of the overall investment is indeed significant, it should not be forgotten that the United States has realized tremendous economic benefits from the Canal since it was opened. The savings in shipping costs alone are probably incalculable. Likewise, until 1975 the Canal produced a revenue surplus, most of which has been reinvested in the Canal.

It should not be forgotten that the U.S. is transferring to Panama a Canal with a questionable economic future. Now that the Canal is losing money and incapable of handling an increasing percentage of ocean going vessels, it may well turn out to be an economic liability for Panama especially if the U.S. and or Panama are forced to raise tolls to the point where alternative systems of transportation become more competitive.

Con: Article XIII specifically and the Panama Canal Treaty generally constitute one of the biggest giveaways in American history. The book value of the total American investment in the Panama Canal is $561 million, while the replacement cost of the Canal and its facility in today's dollars would be $9.8 billion. All this is turned over to Panama without reimbursement to the United States Treasury and the American taxpayer.

On top of the property transfer, the U.S. has agreed to pay Panama up to $20 million per year out of Panama Canal Commission revenues plus the $.30 per each Panama Canal ton transiting the Canal. Since the Canal is now losing money, one would hope that the $10 million to be paid to Panama as a fixed cost of the Commission can be raised from an increase in tolls. If not, will the United States Congress be required to appropriate this money as an operating expense of the Commission or under a treaty obligation which has become the law of the land?

Article XIII, paragraphs 1 and 2, transfer U.S. assets and property to the Government of Panama in an outright violation of Article IV, Section 3, paragraph 2, of the U.S. Constitution which reads as follows:

"The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States."

The argument by the Carter Administration that this transfer of U.S. property can take place through the treaty process alone is a clear case of ignoring the Constitution of the United States.

THE TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

Article I

Analysis: "The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this Treaty."

The declaration of neutrality is made unilaterally by the Republic of Panama and excludes the United States.

Pro: Panama is the only nation which can declare the neutrality of the Canal. It is exclusively in Panamanian territory and under the Panama Canal Treaty the undisputed sovereignty of Panama over the Canal is fully recognized by the United States. Thus the U.S. as a foreign power has no role in the neutrality declaration.

Con: The United States should have been a joint partner in the neutrality declaration contained in Article I. The Canal is designated as an international waterway. The United States has a major role in the defense of the Canal under the Panama Canal Treaty and, one would hope, a responsibility to maintain its neutrality beginning January 1, 2000. Panama, as a small weak nation, is not in a position to effectively protect the neutrality of the Canal against larger nations. As the builder, long-time operator, primary defender and the guarantor (the role of primary defender and guarantor is quite unclear, however) of the Canal's neutrality, the United States should have been a party of the declaration of neutrality.

Article II

Analysis: "The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the Canal in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality . . ."

The purpose of Article II is to keep the Canal open to all nations, belligerents and non-belligerents alike in time of peace and in time of war.

Pro: The only way to protect the Canal from attack, reprisals or sabotage in time of war is to assure that it will be completely neutral. To do otherwise would invite attack upon it by belligerents or nations which are denied neutral passage through the Canal.

As an international waterway, the Canal must be open, freely and equitably, to all nations of all political persuasion in times of peace and war. As a practical matter, the United States would not need to violate the Neutrality Treaty to keep Soviet vessels from going through the Canal in time of war. Soviet vessels trying to transit the Canal would be sitting ducks for the U.S. Navy which could sit outside the entrances of the Canal in international waters and block their passage or sink them if they tried to enter the Canal. Also in a time of hostilities with the U.S. it is unrealistic to assume that the Soviets would even attempt to transit the Canal.

Con: The guise of neutrality in time of war ignores the lessons of history. During World War II the United States effectively closed the Canal to Japanese and German shipping and the Suez Canal was closed to German shipping by the British. In a drawout worldwide conflagration involving the United States and the Soviet Union, the Panama Canal would be a very critical choke point. Natural resources going to American ports would transit the Canal in much greater quantity than at present. Naval warfare between the two super powers could be very intense as the Soviets tried to stop the flow of raw material to the United States. The U.S. Navy has a lot of eggs in a few baskets (aircraft carriers) which may require considerable movement of non-carrier naval forces from ocean to ocean. If the naval battle becomes critical, the United States may find it necessary to close the Canal to all Soviet vessels. Under such conditions the United States would find itself in violation of the Treaty. From a strategic point of view, no one in his right mind would advocate that the U.S. politely stand aside while Soviet men-of-war transit the Canal during a naval war on the high seas involving the world's two super powers.

It is argued that the U.S. Navy could station itself beyond the territorial waters of Panama and in effect prevent the Soviet Navy from using the Canal during hostilities between the two super powers. This argument has two glaring flaws. First, nothing will prevent the Soviet Union from doing the same thing to the U.S. Navy. Secondly, as the Soviet Navy grows, its ability to engage the U.S. Navy in its own backyard will also increase. To assume that the U.S. Navy could station itself near the Canal's entrances and block or destroy Soviet ships attempting to transit the Canal without facing a major naval battle is terribly naive.

Article III

Analysis: The key provision of Article III is subparagraph (e) of paragraph 1. "Vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of all nations shall at all times be entitled to transit the Canal, irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination or armament, without being subjected, as a condition of transit, to inspection, search or surveillance."

Subparagraph (e) apparently does the following:

1. Naval and auxiliary vessels of all nations shall be permitted to transit the Canal at all times including wartime.

2. No naval or auxiliary vessel of any nation shall be subject to inspection, search or surveillance at any time.

3. The transit of nuclear powered vessels through the Canal whether they be war vessels, auxiliaries, or merchantmen, is protected by the phrase "irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion. . . ."

4. The transit of nuclear armed naval vessels through the Canal is protected by the phrase "irrespective of their * * * armament * * *."

Pro: Article III, paragraph 1, subparagraph (e), further establishes the neutrality of the Panama Canal. If the Canal is to be completely neutral, transit through the Canal by war and auxiliary vessels during hostilities is absolutely necessary. Anything less would destroy the neutrality of the Canal.

Vital transit interests of the United States Navy are protected by subparagraph (e) as follows:

1. All U.S. naval vessels are permitted to transit the Canal in time of war and peace without inspection, search or surveillance.

2. U.S. nuclear powered and nuclear armed ships are also permitted to transit the Canal without inspection, search or surveillance.

Con: There may come a time when the national security interests of the United States require that the Panama Canal be closed to the naval vessels of the Soviet Union or other nations. History has shown that in time of war or belligerency, neutrality declarations are breached almost as frequently as they are respected. The Panama Canal is vital to the security of the United States. In times past, the U.S. closed it to enemy shipping. Under subparagraph (e) the U.S. no longer has that right.

Article IV

Analysis: Article IV is the heart of the controversy over whether or not the U.S. has the right to intervene in Panama for the purpose of defending and protecting the Canal. It reads as follows:

"The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties."

Unfortunately the above language is ambiguous, imprecise and confusing. Circumstances surrounding it clearly point to the fact that it was deliberately drafted this way because of the serious differences which the negotiators had concerning the defense role of the United States after the year 1999. It is very important to note, therefore, what the article says and what it does not say.

1. It says that the United States and Panama "agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty." From this language it is clear that the United States does have some kind of role in maintaining the neutrality of the Canal.

2. It does not say how this neutrality is to be maintained.

3. It does not say which of the two parties shall determine how and when the neutrality of the Panama Canal is violated.

4. It does not say what mechanism, procedure, policy or action can or shall be taken to protect the Canal's neutrality.

Pro: The regime of neutrality will be properly maintained by the United States and Panama. This was a crucial issue in the negotiations but it has been satisfactorily resolved.

Mr. Sol Linowitz, the former U.S. Chief Negotiator during the Panama Canal Talks, clarified the U.S. position before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 27, 1977:

"Under the Treaty, the United States is in a position to assure that the Canal's permanent neutrality is maintained, and there is not, as Secretary Vance has said, any limitation on our ability to take such action as we may deem necessary in the event the Canal's neutrality is threatened or violated from any source * * *."

"Thus, the Treaty provides for the United States maximum freedom to determine how to carry out its responsibility for Canal neutrality. We are under no obligation to consult with or seek approval from any other nation or international body before acting to maintain the neutrality of the Canal nor does the Treaty in any other way limit our ability to act."

Also in his testimony Mr. Linowitz put to rest some of the confusion coming from the Panamanian negotiators who on occasion have given differing interpretations of Article IV from that given by U.S. officials. He stated:

"In signing the treaties at the Pan American Union here in Washington on September 7, 1977, General Torrijos told the people of Panama, the people of the Hemisphere and the people of the world; 'We have agreed upon a neutrality treaty that places us under the protective umbrella of the Pentagon. This pact could, if not administered judiciously by future generations, become an instrument of permanent intervention'."

Secretary Vance likewise takes the position that under Article IV the U.S. has unlimited freedom of action. In his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 27, he said:

"This means there is no limit under the treaties on the freedom of the United States to assure permanently the canal's neutrality."

If there was any question about what right the United States has to defend the Panama Canal under Article IV, it was resolved on October 15, 1977 by Mr. Carter and General Torrijos:

"Under the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal (The Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective Constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be reerected at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

"The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall be so interpreted to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

Thus the various clarifications have settled the issue.

As General Maxwell Taylor has pointed out, this was a very hotly contested issue between the two parties; the language in Article IV is the best obtainable and to meddle with it now could very well doom the Treaty to defeat.

Con: The basic problem with Article IV is that both the United States and Panama have been unwilling to give up their respective positions regarding the right of intervention by the United States.

Consequently, the language is deliberately ambiguous. This might be necessary for political reasons in the United States and Panama, but the ambiguity and confusion must also be considered in a long-range context. Should the time ever come when the U.S. finds it necessary to intervene to protect the Canal for whatever reason, it will not be the intent of negotiators, or their interpretations that will count. It will be the language of Article IV. If Panama is unwilling to concede this right today, it is certain the Panamanians will oppose American intervention in the future under any circumstance which they do not support or approve. And they can point to the language of Article IV and accurately say the right of American intervention is not specified.

The interpretations given by key Panamanian officials show this to be true. It is not necessary to list all their pronouncements, but a few will clearly show that they do not concede the right of intervention to the United States.

In a speech before the Panamanian National assembly on August 19, 1977, Dr. Romula Bethancourt the Chief Panamanian negotiator said:

"They said that they wanted the Panama Canal to be neutral and we said we entirely agreed with them. Differences then arose only in what they understood by neutrality and what we understood by neutrality. They proposed that Panama and the United States declare that the Canal was neutral and that the United States would guarantee that neutrality. Panama was opposed to this concept, explaining that we did not want the United States to maintain a guarantee over the State of Panama, using the neutrality issue as an excuse. This was another source of debate that kept the negotiations stalled until the United States gave up the idea of its guaranteeing the Canal's neutrality.

The criticism made of it—some that you have heard or have read—indicate that we give the United States the right to intervene in our country after the year 2000. These critics think that rights of intervention are granted in the treaty. To the great powers, no one gives the right of intervention; they intervene whenever they feel like it with or without a treaty. When they (the Americans) landed in Santo Domingo, they had no military treaty with Santo Domingo, nor had any right of intervention in Santo Domingo, and they landed anyway. But there are people here who think that it is in the articles of a code (law code) that tell a country if it has the right to intervene or not, and they don't know that it is the bayonets, the guns, and the atomic bomb that gives a country the strength to intervene. And so a country like the United States can land in Panama whenever it feels like it after the year 2000 with or without a neutrality pact. But it cannot land, for example, in Russia, even if Russia tells it to land. Those are the facts of the matter so that with the neutrality pact, we are not giving the United States the right of intervention. What we are giving is an assurance that the Canal will be permanently neutral, that we are not going to close the Canal so that their ships or this ship or that ship cannot go through. Why this neutrality pact? Because they are thinking, By the year 2000 this country (Panama) may have gone socialist and become our (U.S.) enemy and we now want to make sure that even if they become socialist, they cannot close our passage.”

On August 22, 1977, Dr. Bethancourt held a news conference wherein he said: “The Neutrality Pact does not provide what the United States will say when neutrality is violated * * * That is not provided here. There is an article which reads that Panama and the United States will maintain the neutrality pact with the purpose that the Canal remain open peacefully for all ships of all flags of the world. That is all it says. It does not say that it falls to the United States to decide when neutrality is violated or not.” [Quoted by Senator Howard Baker in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Hearings on the Panama Canal Treaty, September 26, 1977]

Let us turn now to the Carter-Torrijos statement issued October 15, 1977 after their meeting at the White House. The first two paragraphs are critical:

“Under the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal (The Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective Constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

“This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at assuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.”

Supporters of the Treaty will point to the first paragraph of the Carter-Torrijos statement and argue that the U.S. does have “the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal * * *”

Whatever rights, if any, that are granted to the United States in the first paragraph of the Carter-Torrijos statement are negated and destroyed by the second paragraph, which states: “This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action * * * shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or independence of Panama.”

After December 31, 1999, the United States must get out of Panama lock, stock, and barrel. There are no base rights, no military rights and no presence except the regular Embassy and consular representation. The only right is Article IV of the Neutrality treaty which, in reality, is no right at all. For the United States to protect the Canal after the year 2000, it must intervene in an internal affair of Panama. Nothing in that country after 1999 will be more “internal” than the Panama Canal. Secondly, there is no way the U.S. can move into Panama to protect the Canal without violating Panama's territorial integrity especially if Panama does not agree to the intervention.

The Carter-Torrijos statement runs true to form—Now you see it now you don't. Yes, the United States has the right of intervention to protect the Canal. No, the United States does not have the right to intervene.

General Torrijos could no more agree to the right of intervention that Mr. Carter could agree to give it up. Consequently, when General Torrijos arrived back in Panama after his White House meeting, he held a short press conference reported in the Washington Post on October 16:

"Omar Torrijos, fresh from a meeting with President Carter on the Panama Canal treaties; has denied reports here that he signed a pact giving the United States the right to military intervention in the canal.

"I haven't even signed an autograph," Torrijos said yesterday when his flight from Washington landed at the Rio Hato air force base, near his beach house. He said he was too tired to make further comments."

It should be pointed out that the Carter-Torrijos statement was not signed by either principal. It has no binding effect upon the two parties under international or constitutional law since it is not part of the treaty.

The most obvious circumstance requiring U.S. intervention would be closure of the Canal by Panama for economic reasons. It should be remembered that the Canal has lost money since 1975; that Panama is a poor nation which could not sustain a Canal deficit for any length of time; that the administrative skills of the Panamanians remain unproven; and that Panama refused during the negotiations to commit itself to keep the Canal open should it become unprofitable. Dr. Bethancourt explained the position of his government very explicitly in his August 19, 1977, address to the Panama General Assembly:

"The third possibility was that the Canal could become unprofitable for Panama; in such a situation, Panama could not be tied down to keeping open a canal which was not earning revenue. They (United States negotiators) accepted the first two reasons—natural causes and temporary disruptions—but they did not accept the third reason, lack of profits. This, too kept the negotiations stalled for a long time.

They argued that if the Canal was not profitable, Panama could obtain money from the United States or other countries that use the Canal to keep it open. We told them that when the new treaty with the United States ended, we did not want Panama to be under either direct or indirect obligation to turn to the United States or any other country to request money to keep the Canal open. Our respective positions remained unchanged until we reached the agreement I am about to describe. They said, we can't present to our Congress an article that states you will close the Canal because of insufficient revenues. And we said we could not present an article committing us to operating the Canal permanently when we have no way of knowing if the Canal someday will yield no profit. We finally agreed to eliminate that article, and so Panama was freed of the obligation to maintain the Canal open permanently."

Thus, two things are clear. The most logical circumstance requiring U.S. intervention to protect the Canal would be closure of the Canal by Panama for economic reasons. This prospect is more probable than most treaty advocates care to admit. The second factor is that if and when this occurs, the United States does not have the clear right to step in and operate the Canal.

Article VII

Analysis: "The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall jointly sponsor a resolution in the Organization of American States opening to accession by all States of the world the Protocol to this Treaty whereby all the signatories will adhere to the objectives of this Treaty, agreeing to respect the regime of neutrality set forth herein."

This article will allow all nations of the world to become a party to the Treaty through the protocol. The protocol itself consists of the three articles which do the following:

1. Article I, "The contracting Parties hereby acknowledge the regime of permanent neutrality for the Canal established in the Treaty * * *" and " * * * associate themselves with its objective."

2. Article II, "The Contracting Parties agree to observe and respect the regime of permanent neutrality of the Canal in time of war and peace * * *"

3. Article III, states that "This Protocol shall be open to accession by all states of the world * * *"

Pro: This article will strengthen the neutrality of the Canal. It is hoped that most nations of the World, especially the maritime nations and the great powers, will accede to the treaty, thus binding them to respect the neutrality of the Canal in time of war and peace. Should the Soviet Union accede to the treaty, it will prevent that nation from meddling or interfering in the internal affairs of Panama or the administration of the Canal, especially after 1999.

Con: Should the Soviet Union or other Communist Bloc nations accede to the Treaty, they become a party to it and will then be in a legal position to challenge as signatories the actions of any other signatory, especially the United States. If the United States ever finds it necessary to intervene to protect and defend the Canal, the Protocol of accession will open it up to challenges by other signatories before the United Nations, international courts, and the world press, where America has not fared well in recent years.

DOES THE UNITED STATES POSSESS FULL SOVEREIGNTY OVER THE PANAMA CANAL AND THE CANAL ZONE?

Article III of the 1903 Convention between the United States and Panama addressed the sovereignty issue as follows:

Article III

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

The above article has been the subject of intense debate over the past several years and is the major source of divided opinion concerning which nation is sovereign over the Panama Canal.

Those who say the U.S. is not the full sovereign point to the phrase in Article III "if it were the sovereign of the territory" arguing that the words "if it were" qualify the grant to the United States. The words "if it were" can only mean that in fact the U.S. is not the sovereign. Those who argue that the U.S. is the full sovereign point to the words "to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority". This phrase they argue denies sovereignty to Panama and when taken in the context of the entire article (III) proves that the U.S. is the sovereign in the Canal Zone.

Chief Justice Taft noted these diverging opinions in his opinion in Luckenbach S.S. v. United States, decided in 1930:

"Whether the grant in the Treaty amounts to a complete cession of the territory and dominion to the United States or is so limited that it leaves at least titular sovereignty in the Republic of Panama, is a question which has been the subject of diverging opinions. * * * [280 U.S. 173, 177 (1930).]

No: "Sovereignty is perhaps the major issue raised by opponents of a new treaty. It is clear that under law we do not have sovereignty in Panama. The Treaty of 1903 did not confer sovereignty, but speaks of rights the United States would exercise as 'if it were the sovereign.' From as early as 1905, United States officials have acknowledged repeatedly that Panama retains at least titular sovereignty over the Zone." [Ellsworth Bunker, U.S. Ambassador-at-Large, Address before World Affairs Council, Los Angeles, December 2, 1975. Quoted in Congressional Digest, April 7, 1976, p. 119.]

Yes: "The executive and judicial branches of the Government of the United States have always exercised, and are now exercising, the powers and rights of sovereignty within the Canal Zone. * * *

"There can be no question that the Canal Zone was acquired and is held by the United States under a perpetual grant which, for all practical purposes, conferred upon and vested in the United States all the rights, powers, and authority of a sovereign, and that the United States has exercised full sovereign rights over the Canal Zone ever since the strip of land was acquired." [Arguments for the United States by Assistant Attorney General Sisson and Solicitor General Hughes in Luckenbach S.S. Co. v. U.S. 280 U.S. 173, 174-175 (1930).]

No: " * * * the one question of the flag has never been specifically placed before me, no decision has ever been made about it; but I do in some form or other believe we should have visual evidence that Panama does have titular sovereignty over the region." [The President's News Conference, December 2, 1959, Public Papers of the President, Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1959, p. 794.]

Yes: "To such an extent, indeed, are we sovereign in the Canal Zone that Panama has been granted special commercial rights only by express and formal concession, and this Court has reviewed the history of the acquisition and concluded that the title of the United States is complete and perfect [Justice Jackson dissenting, Vermilya-Brown and Co. Inc. et al. v. Connell et al., 335 U.S. 377, 402 (1948).]

No: "It does not depend upon sovereignty in the political or any sense over the territory. So the administrator of the Wage-Hour Division has issued a statement of general policy or interpretation that directs all officers and agencies of his division to apply this Act to the Canal Zone, admittedly territory over which we do not have sovereignty." [Mr. Justice Reed in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Vermilya-Brown and Co. Inc. et al. v. Connell et al., 335 U.S. 377, 381 (1948).]

Yes: "The Government would never recede from the position which it had taken in the note of Secretary Hay in 1904. This Government could not and would not enter into any discussion affecting its full right to deal with the Canal Zone under Article III of the Treaty of 1903 as if it were the sovereign of the Canal Zone and to the exclusion of any sovereign rights or authority on the part of Panama. * * * This must be regarded as ending the discussion of that matter" [Memorandum of Conversation, Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes, Foreign Relations, 1923, Vol. II, p. 684.]

IS THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE, INCLUDING THE CANAL, A POSSESSION OR TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES?

Yes: "We should end those negotiations and tell the General: We bought it, we paid for it, we built it and we intend to keep it." [Governor Ronald Reagan, Wall Street Journal, April 29, 1976.]

No: "But let us look at the truth about ownership and sovereignty. The United States does not own the Panama Canal Zone. Contrary to the belief of many Americans, the United States did not purchase the Canal Zone for $10 million in 1903. Rather, the money we gave Panama then was in return for the rights which Panama granted us by Treaty. We bought Louisiana; we bought Alaska. In Panama we bought not territory, but rights." [Ellsworth Bunker, U.S. Ambassador-at-Large, Address before World Affairs Council, Los Angeles, California, December 2, 1975. Quoted in Congressional Digest, April 7, 1976, p. 119.]

No: "It is proper to remark that the Zone has not been sold, transferred, or alienated by the Republic of Panama to the United States in full ownership. That which was ceded is the use, occupation, and control of the Zone for the specific needs of the construction, conservation, operation sanitation, and protection of the Canal. If the Canal were abandoned by the United States, the United States would have no legal ground for occupying the Zone, title to which it has not acquired either by purchase, transfer, or conquest. Further, the Canal Zone has not been even leased to the United States because the annual payment of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars which it undertook to make under the Canal Treaty was not stipulated as a fee for the use of the Zone." [Letter from Panamanian Minister Alfara to Secretary of State Hughes, January 3, 1923 cited in Whiteman, Marjorie, Digest of International Law, Volume 3, 1964, Department of State, p. 1143.]

Yes: "Ever since it was acquired, the Canal Zone has been considered and treated by the legislative branch of the Government as a possession of the United States and not as a foreign country." [Argument for the United States by Assistant Attorney General Sisson and Solicitor General Hughes in Luckenbach S.S. v. United States, 280 US 173, 175 (1930).]

No: " * * * on September 8, 1909, 27 Op. Atty. Gen. 594, the Attorney General, in an opinion given to the Secretary of War, held that the Canal Zone was not a possession of the United States within the meaning of the Tariff Act of August 5, 1909 * * * " [Opinion of the Court delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Taft in Luckenbach S.S. Co. v. United States, 280 U.S. 173, 178 (1930).]

Yes: "It is hypocritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described [the Panama Canal Zone] does not belong to this Nation, because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate." [Mr. Justice Brewer delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24, 33 (1907).]

No: "I would never give up complete control or practical control of the Panama Canal Zone, but I would continue to negotiate with the Panamanians * * * " [Governor Jimmy Carter in Presidential Debate on Foreign Policy, October 6, 1976, in San Francisco, California.]

Yes: "Acknowledging the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory * * * " [Preamble of the Panama Canal Treaty signed September 7, 1977 by President Jimmy Carter and General Omar Torrijos in Washington, D.C.]

Unclear: "A cursory examination of legal sources indicates that the words 'Canal Zone' have received various interpretations for United States legislative purposes. For purposes of extradition, it is considered an organized territory (37 Stat. 569, 48

U.S.C. 1330); for purposes of customs duties, it is treated as foreign territory (33 Stat. 843, 19 U.S.C.); as to transportation of mail, its ports are considered foreign ports (Luckenbach Co. v. U.S., 280 U.S. 173); as to the authority of the Government to engage in (Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24) * * * [Assistant Legal Adviser Snow to John R. Kelly, letter, June 19, 1950, MS. Department of State, file 611.1913/6-1550. Cited in Whiteman, Marjorie, Digest of International Law, Volume 3, 1964, Department of State, p. 1171.]

IS THE PANAMA CANAL CRITICAL TO U.S. NATIONAL SECURITY?

Yes. Every ship in the U.S. Navy except the 13 aircraft carriers can transit the Canal. This includes American nuclear submarines. Also, the trend in naval shipbuilding is toward smaller ships, most of which will be able to transit the Canal by the turn of the century. The United States in reality does not have a two ocean navy. With only 476 ships in the active fleet, America at best has only a one and a half ocean navy. The ability to move units of the fleet between the Atlantic and the Pacific will be critical to the United States for decades to come.

In a June 6, 1977 letter addressed to Mr. Carter, former U.S. Navy Admirals Arleigh Burke, Robert B. Carney, George Anderson and Thomas H. Moorer, explained the strategic importance of the Panama Canal:

"Our experience has been that as each crisis developed during our active service—World War II, Korea, Vietnam and the Cuban missile crisis—the value of the Canal was forcefully emphasized by emergency transits of our naval units and massive logistic support for the Armed Forces. The Canal provided operational flexibility and rapid mobility. In addition, there are the psychological advantages of this power potential. As Commander-in-Chief, you will find the ownership and sovereign control of the Canal indispensable during periods of tension and conflict."

During America's involvement in Southeast Asia, 1/3 of all U.S. sea-going cargo destined for that part of the world passed through the Canal. Japan continues to rely upon the United States for its primary defense and for this reason alone we must remain a Pacific Power.

The importance of Latin American natural resources to the United States economy is increasing with the Western Hemisphere becoming more economically inter-related each year. Much of this trade transits the Panama Canal in at least one direction.

The United States has critical strategic, defense and energy interests in the Caribbean area. We are a major buyer of Venezuela oil. Soviet influence in Cuba and Peru is not diminishing. Panama itself may well be a target of Soviet influence and probing. The Panama Canal Zone is the headquarters of the U.S. Southern Command. It provides the best available facilities anywhere in the world for jungle warfare training. It gives the U.S. a presence in a part of the world which has always been important to the United States and this importance is growing.

Finally, the United States must stop its long series of foreign policy defeats and setbacks. From the Bay of Pigs to Angola the U.S. has retreated around the world and to give up the Panama Canal which is critical to U.S. economic and national security interests would cause serious political ramifications for the U.S. and its key allies. It could further convince America's adversaries that we have lost our will and are no longer willing to stand up for our vital national interests.

No: The Canal has lost its strategic and military importance to the United States. Aircraft carriers are the heart of the U.S. fleet. Most other Navy ships serve as part of the Carrier Task forces. The carriers cannot transit the Panama Canal. Thus the ability of the smaller ships attached to a carrier task force to do so is quite meaningless. For U.S. Navy attack or missile launching submarines to pass through the Canal requires surfacing, which in time of war would be a decided threat to any sub doing so. American military presence in Panama is a lasting and irritating vestige of colonialism. It is not needed to protect U.S. interests because the presence does more damage than it does good. It is a bone of contention to most of Latin America.

The real interest of the United States is to maintain open and unhindered passage through the Panama Canal for the naval and commercial vessels of all nations. With the Canal such an emotional issue in Panama, the best way to achieve this free passage is through a new arrangement between the U.S. and Panama.

While the United States can presumably protect the Canal from most foreign attacks (a sea or air launched missile attack against the Canal would undoubtedly be impossible to stop in its entirety and would close the Canal for a long period of time), the real military threat to the continued operation of the Canal comes from sabotage and guerrilla type operations within Panama. The best assurance against such attacks would be a new arrangement with Panama giving that nation a dominating interest in keeping the Canal open and free from internal attack.

With jungle terrain more difficult to fight in than Viet Nam, the U.S. would have to send 100,000 troops into Panama to put down a domestic or guerrilla attack on the Canal. Such military action would undoubtedly last for many months, causing serious domestic disruptions among the American people.

IS THE PANAMA CANAL IMPORTANT TO THE ECONOMY OF THE UNITED STATES?

Yes: The Canal shortens the sea route from New York to San Francisco by 8,000 miles and 30 days and from New York to Yokohama, Japan, by 3,000 miles. Japan, America's second largest trading partner after Canada sends approximately one-third of its sea borne commerce through the Canal. According to the White House fact sheet on the Treaties, 7% of all foreign trade going in and out of U.S. seaports passed through the Panama Canal in 1976. The Library of Congress estimates this to be 12%. In FY 1976 12,280 ocean going vessels transited the Canal. Also, 96% of the U.S. merchant fleet can go through the Canal.

The energy needs of the United States are becoming increasingly linked to the Panama Canal. Although super tankers cannot use it, the United States is soon expected to be sending 200,000 barrels or 29,000 long tons of Alaskan crude oil through the Canal daily. This figure is expected to reach 70,000 long tons by 1980. For the period FY 1973 to FY 1976 42,494,000 long tons of petroleum shipments passed through the Canal going to or from U.S. ports according to testimony of Howard Casey, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Maritime Affairs, before the House Subcommittee on the Panama Canal on July 25-27, 1977.

No: The Panama Canal is losing its economic importance to the United States. The overall percentage of U.S. import and export sea-going tonnage is declining, and the 7% of U.S. tonnage going through the Canal is minimal. In FY 1975 total transits of the Canal numbered 14,735. In FY 1976 this figure had fallen to 12,280. Ships exceeding 950 feet in length, 106 feet in width and having a draft of more than 40 feet cannot use the Canal. This eliminates super tankers and giant ore ships which are moving an increasing percentage of U.S. produced goods or purchased raw materials on the high seas. Alternative means of shipping goods between the East and West Coasts of the United States, like the combined sea-railway system, have become more competitive with the cost of shipping through Panama. Since 1975, the Canal has lost money. The lock system is over 50 years old, and maintenance costs will continue to go up. If the United States retains control of the Canal, it faces the prospect of much higher maintenance costs and declining revenues. This difference can only be made up by higher tolls, which will make the Canal less competitive as a means of transportation, or by congressional appropriations. The Canal is becoming an economic liability for the United States. Under these conditions, it makes sense to transfer it to the Government of Panama, which wants it very badly.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a statement by the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater), and the material attached thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GOLDWATER

It was my distinct pleasure on Friday of last week to have been able to discuss the Panama Treaty with Ambassador Sol Linowitz with former Secretary of State Dean Rusk as the moderator, before the State Bar of Georgia in Atlanta. It was a very revealing discussion, particularly because once again in a large American city I gathered the distinct impression that the American people are not going to buy the present Panama treaties. I disagree wholeheartedly with the majority leader of the Senate, Senator Robert Byrd, when he feels or says that a treaty can be ratified next year. I think a treaty could be acted on, but it is going to take some changes and the changes are incorporated in the joint statement of understanding agreed to by both President Carter and Dictator Omar Torrijos indicating that the United States would have the ability to interfere at any time in Panama should the future and safety of the canal be threatened. The word "intervention" does not appear anywhere in either treaty and it was deleted in capitulation to Panama's demands.

The statement was made by the Ambassador, and I believe it is true, that if we change the wording of the present treaty in any way it would require a plebiscite to be held in Panama, and because of the seeming powerful objection to the word "intervention," it would never pass. Now I hold that this is not important to the United States. If the canal is to remain a viable means of access between the two oceans and if it is to remain—as the treaty implies but does not clearly spell out—our responsibility, along with that of other hemispheric countries, to provide protection, then we must have the right of intervention. I am going to propose language to be added to the present treaty indicating that it is the consensus of the Senate that these words are part of the treaty whether in it or not, but I believe that even that would require a vote by the people of Panama. But, again, that is not important. The main thrust of my remarks I would like to have made a matter of record.

The national security aspects of the Panama Canal issue, not in relation to the defense of the Canal as such, but as regards the continuation of a U.S. military presence in Panama, is the very essence of the national security interest that requires the modification of the proposed new treaties.

One can quibble endlessly over the defensibility of the Canal as a waterway—just as one can quibble endlessly, in this day and age, over the defensibility of almost any defense facility, anywhere. But U.S. operational control of the Canal and the attendant U.S. military presence in Panama to assure the continuation of that control have become the foundation of the security of both the United States and the Western Hemisphere against a Communist takeover of Latin America.

This is true from a military as well as a political and psychological standpoint.

Panama, because of its geographical location at the crossroads of Atlantic-Pacific transportation, because of its dominant position in relation to the Caribbean, and because of the existence of the Canal, is at once, both symbolically and practically, the key to hemispheric defense. It is also the Achilles heel of that defense. If we were, as proposed in the new treaties, to create a power vacuum by giving up our right to maintain a military presence in Panama after 1999, it seems inevitable that the Soviets, not directly but through the Cuban surrogacy, would move in quickly to fill it.

The continuation of the U.S. military presence in Panama is, therefore, the all-important factor. As long as we have an adequate force in Panama to "hold the fort" until reinforcements, if needed, can be sent in, there seems to be little likelihood that "defense" of the Canal will ever become necessary. It is almost inconceivable that, in the face of that military presence, any nation, unless it were bent on precipitating World War III, would launch a significant effort to wrest control of the Canal from the United States.

Defense from within is a far different thing from defense from without. It is the latter that the new treaties would require the United States, and the Western Hemisphere, to rely on.

From a military standpoint, in the absence of a preliminary holding capability, any attacking or infiltrating forces would become speedily entrenched in all strategic locations and the task of dislodging them from without would be a major, costly and highly destructive one, as compared with that of repelling such forces at the outset.

And from a political standpoint there is also a vast difference between, on the one hand, augmenting military forces already legitimately positioned within a country, and, on the other, introducing forces into a country where there are none, no matter how firm the legal right to do so may be. The latter would be the case after 1999 under the proposed new treaties. Even if it were quite clear that the United States had the right to send force into Panama to "defend" the Canal—and the proposed new treaties are wholly unclear on this point—the cries of "imperialist aggression" and "imperialist intervention" would be so orchestrated internationally as to effectively deter any such action on the part of the United States, woefully sensitive as we Americans seem to be to "world opinion," even when rightful defense of lives and property are involved.

Not much less important than the military considerations regarding a continuing U.S. military presence in Panama are the psychological ones.

Southcom has become to most Latin American military leaders, and therefore to most Latin American governments, the energizing center of their Latin American defense system. They feel possessive about it, proud of it. This has come about by virtue of Southcom's military assistance and representative functions throughout Latin America, all headquartered in Latin America. The very fact that the United States deems Latin America of such strategic importance as to maintain the hub of its operations in defense of the area in Panama is a matter of considerable significance to Latin American leaders. That significance is appreciably enhanced by the additional fact that the commander of Southcom has consistently been a U.S. general officer of a rank substantially higher than the size of the forces under his command would ordinarily call for.

If the functions and responsibilities of Southcom were to be transferred to a command headquartered within the continental United States, as the proposed new treaties would, in effect, require, U.S. military rapport with Latin America, and hence U.S. diplomatic rapport with Latin American governments, would diminish greatly. A tendency would inevitably be generated for the Latin American nations to look elsewhere for military assistance and cooperation. The basic nexus of current U.S.-Latin American relations would be destroyed. The recognition of this fact is, of course, anathema to those who view foreign relations only in terms of universal sweetness and light. Nevertheless, it is a reality—and a transcendent one.

One of the major contributing factors to the development of this situation—the close military bonds between the U.S. and the Latin American nations—has been the various military schools operated by Southcom in Panama for the benefit of all Latin American military establishments. Many of these schools are staffed to a substantial degree by their own Latin American honor graduates. The “alumni” body of these institutions, spread throughout Latin America, now numbers close to 50,000.

To cite just one example of the effectiveness of these military education facilities, the counter-insurgency curriculum conducted over the years in one of the schools, the prestigious School of the Americas, has played a leading role in thwarting the Latin American Communist insurgency program instituted by Fidel Castro as far back as the sixties.

To give all this up—to place ourselves in a position of being unable to resist a takeover of the Panama Canal by the Soviets, to place Panama in the position of a sitting duck, and to destroy our close military, and hence governmental, ties with Latin America—to me would be the height of national folly. The proposed new treaties are a blueprint for just such a course of action.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I brought up these questions during the course of the discussion. Where does the trilateral commission fit into this treaty? How much money is owed by Panama to the large banking institutions whose officers in most cases are members of this commission? How much money is owed by Third World countries to these same banks? In other words, the question I put and tried to put in a way that would not step on the toes of friends of mine in the banking business, was: Is it going to become the job of the Congress of the United States to bail out the banking business of this country when they have made poor loans to foreign countries? This question has not been answered, but I have asked the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee to conduct an investigation into it, and I hope he will.

IN SUPPORT OF THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on November 11 Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher delivered an excellent speech in support of the Panama Canal treaties, before the Florida Council of 100 in Palm Beach. In his speech, Mr. Christopher reviews the important history of these treaties, and details the reasons why they are in our strong national interest. Those Members who remain skeptical about the treaties should carefully consider the strong security, economic, and political arguments so ably presented by Mr. Christopher. It is my hope that the future Panama Canal debate in this country will proceed along these rational lines, rather than descending to the emotional jingoism which has characterized some of the early attacks on the treaties.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that Mr. Christopher's speech be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

SPEECH BY THE HONORABLE WARREN CHRISTOPHER

I am delighted to be here today to meet with such a distinguished group of business leaders.

I would like to talk with you this morning about an issue that is being debated, not only in the halls of Congress, but across America—the Panama Canal Treaties.

The new treaties have aroused strong emotional feelings among many Americans. Since it was built, the canal has been more so to us than simply another waterway for our ships. It was built at a time when America was just emerging on the world scene. We were able to conquer this monumental engineering problem where others had failed. Even today, it is impressive to see how ingenious the canal system really is. Indeed, the canal came to symbolize the resourcefulness and ingenuity of the American people—qualities that we all believe to be among our greatest assets as a nation.

This sentiment, this symbolism, is the first reaction of many Americans when they think about the prospect of these new treaties. In fact, as you probably recall, President Carter has said that his first reaction was to be against the idea of a new treaty.

At the same time, we all recognize that the Panama Canal is important to our national defense and commerce. It is not a monument that sits there simply to be visited and to remind us of the past. It is an important navigational link. As such, our first concern must be to assure that it will always remain open, secure, and efficiently operated.

It is that concern which led President Johnson—after consulting with former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower—to open negotiations for a new treaty in 1964. It is that concern which has convinced every succeeding President of the necessity of a new treaty. And, it was that concern for the future which convinced President Carter that his initial reaction against changing the current arrangement had to be weighed against our national interest in assuring that the canal remains open and secure to both our commercial and naval vessels.

As the Senate vote approaches and the debate over the treaties accelerates, I think most Americans are going to ask themselves several basic questions:

Which course is best from a military standpoint?

From an economic standpoint?

Are these treaties "right," both in terms of what we, as a nation, stand for and, in terms of our self-interest?

I would like to spend a few moments this morning addressing those questions. I want to tell you what these treaties do and I want to answer some of the questions that come to mind as we consider the treaties.

The treaties that were signed by President Carter in September are the product of fourteen years of negotiations. They would replace a treaty that was arranged seventy-four years ago. The first of the two new treaties provides for the operation and defense of the canal through December 31, 1999. The second treaty provides for the permanent neutrality of the canal and has no termination date.

Under the terms of the first treaty, the United States will continue to operate the canal until the year 2000. That operation will be conducted through a U.S. Government agency, to be known as the Panama Canal Commission. The Commission will operate in accordance with U.S. law, which will govern such matters as the setting of tolls and the regulation of employment policies. Five members of the Commission's nine-member board will be Americans. During this period, American troops will remain in Panama and the United States will have primary responsibility for defending the canal.

Starting with the year 2000, operation of the canal will be the responsibility of the Panamanians. At present, nearly seventy-five percent of the canal work-force is Panamanians and, by the year 2000, Panamanians will have moved into all levels of management and will be in charge of running the canal. But, after the year 2000, the second treaty—the neutrality treaty—will remain in effect.

The neutrality treaty commits both the United States and Panama to protect the openness, security, and neutrality of the canal for the indefinite future. Under that treaty, as it has been interpreted, both by the United States and Panama, each country will have the right to act against any threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of ships through the canal. The treaty does not give us the right to intervene or meddle in the internal affairs of Panama. That is not a right we sought. It does, however, give us the right to take action directed at ensuring that the canal remains open, secure, and accessible.

Moreover, the neutrality treaty assures us that United States warships will be able to go through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, and in case of need or emergency that they will be able to go to the head of the line—ahead of other ships waiting to transit the canal.

It should be noted that both the United States and Panama are agreed on the interpretation of these rights. This was recently confirmed by the statement of understanding that was issued in Washington on October 14 following a meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos.

The treaties also contain additional significant provisions. For example, the basic treaty contains a provision relating to the construction of a sea-level canal. Under this provision, both the United States and Panama agree to study the feasibility of building a new canal in Panama which could accommodate some of the new and larger tankers. Based on our studies, which show that Panama is the most feasible place to build such a canal, we agreed, until the end of this century, not to construct such a canal, outside of Panama. In exchange, Panama agreed that, during this same period, it would not allow any other nation to build an inter-oceanic canal in Panama without our approval. Finally, the treaties also provide privileges and protections for the Americans who will be working in Panama in connection with the canal during this 23-year transition period.

This is the basic arrangement. But what about the questions that have been raised? Are there good answers to the many questions which have been raised regarding the treaties? I think there are.

Can we defend the canal under these treaties? Do they protect our military interest? In my judgment, the first place to look for an answer to that question is to our Joint Chiefs of Staff. These are the men who have the initial responsibility for our defense. The fact is that the Joint Chiefs are active proponents of these treaties. They worked closely with our negotiators on a regular basis and the treaties reflect their judgment on what we need to defend the canal.

According to the Joint Chiefs, these treaties are not only as good as the existing arrangement in terms of our national security interests, they are far better. They afford us all the rights we need to step in against any military threat to the canal. In the judgment of the Joint Chiefs, they also decrease the problems that would be presented if we continued to operate the canal under the existing arrangement in the face of growing opposition from the Panamanian people.

We must understand that, just as the canal is a symbol for us, it is a symbol to the Panamanian people as well—indeed, one that is far stronger to them than it is to us. For them, it is a constant reminder that their nation is divided. Early this year, when the new treaties were just coming under discussion, my high school son asked, how would we feel if another country had a canal through Florida? That is a simple metaphor, but it helps me understand the hostility that the Panamanian feel.

These treaties—in a way that is fully consistent with our own interests—will eliminate the major causes of that hostility. For the Panamanian people, they mean that their country will no longer be divided in two by an American enclave. They mean that a Panamanian visiting a relative on the other side of his country will not have to pass through American jurisdiction. They mean that the people of Panama will begin to receive a fair share of the revenue from the canal, which is, after all, a major national resource. In short, they give the Panamanian people a legitimate stake in the canal which makes them our partners rather than adversaries in the canal enterprise. And in so doing, they make us real partners in assuring that the canal remains open to all ships and is defended against all threats.

Unlike the existing arrangement, the new treaties have the support of the Panamanian people. In their recent national referendum, two-thirds of the Panamanian voters approved the new treaties. The national debate which preceded the referendum was lively, free and fair. Much of the opposition to the treaty in Panama was, in many ways, a mirror image of the opposition here—many Panamanians thought that their government had conceded too much to the Americans. But the overwhelming majority of Panamanians accepted the new treaty terms, assuring us that under the new treaties the canal will be operated with the energetic support of the people of Panama.

From a military standpoint, then, these treaties protect our right to defend the canal, if necessary, and they make it less likely that an American life will ever be lost defending it.

What about our commercial interests? What effect will the treaties have on American trade and American business? The first concern of those who use the canal in their trade is to assure that it remains open and efficiently operated, that tolls remain reasonable, and that ships passing through the canal are secure. In addition, companies that use the canal also want certainty about the future; they want a stable situation for the canal so that they can plan effectively. The new treaties address these concerns and promote our interests.

As I have noted, we will continue to be responsible for operating the canal through the end of this century. During this period, we will be training Panamanians in the management of the canal so that they will be able to operate it effectively after the year 2000. Both before and after the year 2000, we will be able to defend the canal if it is threatened.

The practical facts of life are just as important as the legal rights we have under these treaties. By resolving the cause of bitterness and resentment, and enhancing the stake of the Panamanian people in the canal enterprise, we are taking the most effective action possible to assure the smooth operation of the canal in the future.

In this regard, it is important to recognize that Panama derives 12 percent of its gross domestic product and 18 percent of its foreign exchange earnings from canal-related activities. Moreover, unlike the present arrangement, what Panama will earn from the canal enterprise under the new treaties will be directly related to the level of traffic that moves through the canal. If traffic were suddenly shut off by the closing of the canal, or diverted because of inefficient operation, the biggest loser would be Panama.

As a result of our insistence that payments to Panama for its contribution to the canal enterprise be drawn entirely from canal revenues, there will be toll increases in the future. Although our current study of the subject is not yet completed, it appears that such an increase will be on the order of 30 percent.

Is such an increase justified and what will it mean for American consumers and exporters? Over the last 40 years, tolls have only increased from 90¢ per canal ton to $1.29 today. Can you think of any other product or service which has increased so little in 40 years?

Panama's toll levels are far below those for the Suez Canal. An increase of 30 percent would mean that for a Japanese car enroute to an Atlantic or Gulf port, for example, the increased transportation cost will be $3.00, less than one-tenth of one percent of the total purchase price.

If I may, I would like to add one other word about the commercial aspect of the canal and these treaties. We consider our commercial interest in the canal to be important. The port of Tampa, for example, shipped over two million tons of phosphates to Asian markets through the canal in 1976. And, Florida's citrus exports through the canal to Asia were worth approximately $20 million in 1976.

Thus, while the canal is less important to our overall commerce than it once was—only 7 percent of all our waterborne foreign trade passed through the canal in fiscal year 1976—it remains important to the economy of this state and the nation. That is one important reason why ratification of these treaties is essential. They substantially increase the likelihood of a stable, long-term partnership with Panama, which will ensure an open and efficient canal in the future.

What about the cost of these treaties to the American taxpayer? Are we paying Panama to take it away, as some have claimed? The answer is no.

We insisted during the negotiations that payments to Panama for its contribution to the canal enterprise be drawn entirely from the canal's earnings. Panama initially sought much larger payments which far exceeded what could be financed from the canal's earnings. Our view prevailed. Under the treaties, Panama will receive payments that more nearly reflect the fact that it is making available its major national resource—its territory. But the treaties will not require any appropriations from the American taxpayer.

In addition, we have agreed, outside the treaty, to seek certain arrangements which will assist the general economic development of Panama and enhance its stability. These are loans, guarantees and credits. And, they will be used largely to help Panama finance U.S. trade and U.S. investment.

Finally, what about our image as a world leader? Are these treaties a sign of retreat? Will they create a power vacuum in the Caribbean that can be exploited by Cuba or the Soviet Union? The fact is that these treaties will have just the opposite effect. They will increase our influence in this hemisphere. It is the status quo which can be exploited by others. The treaties lessen this danger by removing a major source of anti-American feeling throughout Latin America.

It is the widely shared conviction of the Latin American nations that the original treaty needs to be changed. Some of our closest friends in this hemisphere—including Venezuela, Costa Rica, Mexico, and Colombia—issued a joint communique in August urging the United States and Panama to conclude the new treaties.

Indeed, through all the years of these negotiations, the people of Latin America have looked forward to the peaceful resolution of this troublesome issue.

The treaties do not settle the other important issues on the agenda of the United States and the nations of Latin America—issues involving trade and development, regional peace and human rights. Nevertheless, they will enable us to approach these issues with a fresh spirit of cooperation, unencumbered by the suspicion and resentment that accompany the existing canal arrangement.

To all nations in the world, the treaties demonstrate that we will use our power in a manner that not only takes full account of our own security interests, but also our firm belief in reducing global tensions and in dealing with other nations on the basis of mutual respect.

Thus, the very same resourcefulness and ingenuity that enabled us to build a canal where others had failed now leads us to build a new relationship with the people of Panama that reflects present-day realities and that provides for the future.

We are a nation that has always been able to change with changing times.

We have never rested on our laurels; we have always seized the opportunity to make things better.

And we are a nation that wants to use our great strength and power, not to prove that we are powerful, but to lessen the dangers of violence and conflict around the world.

These new treaties serve America's interests. I hope that, after you listen to the treaty arguments, and consider them carefully, you will conclude that they should be approved by the United States Senate.

PANAMA CANAL

MR. MCCLURE. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague from Kansas (Senate Dole) has played an important role in the consideration of the Panama Canal Treaties now before this body. In these past months he has issued perceptive analyses of provisions written in his usual articulate style, and proposed a number of modifications to the treaty language which would go far toward correcting these problems.

Recently, in response to an article in Forbes magazine dismissing the possibility of severe economic hardships in the event of a Panama Canal closure, Senator Dole wrote the publication, pointing out the flaws in its argument. It is evident to many of us in this body, and certainly to the American citizens whose livelihood would be directly affected by a canal closure, that the unavailability of the canal shipping route would severely impact on our economy, and have a disastrous effect on those segments of the market most dependent on it.

I salute my distinguished friend for eloquently articulating the situation in his letter to Forbes, which he has kindly agreed to have placed in the Record by me for the benefit of all our colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record the text of Senator Dole's letter to Forbes in response to its November 15 article, "The Canal Without Rhetoric."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., December 5, 1977.

FORBES MAGAZINE,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR EDITOR: In its November 15 article, "The Canal Without Rhetoric," Forbes seems to contradict itself. It asserts that "from a practical economic point of view" the U.S. "almost certainly" does not need the Panama Canal. Yet in its analysis of the impact of a canal closure, it describes several sectors of the nation for whom the consequences would be disastrous.

Admitting that certain "shifts in trade" would occur, the article comments that one-fifth of all U.S. farm exports travel through the Canal to the Far East. If the canal were closed, it adds, these grain producers "could pay the highest price" as a result of "increased competition for foreign producers."

Since the article concludes, however, that economically the Canal is "more symbol than substance," I assume that Forbes editors regard the economic chaos this would produce in our farm states as a point significant enough to mention but not important enough to worry about.

In an effort to protect the economic interests of the United States, I have proposed Amendments to the pending Canal Treaties. To protect commercial shippers from unreasonable increases in Canal tolls, I want to cut in half the proposed payments of $60 million a year to Panama from toll revenues. And to protect our short-cut route to Asian markets, I would eliminate the provision now in the Treaties that prevents the United States from constructing a new Canal in any other country if the one in Panama is ever closed. These modifications in the pending Treaties are vital to American agriculture and commerce.

The United States Department of Agriculture has provided statistics on the magnitude of our commercial use of the Canal in shipping of agricultural goods. One-fifth of all corn exports, one-fourth of soybean exports, almost half of our sorghum production and much of the hard red winter wheat from the Great Plains goes through the Canal on its way to foreign ports. Much of this grain goes to Japan, which is now the single largest country market for U.S. farm products. The total trade is worth about $8 billion, and its disruption could plainly cause financial ruin for thousands of farmers.

I sincerely believe that the best way out of the current cost-price squeeze in which so many American farmers are caught is through expanded exports. For that reason, an accessible and inexpensive Canal shipping lane is imperative to U.S. agricultural producers.

Other dislocations are cited in the article. Forbes admits that "the Canal . . . is the only avenue for shipping Alaskan North Slope oil to the U.S. East Coast" and that at present there is no contingency proposal for bringing the fuel to the East. The article also indicates that "without the Panama Canal the East Coast ports are sure to suffer." These words translate into hundreds or thousands of workers shifting from productive work onto public assistance, and into an increased strain on the already fragile urban economies of the East. While according to the article business in West Coast ports would increase, this is not likely to be of great comfort to the unemployed dock workers of New York or Baltimore, for whom moving would be a significant financial hardship.

Finally, the article suggests that we would be affected far less than a number of other nations, and lists Ecuador, Peru and Colombia as examples of countries who would feel a Canal closure intensely. This brings to mind that one of the reasons given in support of the Treaties is the improvement of relations with Latin America; according to this argument, ratification of the documents will help persuade Latin America to reciprocate our feeling of friendship.

The article suggests that "without the Canal, the U.S. East Coast market for Ecuadorian bananas and Colombian coffee would disappear. But there is plenty of coffee elsewhere." I suggest that this type of attitude on our part will hardly enhance U.S.-Latin American relations.

It is clear from this review that a Canal closure, or even a substantial increase in tolls, would involve far more than what Forbes surprisingly describes as "shifts in trade." Although some segments of the economy may benefit slightly from the situation and some will remain untouched by the change, for other sectors the closing of the Canal would signal wholesale unemployment and widespread bankruptcy. The Panama Canal may be an economic "symbol," as Forbes maintains, but the problems its closing would cause are substantive.

Sincerely yours,

BOB DOLE,
U.S. Senator.

THE AMERICAN LEGION SPEAKS ON THE PANAMA CANAL ISSUE

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, within a few months after the Senate reconvenes we will probably be called upon to pass upon the treaties negotiated between the executive departments of our government and the Government of Panama. In this connection, the National Commander of the American Legion, in the December issue of the American Legion magazine, has again expressed his opposition to ratification. As some Senators may not have read the national commander's statement, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record as follows:

WE HAVE AGAIN STUDIED THE TREATY; WE STILL SAY "No"

Why is The American Legion so vehement in its opposition to the Panama Canal Treaty? Does it want to alienate all of Latin America? Does it want to invite sabotage against the canal? Does it really believe the canal is still vital to U.S. security?

The questions have dogged me in my first months as your national commander. I believe I should use this forum to reply so every American Legion member understands our position before Senate debate.

First, our opposition is directed at the treaty, not at the people of Panama. The American Legion has consistently supported fair and equitable payments to Panama for the canal, generous social and material assistance for its people and constant modernization of the canal for the economic and military well-being of the entire Western Hemisphere.

Debaters avoid these economic and security factors.

Isn't it disturbing that although this treaty has been negotiated by four U.S. administrations, the text was not made public until the eve of the gala signing ceremony at the White House? We were treated to a spectacle in which virtually every hemisphere chief of state signed a protocol for a treaty they had not read!

Subsequently, it became apparent that Washington and Panama City did not even agree what the text meant. Worse, the controversy has centered on circumstances under which the United States could exercise its military might to protect the canal and the hemisphere. President Carter and President Torrijos finally met and announced that they agreed on the interpretation of the treaty's vague language—but they did not clarify the language in the treaty.

An "understanding" between two heads of state is fine, but it lacks the force of law. What happens when Mr. Carter and or Gen. Torrijos have left office? The American Legion does not believe such questions should rest on a reed called "understanding."

In 1975 alone, 14,000 ships transited the canal. Forty-five percent of these voyages originated in the United States. These ships were loaded with the agricultural and manufactured exports vital to our balance of trade and payments. Any increase in tolls by Panama could have devastating effect on the world market position of the American farmer, laborer, businessman. The Mississippi Valley, Plains States and the east coast are vulnerable.

Should the canal ever be closed to U.S. ships, the Commerce Department estimates a $932 million jump in the price of U.S. exports, a $583 million jump in the price of imports. The impact would be chaotic.

On military issues there have been honest differences of opinion between highly qualified men who have debated the importance of the canal, but none has denied that loss of the canal in a time of emergency could be disastrous. Yet the very provisions of the treaty that are supposed to guarantee our right of intervention are those that cause anguish among left-wing Panamanians.

It's true that our biggest aircraft carriers cannot transit the canal. But 95 percent of U.S. fighting ships can, including powerful nuclear forces. There's a lot more to the Navy than its giant flattops.

And what about Panama, this government headed by Gen. Torrijos?

His friendship for Castro is disquieting. His henchmen and propagandists have flayed the United States for years with phoney "colonialism" charges. Yet who has advertised the human rights survey of Panama by the respected Freedom House? That survey ranks Panama as the most dictatorial regime in the Hemisphere.

When Torrijos seized power in Panama in 1968, the country had a debt of $167 million. Today it owes over $1.5 billion and there has been precious little improvement in the lot of the average Panamanian. Under the treaty, the United States—in addition to huge annual payments to Panama—would encourage banks to loan Torrijos another $300 million.

Faced with all this, we are asked to endorse:

1. Surrender of control over a vital waterway built by American ingenuity and American money on land fairly purchased by the United States.

2. Surrender of all defense rights within 22 years, sooner should Panama exercise full sovereignty.

3. Surrender of U.S. sovereignty over the canal and the Canal Zone and the exposure of the human rights of U.S. citizens to Torrijos' law.

4. Granting veto power to Panama over any potential U.S. plan to build another Atlantic-Pacific canal anywhere in Central America.

5. Acceptance of nebulous language—backed by imprecise personal agreements—that U.S. warships would have priority use of the canal during any emergency.

The American Legion cannot endorse such a treaty. We pray that the Senate shares our fears.

SENATE NEEDS EARLY OAS REPORT OF HUMAN RIGHTS CONDITIONS IN PANAMA

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, at hearings on October 13 of Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the proposed new Panama Canal treaties, my colleague, Senator Case (pages 9-45 to 9-46) said:

I am disappointed in the reports so far from the Secretary of State in regard to the condition of human rights in Panama. It does not seem to me to meet the requirements of the statute or the Congressional intent with which it was passed. I intend to pursue that myself.

That date's hearing summary pointed out that Senator Case asked the Department of State to give the Foreign Relations Committee an updated report on human rights conditions in Panama.

On October 11, 1977, before the House International Relations Committee, the respected and prestigious civil rights attorney, David Carliner, expressed concern about that day's statement by William P. Stedman, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, who said:

It is gratifying that on September 13 the Panamanian government invited the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit Panama to investigate the various charges of human rights violations which have been made and to report its findings. Torrijos promised that if any political prisoners were found, they would be released.

Mr. Carliner commented:

Incidentally, although the Inter-American Human Rights Commission has completed its visit, its report is not likely to be published for a few months, and even then, only if Panama or the Council of the Organization of American States authorizes publication.

Mr. Carliner is a board member and associate treasurer of the International League for Human Rights. That organization includes such present and past honorary president and vice presidents as Roger N. Baldwin, Rene Casin, Gunner Myrdal, Fenner Brockway, Jan Papanek, and Andrei D. Sakharov. On November 28, the Lawyers Committee of the International League for Human Rights wrote to the Organization of American States as follows:

NOVEMBER 28, 1977.

Re Panama.

MR. CHARLES MOYER,
Inter-American Commission on Human Rights,
Organization of American States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MOYER: I am an attorney at law and a member of the Lawyers Committee of International Human Rights. I am sending this letter on behalf of the International League for Human Rights.

We have reviewed a considerable amount of material and have conferred with several individuals who are familiar with the human rights situation in Panama. Based upon the foregoing, we have reason to believe that there are violations of human rights in Panama which warrant investigation by the mission which your organization will be sending to Panama. What follows is a brief summary of those alleged violations, together with copies of several supporting documents and references to other printed materials which are not annexed but which can be furnished at your request.

On the island of Coiba it is reported that there exists a penal colony where prisoners are allegedly subjected to inhumane treatment.

In Panama City is Carcelo Modelo, where prisoners are detained after arrest. Conditions there are reportedly brutal. Torture is reported to be practiced there as a matter of routine, particularly upon political prisoners.

The National Guard appears to be beyond the reach of the law. Arbitrary arrest, torture and illegal detention by the National Guard appear to prevail throughout the country.

Political prisoners can be held without trial for a period of 15 years.

With the exception of the recent debates preceding the plebiscite which ratified the Treaty, public assembly has been severely curtailed. Political parties and professional and labor organizations which oppose the government are prohibited. New dissemination is subject to government approval, and in some instances broadcasts have been interrupted and newspapers closed down for presenting anti-government views.

Many political opponents of the government have been exiled. Some have reportedly been assassinated; others have disappeared without explanation.

The constitution adopted in 1972 guarantees most basic freedoms and due process of law. In practice, none of the constitutional guarantees applies to political prisoners.

Article 277 of the constitution establishes General Torrijos as the "maximum leader" giving him full power for six years to make all major executive, judicial and military appointments.

Three cabinet decrees promulgated in 1969 are applied independently of the constitution. Decree 341 prohibits public meetings in Panama City and Colon. Decree 342 authorizes detention without trial for 15 years. In a recent statement made on November 12, 1977, the President of Panama publicly admitted that this practice is "not right." (New York Times 11/13/77). Decree 343 imposes self-censorship upon all forms of media.

In support of the foregoing, I have annexed copies of the following documents which should be studied carefully for factual details not fully set forth in this letter:

1. Manuscript of Leopoldo Aragon describing conditions at Colba.
2. Statement of Leopoldo Aragon of his intention to immolate himself in protest against violations of human rights in Panama.
3. Letter dated 9/20/77 from Rose M. Aragon.
4. Letter (undated) from the Panamanian Committee for Human Rights to Amnesty International.
5. Statement of Antonio Poore dated September 15, 1976.
6. Resolution of the Inter-American Press Association (dated October 1977) and Report of its Committee on Freedom of the Press and Information concerning Panama.

7. Excerpt from New York Times article (11/13/77, p. 1) containing an admission by General Torrijos that holding political prisoners without trial is "not right."

Reference is made to Volumes I and II published by the Panamanian Committee for Human Rights in 1976, particularly Chapters 1 and 5.

Reference is also made to the testimony of Rose Marie Aragon and Winston Robles before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on October 12, 1977, and the testimony of Winston Robles and Eusebio Marchosky before the House Subcommittee tee on Foreign Operations of the Committee on Appropriations on March 30, 1977. This testimony is quite detailed and informative as to alleged human rights violations which have occurred and reportedly continue.

We are still endeavoring to obtain further relevant information. If successful, we will forward such information to you.

It is respectfully requested that the onsite investigation to be conducted in Panama be directed to the reported violations referred to herein.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD NADELMAN,
Lawyers Committee.

Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I, too, have found the representatives of the State Department less than candid on human rights abuses in Panama. I take this occasion to call upon the Organization of American States to send us their report on their November 29 to December 7 fact-finding mission to Panama as early as possible.

PANAMANIAN INVOLVEMENT IN INTERNATIONAL DRUG TRAFFICKING?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I feel the time has come to comment on the lack of cooperation I have received in my efforts to secure information on the possible involvement of Panamanian General Omar Torrijos in drug-trafficking operations. My efforts to gain copies of U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration files on this matter, through legitimate and customary channels, have met with delay and excuse at every turn. It is one of the best examples of "stonewalling" that I have had the misfortune to experience.

It has now been a full 2 months since I first filed a "freedom of information" request for copies of specific DEA files. To date, not so much as a single paragraph from those files has been provided to me by DEA officials, despite their repeated verbal promises that my request could and would be complied with. Let me briefly review the events surrounding this case.

EFFORTS TO SECURE INFORMATION

Mr. President, the Members of this body will recall that, on October 13 of this year, I advised the U.S. Senate of certain allegations I had received of direct involvement by Gen. Omar Torrijos and other members of his regime in drug trafficking in the United States and elsewhere. I suggested that these charges, if true, could prove relevant to the Panama Canal treaty issue. Certainly, the credibility and the personal integrity of General Torrijos and his colleagues would bear upon their reliability as Panama's guarantors of the new treaty; and, since ratification of these treaties would definitely strengthen the political and financial status of the Torrijos regime, it is important for us to know in advance if we will be bolstering a corrupt government which facilitates the transport of illegal drugs to our own shores. For that reason, I stated that the Justice Department should make its findings on this matter known immediately to Congress, prior to consideration of the treaties.

The following day, October 14, I filed a "freedom of information" request with the Drug Enforcement Administration, requesting access to 45 specific files which allegedly contain information on Torrijos' involvement with the drug-trafficking operations. At the request of the Administrator, I did not release those 45 file codes to the public media.

One week later, on October 21, I sent a second letter to DEA Administrator Bensinger containing excerpts from documents that were represented to me as copies of documents in DEA files. Those excerpts made specific reference to Omar Torrijos as being involved with narcotics and contraband traffic. I asked the Administrator to confirm the authenticity of those documents, and to advise me in writing as to whether the reports on Torrijos had been verified or disproven by DEA investigators. I have never received a response to that letter.

On October 26, I met with DEA Administrator Peter Bensinger on this matter. He advised me that some of the files in question had been turned over to the Senate Intelligence Committee. Mr. Bensinger further advised me that before any of the files could be turned over to me, they would have to be screened for removal of any information which might endanger national security or violate personal privacy rights. I acknowledged this, and reaffirmed my "freedom of information" request for those documents.

A phone call to my office on November 8 from the DEA Administrator's office advised me that I could expect to receive approved documents during the week of November 13. A week later, another phone call from the Administrator's office informed me that the documents would not be forthcoming as promised. This was attributed to special difficulties in securing all of the information I had requested. At that time, the Administrator's office was unable to advise just when I might receive the first delivery of some of the files I had requested.

Consequently, in accordance with established procedures under the Freedom of Information Act, I filed a formal appeal with the U.S. Attorney General on November 18. I advised the Attorney General at that time that I considered the information I had requested from the DEA clearly releasable under the Freedom of Information Act, and requested his review of the case. I also requested a written response from the Attorney General within 20 working days. Those 20 days have now elapsed without an official response to that appeal.

I also want to emphasize that it has been a full 2 months since my initial "Freedom of Information" request was submitted.

WHY THE DELAY?

Mr. President, it seems totally unreasonable that, at the end of 2 months, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has not even been able to provide me with sanitized versions of the files which they agree I am entitled to under the Freedom of Information Act. And I think their delay and uncooperativeness on the matter can only fuel public suspicion about what those documents may say about the involvement of Panamanian General Omar Torrijos and his colleagues in illegal operations.

As a member of the U.S. Senate who is being asked to pass judgment on proposed Panama Canal treaties, I think I am at least entitled to a direct denial of my request if these files are not to be provided to me. Instead, the administration seems determined to extinguish the matter through procrastination and excuses. If this is their strategy, then they must accept the consequences of public opinion and Senate reaction.

Mr. President, I hope that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, and the Department of Justice, may yet see fit to cooperate and comply with my legitimate request for access to files containing information on General Torrijos' involvement with drug-trafficking operations. But I have yet to see any evidence of an earnest effort on their part to facilitate my investigation of the matter.

DELETION OF DR. JOHN H. GRIMM FROM OCTOBER 26, 1977 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD LISTING OF MILITARY PERSON- NEL OPPOSING THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, on October 26, 1977, there was a list of flag officers opposing the Panama Canal treaty inserted into the Congressional Record. The name of a resident of Houston, Tex., Dr. John H. Grimm, brigadier general, U.S. Air Force Reserve, was inadvertently included in that list provided by the Reserve Officers Association. Dr. Grimm's name should be deleted from that list.

EVALUATING THE ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE NEW PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—II

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in a previous statement to the Senate, designed to correct some misperceptions, I evaluated some of the arguments raised against the Panama Canal Treaties.

Today, I would like to continue this process, by responding to a number of additional concerns which have been expressed in the Congressional Record over the past 3 months.

PANAMA AND CUBA

On September 23, Representative Robert K. Dornan of California, in an Extension of Remarks, criticized the State Department for asserting that Gen. Omar Torrijos of Panama is not really closely aligned with Cuba's Fidel Castro. The distinguished Representative invited the Department to "explain away" a recent exchange of telegrams between the two Latin leaders.

It is correct that, while returning to Panama from the United States after having signed the treaties, General Torrijos sent Castro, by radio, a message of greeting and appreciation for Cuba's support for Panama on the canal issue. However, Panama's relations with Cuba at the present time might best be described as "correct," without being particularly cordial or close. The staff of the Cuban Embassy in Panama now totals 25 to 30, a substantial reduction from the 1975-76 figure of 40 to 50. Despite allegations that Cuba has provided arms, training, and assistance to the Panamanian National Guard, there is no evidence that such is the case. When General Torrijos visited Cuba in January 1976, he expressed admiration for Cuba's material accomplishments under Castro but added, "Cuba has found its road to socialism but that road is not Panama's." I might add that numerous groups of American businessmen who have traveled to Cuba have also expressed admiration for a number of social accomplishments of the government of Fidel Castro.

During the canal treaty negotiations, General Torrijos consulted frequently with the Presidents of Venezuela, Colombia, Costa Rica, and Mexico. He met with them together on August 5 and 6, for a final consultation before reaching agreement in principle with the United States on August 10. These countries—not Cuba—are the ones with which General Torrijos has maintained the closest contact on the negotiations in recent years.

SOVIET INFLUENCE

On September 20, Representative Larry McDonald of Georgia inserted in the Congressional Record a column by Otto S. Scott that had appeared in the San Diego Union. Entitled "The Parallel Between Two Canals," the column referred to the alleged demand by the Soviet Union in 1919 for the internationalization of the Suez and Panama Canals and argued that—

Transfer of the [Panama] canal will open the gate to Soviet expansion and usher scenes of disorder and intrigue to this hemisphere virtually unknown since it achieved continental solidarity and ended its Civil War.

The neutrality treaty includes a provision which specifies that after Panama assumes responsibility for the canal at the end of the century, no foreign nation will be allowed to operate the canal or to station troops or maintain military bases in Panama. Panama has thus formally committed itself not to invite in another foreign power to "replace" the United States, nor does it have any reason to do so. Panama's goal for decades has been to achieve greater control over its own destiny, not to trade U.S. influence for some other foreign influence. As regards the fear that an unfriendly power might nevertheless push its way into Panama, it should be noted that the United States would be in a position under the neutrality treaty to act to maintain canal neutrality which includes the prohibition against foreign operation or bases. Moreover, the United States and Panama are allies under the Rio Pact, so the impression that Panama would be a defenseless target for foreign intrigue and expansion is wholly unwarranted.

This argument, moreover, is based on unwarranted assumptions regarding the present Panamanian regime headed by General Torrijos. He has made it clear that he wants Panama to develop in accordance with its own needs and traditions and not in accordance with any foreign model. Panama's relations with Cuba and the Communist countries are not close; neither the Soviet Union nor Communist China maintains an embassy in Panama. On the other hand, ever since achieving independence, Panama has had very close political and economic ties with the United States and is an ally of ours under the Rio Pact. United States-Panamanian ties will be even closer under the new treaties, since the two countries will be working in long-term partnership to operate and protect that canal. The danger of Communist or other unfriendly influence in Panama would be far greater if we attempted to maintain the status quo. Moreover, not only in Panama but also in other countries sympathetic to Panamanian aspirations, such an attempt would provide grist for Communist mills and strengthen the position of anti-American forces.

PAYMENTS TO PANAMA

On September 21, Representative Robert J. Lagomarsino of California inserted in the Congressional Record an editorial from the Camarillo, Calif., Daily News entitled "Pay To Be Kicked?" The editorial argues that the Senate should reject the treaties because "we are being blackmailed by a two-bit dictator" and asks why we should pay $50 to $60 million annually until the year 2000 "for the privilege of being kicked out?"

In negotiating the treaties, the United States did not respond to pressure, but recognized that changing circumstances required basic changes in our treaty relations with Panama. We are acting, instead, to preserve and protect our continued use of the canal. We tried to reconcile the fundamental interests of the two parties: our interest in continued access to the canal, and the strong desire of the Panamanian people to have control over all their country's territory. The alternative—maintenance of the status quo—would be the unilateral assertion of American power, unnecessary for our objective, continued access to the canal, and without regard to the legitimate concerns of the Panamanians. Adopting such an alternative would seriously weaken our moral position in the world and would not be the best measure of assuring our security interest in the canal for the future. Given the vulnerability of the canal to sabotage, adhering to the status quo could well result in the defeat of our primary objective of an open and efficiently functioning canal.

In response to the charge that we are paying the Panamanians to take the canal, Secretary Vance pointed out on September 26:

Under the treaties, Panama will receive payments which more fairly reflect the fact that it is making available its major natural resource, its territory, but the treaties require no new appropriations, nor do they add to the burdens of the American taxpayer.

The payments are to come out of the revenues generated by the operation of the canal. Acceptance of the principle that they should be established on such a basis was a major concession to our point of view by the Panamanian negotiators who had sought, on the other hand, payments far higher than could be supported from canal revenues.

TREATY APPROVAL PROCESS

On September 21, Representative Robert J. Lagomarsino inserted in the Congressional Record an editorial from the Ventura County, Calif., Star-Free Press entitled "Why the Rush?" The editorial asked why President Carter had given precedence of a Panama Canal Treaty over other items demanding his attention; why the signing ceremony had been held so soon; why approval of the treaties should not be subject to an "election"—presumably, a popular referendum is meant—in the United States; and whether, in the event of a civil war in Panama, the United States would be obliged to send in troops to save General Torrijos "in order to save the canal?"

As the editorial correctly points out, negotiations had been going on for 14 years. It is difficult to see how our interests would have been served by their further prolongation, once mutual agreement was reached on the basic points at issue. Certainly, we would have been accused of bad faith had we attempted to draw them out for an additional period.

Though it is now apparent that the Senate will not vote on the treaties until early next year, at the time the treaties were signed it seemed possible that the Senate would vote in the fall. In any case, there is no necessary relationship between the date of signature of a treaty and the time of the Senate's consideration of it.

It is not the custom in the United States to hold popular referendums in order to approve treaties. Rather, in accordance with our Constitution, the people's will is expressed by their representatives in the Senate.

The United States has primary responsibility for defending the canal during the treaty period but has no interest in intervening in Panamanian affairs. Conceivably, our responsibility for canal defense could result in action by U.S. troops should civil disturbances break out in Panama at some time; however, the objective of the U.S. action would be to protect the security and neutrality of the canal, not to influence the outcome of an internal struggle for power. Moreover, the parallel with Vietnam cited in the editorial is specious, since both treaty opponents and proponents would agree that the continued efficient functioning of the canal is an important U.S. interest that must be protected.

INDIGENOUS COMMUNIST PARTY INFLUENCES

On September 23, Representative Daniel J. Flood of Pennsylvania inserted in the Congressional Record an article by the Washington columnist Allan C. Brownfield, entitled "The Canal Treaty and the Growth of Communist Influence in Panama." In this article, Brownfield alleges that Communist influence in the Panamanian Government is widespread; that the Panamanian Communists seek to eliminate U.S. bases in the Canal Zone; that the Soviet Union recently concluded "a potentially major trade and economic agreement with the Panamanian Government"; and that, once the treaties are approved, The Panamanians will bring pressure on the United States to eliminate our military presence altogether.

The Panamanian Communist Party does not function legally in Panama. It is permitted to remain in existence, but this Government toleration depends on the party's maintaining good behavior in the Government's eyes. It consists of only about 500 members and maintains a very modest profile. It does not participate either formally or informally in the Government, nor, to the best of the State Department's knowledge, are any leading government officials members of the party. Its actual influence on the Government of Panama is marginal.

Article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty provides a basis for defense of the canal by the United States and Panama acting in cooperation with each other, while establishing a U.S. right to act unilaterally if necessary to defend the canal. An agreement in implementation of that article describes U.S. rights to station, train, and move military forces. U.S. base rights and the legal status of U.S. defense personnel in Panama are also provided for under this status of forces agreement. Panama has a good record of adhering to its international obligations, even to a treaty which has been objectionable to it virtually from the beginning. There is no reason to believe that its behavior would be any different regarding a treaty which is much more responsive to its major concerns.

The "major trade and economic agreement" between the U.S.S.R. and Panama does not, in fact, exist. A Soviet trade mission visited Panama on July 19, 1977, and held discussions about increased Soviet-Panamanian economic and trade relations. No formal agreement was reached, however, and there has been no further activity of note. A number of Latin American countries have trade agreements with the U.S.S.R., and the recent Soviet initiative toward Panama does not seem to merit any particular attention.

CANAL USE BY BELLIGERENT NATIONS

In his 20th speech on the Panama Canal Treaty, reported in the Congressional Record of October 27, Senator Allen raised certain questions regarding the United States-Panama Protocol of an Agreement concerning neutrality signed October 10, 1914. He expressed concern that this protocol was being terminated by the new Panama Canal Treaty.

The 1914 Protocol deals with the application to Panama and the Canal Zone of the principles of international law concerning the rights and duties of belligerent nations and neutral nations during wartime. It does not relate to the principle of neutralization of the Panama Canal embodied in the 1901 Hay-Pauncefote Treaty between the United Kingdom and the United States, or to the rights of belligerent vessels to transit the canal.

Under the pre-U.N. Charter law of war, belligerent warships could not renew their supply of fuel in the ports of the same neutral state until a minimum period of 3 months has elapsed from the time of their previous refueling—article 20 of Hague Convention No. XIII (1907). The 1914 United States-Panama Protocol provides that, for these purposes, when Panama and the United States are neutral in a conflict between other nations, the ports of the Canal Zone and the ports of Panama shall be treated as being ports of the same neutral nation. Specifically, the Protocol states:

That hospitality extended in the waters of the Republic of Panama to a belligerent vessel . . . shall serve to deprive such vessel of like hospitality in the Panama Canal Zone for a period of three months, and vice versa.

The protocol is terminated by the new Panama Canal Treaty because, upon entry into force of that treaty, the Canal Zone will cease to exist as a separate jurisdictional entity. Thus, the 1914 Protocol, which addresses the use of ports in "the Panama Canal Zone" would have no further application.

At the conclusion of my remarks, I will offer further comments on the use of the canal by belligerent nations.

U.S. DEFENSE OF THE CANAL

In his 22d speech on the Panama Canal Treaty, reported in the Congressional Record of November 1, Senator Allen alleged that General Torrijos interpreted the treaty and the statement of understanding between the United States and Panama of October 14 to mean that he had the sole right to decide when American troops could come in to defend the Canal. General Torrijos himself might be the aggressor, Allen added, and, in those circumstances, would not, of course, summon U.S. troops.

Article IV of the neutrality treaty provides that the United States and Panama "agree to maintain" the canal's neutrality. This general formulation permits each country unilaterally to decide upon and take the steps it considers necessary to insure that the canal remains open and secure. The neutrality treaty does not stipulate that Panama and the United States jointly "agree to maintain" the canal's neutrality. Where joint action is contemplated, the treaty so specifies—and it does not do so in this instance.

It is highly unlikely that Panama would attack the canal. Panama has the paramount interest in keeping the canal open and operating effectively and is committed to the maintenance of the canal's neutrality. If, however, Panama should be unable or unwilling to uphold its commitment to maintain the canal's neutrality, the right of the United States to carry out its commitment would remain and the United States would be free to take whatever measures it considered appropriate to keep the canal open and operating.

STATUS OF CANAL ZONE EMPLOYEES

On September 26, Representative Robert J. Lagomarsino inserted in the Congressional Record a statement by Alfred J. Graham, president of the Canal Zone Central Labor Union and Metal Trades Council, AFL-CIO. In his statement, Mr. Graham dealt with political and security, as well as labor matters, and criticized the treaties on several different grounds. He stated that he was dissatisfied with the lack of treaty provisions that would resolve the dual citizenship problem; that employees now engaged in Canal Zone operations which would become DOD functions might lose their Washington, D.C., paybase and Canal Zone leave benefits; that he considered the Panamanian Government an oppressive regime and that U.S. citizens remaining in Panama to operate the canal were concerned with the prospective loss of their civil rights under it; that, under the neutrality treaty, the United States could find itself in the position of forcing an ally to desist from attempting to impede the passage of an enemy warship through the canal; that, as leader of the free world, the United States should conclude a treaty only with a "Constitutional Government in Panama"; and that he was convinced the canal would be in Communist hands by "shortly after the year 2000", if not sooner.

Each of these points is subject to refutation. For example, the treaty has provisions which assure that the U.S. citizens who are in Panama for purposes of the canal treaty will be treated as U.S. citizens for purposes of the treaty despite the fact that some of them may be considered to be Panamanian citizens under Panamanian law. This means that they will be entitled to enter and leave Panama on a U.S. passport and the other documentation required by the treaty and will be entitled to all of the rights, privileges and immunities provided for U.S. citizens under the treaty and its related agreements.

The treaty, of course, does not address the status of private U.S. citizens who may be in Panama or seek to enter Panama for purposes other than the Panama Canal treaty and who may be considered Panamanian citizens under its law. Panama may treat such persons born in the Canal Zone as Panamanian citizens, for it is a well-recognized principle of international law that each nation has the right to establish its own criteria for citizenship under its law.

Under the Panama Canal Treaty, in general the terms and conditions of employment for current employees who will be employed by the new Commission will be no less favorable than those now in effect. The Secretary of the Army has assured current employees that they will keep the tropical differential and the present leave system and will suffer no reduction in pay.

The Panamanian Government, while authoritarian, has a legal basis in the constitution of 1972, which, moreover, guarantees common basic rights and freedoms to all Panamanians. At the same time, however, political or other activities which are deemed to be aimed at the overthrow of the regime are not permitted. Until the year 2000, under the terms of the treaty, all U.S. citizen employees and their dependents are assured basic civil rights in Panamanian courts similar to those that apply in U.S. courts, as well as other benefits and protections similar to those enjoyed by other U.S. Government employees overseas.

The neutrality treaty insures passage through the canal of the warships of all nations at all times. But the canal waters are only to be 3 miles under the new treaty, as they are presently. Outside of that area such vessels would be fair game.

No one can predict what the world political situation will be in the year 2000. However, one of the most important elements of the regime of neutrality, which the United States has the right to maintain permanently, is that no nation but Panama will operate the canal or maintain military forces and military installations in Panama after 1999. Panama favored this provision as much as we did as explicit proof that it will not come under foreign domination in the future.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A POSITIVE STEP

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, in the past few weeks I have had the opportunity to discuss firsthand with my constituents issues of particular concern to them. One of the topics most frequently mentioned was the new Panama Canal treaties.

I am sure that many of my colleagues found, as I did, a sense among their constituents that these treaties represented another retreat from our Nation's position as a world leader. The feeling that the United States is turning its back on the traditions and the heritage that have made it a great nation is a real one. Particularly in the aftermath of the Vietnam war, many Americans seem to feel that the United States is no longer willing to defend the principles on which this country was founded. Inappropriately, the Panama Canal treaties are seen as one more indication of this retreat.

David McCullough, whose authoritative study of the history of the Panama Canal, "The Path Between The Seas," was recently published, succinctly articulated and rebutted this feeling in a letter to President Carter. In his letter to the President, Mr. McCullough argues correctly that these new treaties—far from being a retreat from our principles—are instead an eloquent expression of "a strong, still-creative, still-purposeful people." Mr. McCullough notes the immense pride we all have in the Panama Canal. The canal, built despite overwhelming odds, is a symbol of the creativity and vigor of our country in that period of our history. And today the new treaties signify that our country continues to be a nation of great principles, great creativity, and great courage. I heartily agree with Mr. McCullough's conclusions. I ask unanimous consent that his letter to the President be printed in the Record in its entirety.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ACCORDS ARE IDEALISTIC AS WELL AS LOGICAL, HISTORIAN MCCULLOUGH TELLS PRESIDENT

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT. Rosalee and I were so very pleased and honored to be able to meet you last Friday, and especially on such a propitious day in your campaign for the canal treaties. Your generous inscription on the newspaper picture of you and Gen. Torrijos, as well as your thoughtful remarks about my book, pleased us more than I can say, and we thank you most sincerely.

May I add also that after so many years of studying and writing about dead Presidents, I found it an enormous thrill to see and shake the hand of a live one.

During our afternoon at the White House, I had, as perhaps you know, a chance to talk at some length with presidential aides Landon Butler and Joseph Aragon, and it was Butler's suggestion that a letter covering some of my thoughts on the Panama issue might be of help to you in the months to come.

Mr. President, I am concerned about a certain lack of creative fervor in what has been said in behalf of the treaties thus far. The opposition has a "cause." Its response is full of emotion, even passion, while the arguments for the treaties, however intellectually solid, remain for many people largely an abstraction.

This is not to discount for a moment the powerful logic of the case for the treaties. Indeed, the more we are told of the hard practicalities involved—political, military, operational—the more convincing they become. They virtually speak for themselves, if presented in language of the kind the layman can understand, and, when set forth for the country by a Commander-in-Chief who is himself a former naval officer and engineer, their effect cannot help but be profound, perhaps even deciding.

But how much more important and useful this great national debate could become, how much better off we will all be for it, if the treaties are seen also as the expression of a high ideal, if in making this historic decision we can sense what Theodore Roosevelt called "the lift toward nobler things which marks a great and generous people."

There are, as I know you appreciate, all kinds of reasons why suddenly we seem to care so intensely about the canal, a subject most of us have never given much thought to until lately. To say that the opposition springs from some vague or naive nostalgia for a simpler past is really to miss the point. There is a grandeur about the Panama Canal and a grandeur of a kind we like to think of as particularly American. The canal is a triumph of an era we remember fondly for its confidence and energy, youth and sense of purpose. The canal is something we made and have looked after these many years; it is "ours" in that sense, which is very different from just ownership.

It works, still. Despite time and change it remains a huge American Success, and this just now, in the aftermath of Vietnam, is of psychological import. (There is a haunting kind of irony to the realization that we went into the jungles of Vietnam to rescue a disastrous French failure, just as once we went into the jungles of Panama to rescue a disastrous French failure.)

Probably it is the aura of power surrounding the canal that has the most to do with our feelings about it. We have known since school days of the tremendous powers called forth to build it—the power to eradicate disease, the power to literally move mountains. There is its own miraculous power to lift and transport ships from ocean to ocean. It is both the symbol and implement of sea power. So when we talk of the canal, whether we are old, young, for or against the treaties, we are talking about very elemental feelings about our own strengths, and it is this, I think, that makes the thought of giving it up or giving it away so disturbing to many people who fail to see the treaties as a positive step.

Still, by the same token, we want, all of us, a more humane and stable world.

We want to be builders no less than did that generation which created the canal.

So for all these reasons it is imperative that the case for the treaties be expressed in the most positive terms, and with eloquence. It is because the canal is of such critical importance, because it must be kept secure and in use, because we reserve it as a monument to the human spirit, that the long outmoded Bunau-Varilla treaty has to be replaced and the nature of our presence in Panama brought up to date. Our decision must not be a grudging concession, but a far-seeing, constructive innovation. This, we should be able to say, is something we do because we know it is right. This is not merely the surest way to "Save Our Canal," it is the strong, positive act of a still-confident, still-creative, still-purposeful people.

Our sanction of this unprecedented step can become a source of national pride and self-respect in much the way building the canal was. It is the spirit in which we act that is so very important. The way we say yes to the treaties, the words we use, can, on the one hand, influence how we stand in the eyes of all Latin America, but it can also influence how we stand in our own eyes, and that, too, I know you will agree, is "in the national interest."

I think of what Theodore Roosevelt might say were he alive today. (I have a small bust of him which looks down on me from the top of a file cabinet as I write this.) An ardent reader of history, he knew the world has its moods. He saw history itself as a force, and the history of our own time and the changes it has brought would not be lost on him. He adored and drew inspiration from the great deeds of the past, and was often saddened by the passing of an era before his eyes—the vanishing of the great frontier days of the West, for example. But change was inevitable, he knew, and necessary. Change was growth. The true conservative, he once remarked, keeps his face to the future.

He believed down to his boots in a strong Executive, in presidential leadership, and the fact that the treaties reflect the policies and intentions of three prior administrations, in addition to your own, would carry enormous weight with him. Well before anyone else, Roosevelt recognized the importance of Alfred Thayer Mahan's thesis (the nation that controls the sea controls the decisive factor in warfare), and so it is hard to picture him dismissing or discounting such testimony to the military value of the treaties as voiced by the Joint Chiefs.

But were he to endorse the treaties, as I am quite sure he would, it would be mainly because he would see the decision as one by which we are demonstrating the kind of power we wish to be. For Roosevelt the canal was a gateway to the very different and uncertain new world of the new 20th century, a world in which the United States had no choice but to play a major part. "We cannot avoid meeting great issues," he said. "All that we can determine for ourselves is whether we shall meet them well or ill."

Mr. President, the Panama Canal is a vast, heroic expression of that age-old desire to bridge the divide and bring people closer together. The task now, it seems to me, is to give the country the conviction that this too is what the treaties are all about.

Sincerely,

DAVID McCULLOUGH.

NINETY-FIFTH CONGRESS
SECOND SESSION

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—EXECUTIVE N, 95-1

AMENDMENTS NOS. 10, 11, AND 12

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: AMENDMENTS ARE KEY TO EFFECTIVE GUARANTEES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it now appears likely that the Panama Canal Treaty proposals will reach the Senate floor for consideration during the 2d session of the 95th Congress. It promises to be an historic debate, and certainly one that will lead to a full examination of our future defense and economic interests in the Western Hemisphere. We should be prepared to spend sufficient time on the issue to fully discuss all major features of the canal treaties, given the broad extent of public interest in the matter.

During the past several months, I have devoted a good deal of time and attention to the treaty issue. I have studied and reflected upon the fundamental issues that are involved. I have offered fresh perspectives on several provisions of the treaties which appear to be of exceptional significance to the U.S. interests in years to come. In doing so, I hoped to stimulate a more careful consideration of these treaties and their implications for our country.

In this regard, I submitted six treaty amendments and two reservations on September 23. On October 5, in an appearance before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I expressed concern about conflicting interpretations of key treaty provisions by Panamanian and American negotiators. Following the release of the Carter-Torrijos "statement of understanding" concerning defense and passage rights provisions, I submitted two additional amendments to make those clarifications a part of the neutrality treaty itself on October 17. In late December, I was able to spend a day and a half in the Panama Canal Zone, where I gained additional insight into canal operations and treaty issues in general.

NEW AMENDMENTS

At this time, as in executive session, I propose three additional amendments to the canal treaties, which I hope will be thoroughly considered during the forthcoming debate. In my opinion, these revisions would better protect our ability to defend the Panama Canal against the threat of attack, and would better guarantee our perpetual access to an interoceanic canal in Central America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the texts of my three amendments be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 10 (EXEC.) To Ex. N, 95-1

In article XII, strike out paragraph 2.
Renumber subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

AMENDMENT No. 11 (EXEC.) TO Ex. N, 95-1

At the end of article IV, add the following:

6. For the duration of this Treaty and consistent with the other provisions of this article, both Parties agree that, subject to the other provisions of this Treaty, only the Republic of Panama or the United States of America may maintain military forces, defense sites, or military installations in the national territory of the Republic of Panama.

AMENDMENT No. 12 (EXEC.) TO Ex. N, 95-1

Before the period at the end of article V, insert a comma and the following: "except that, in order to maintain the regime of neutrality established under this Treaty, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall conclude an agreement on the continued availability to the United States of America of any defense site or military installation after the date of the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, and if no such agreement may have been concluded before such date, the United States of America may continue on and after such date to occupy the defense sites and military installations made available for its use under the Panama Canal Treaty, notwithstanding the termination of the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the first of these amendments would simply strike that section of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty which prevents the United States from negotiating with any country other than Panama for the right to construct an interoceanic canal in the Western Hemisphere. This is, in my opinion, an unnecessary and unduly restrictive limitation on our ability to safeguard our vital defense interests. Article XII of the treaty, as proposed, affectively binds the United States to construct a new canal in Panama if it should be determined that a modernized canal is desirable for defense or economic reasons. Yet, there is no commitment on the part of Panama to agree to permit construction of the canal, and we are only prevented from constructing one elsewhere.

This amendment is similar to one which I introduced on September 23. However, it is a more direct and simplified approach to this problem. Whether or not Panama is the best location for construction of a new canal is really not the immediate issue. The central question is whether the United States should bind itself, by this treaty, to foreclose all options with respect to a new canal. I submit that this would be a serious mistake on our part, and one which we might well regret prior to the year 2000.

The second of these amendments would amend the basic treaty to provide much the same type of assurance that is given under the neutrality treaty. That is, it would insure that no governments other than those of the United States and Panama may establish a military presence within Panama between the date of treaty ratification and December 31, 1999. This should not be construed as an impractical or unfair imposition upon the Government of Panama. It is a recognition of our mutual interest in protecting the canal and its neutrality from outside interference. In fact, the United States and Panama reached essentially the same agreement under article V of the neutrality treaty, covering the period after December 31, 1999. There should be no reason why our two governments cannot express agreement on this vital provision. And, given our continuing concern about the threat of Soviet or Cuban military influence in the area, the guarantee should help resolve Senate concerns about the security of the canal during the coming decades.

My third amendment would insure that the United States has the authority to maintain a limited military presence within Panama following the expiration of the basic treaty—that is, after the year 1999. In my opinion, our ability to retain at least one or two base areas within the former Canal Zone will be vital to our ability to defend the neutrality of the canal at that time. This arrangement could be concluded under a separate base agreement, much like the United States currently has with the Government of Spain. My amendment would establish the basic authority for that agreement, and provide the necessary incentive for concluding such an agreement prior to the year 2000.

By doing so, we are not attempting to perpetuate a colonial presence in Panama. And we are not challenging the desire of the Panamanian people to establish control over the Canal Zone area. Instead, we are simply suggesting that, in order to facilitate our continuing defense responsibilities under the neutrality treaty, we be permitted to maintain a few basic defense installations on terms that would be acceptable to both the United States and Panama. As allies, and as mutual guarantors for the regime of neutrality, the United States and Panama should be able to reach an accommodation on this crucial point. In addition, I feel that this provision would substantially facilitate favorable Senate consideration of these treaties.

TREATY REVISIONS

Mr. President, when I first proposed certain treaty amendments and reservations last September, I expressed my conviction that this treaty must be modified directly through amendments or reservations in order to effectively insure that such changes would be recognized as legally binding in years to come. I emphasized this point again when I testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on October 5. I still believe that, in order to prevent any misunderstandings in the future, we must resolve our misgivings about these treaties by directly amending the treaty language, or by attaching substantive reservations to the resolution of ratification.

I base my convictions on the authority of several scholars of international law, who have studied and analyzed historical precedents and the subtleties of international agreements.

One such expert in the field is Mr. Elmer Plischke, professor and head of the department of government and politics at the University of Maryland. In his book, "Conduct of American Diplomacy" (1967), Professor Plischke cites the following:

Amendments and reservations are differentiated in that the former constitute actual textual changes and, as such, even if acceptable to the President, require renewed negotiations to induce other signatories to accept them and thereby mutually incorporate them into the authentic text of the treaty * * *.

Reservations, on the other hand, are formal declarations accepting the treaty subject to specified interpretations, limitations, qualifications, or conditions, rather than requiring textual changes. * * * While other signatories must also be willing to accept the reservations, they do not need to consider a draft revision, and the acceptance may be either express or tacit.

Prof. Louis Henkin, former consul to the U.S. Department of State and currently professor of law at Columbia University, also has provided clarification on the subject of treaty modifications in his book, "Foreign Affairs and the Constitution" (1972). Professor Henkin makes these observations:

In many cases the Senate has given its consent (to a treaty) with reservations. Whether the Senate insists on a modification in the terms of a treaty, or on a particular interpretation of it, or on some limitation of its consequences, reservation usually requires renegotiation * * * one might say, the Senate withholds consent from the treaty presented to it but indicates what revised treaty will earn its consent, and gives it in advance to a treaty as so revised.

Sometimes the Senate can be persuaded to achieve clarification or even some modification of a treaty provision without entering a reservation, by expressing instead its "understanding" of the provision. If that understanding is communicated to the other party and is accepted or acquiesced in there is no issue and the treaty need not be reopened. There is danger, however, of failure of communication that may engender doubt and controversy as to whether the parties agreed to the same terms.

Based on these particular assessments, it would seem likely that the approval of substantive amendments could conceivably necessitate renegotiation of certain treaty provisions by interested parties. However, I am not nearly so concerned about that prospect as I am about the danger associated with treaty understandings, cited by Professor Henkin and others. That is the prospect that the understanding adopted by one party to a treaty may be misunderstood by the other party. It would be far better that the differences between Panama and the United States over the wording of this treaty be taken under review at this time for further negotiations, than that such differences be glossed over now and result in an international confrontation at some later point in time.

Although some may seek to "beg out" with understandings at this stage, I suggest that we might well end up only deluding ourselves while creating difficulties for a future President and a future Congress.

AMPLE PRECEDENT

Some will suggest, I suspect, that we are blazing a new trail or following an uncharted course in proposing substantive revisions to the treaties already negotiated by our able diplomats in the executive branch. This, of course, ignores both our constitutional mandate and ample historical precedent.

Article II, section 2 of the U.S. Constitution clearly gives the Senate the responsibility of "advice and consent" on treaties negotiated by our Chief Executive. And, in fact, we have every justification, from a historical perspective, for doing so.

Since the founding of this Nation, the Senate has directly amended numerous international treaties concluded by the executive branch. Of these, 73 treaties were ratified and enacted into law with Senate amendments intact. Over the same period of time, one treaty was enacted into law with Presidential amendments, 28 treaties were ratified with Senate reservations, and 16 treaties were ratified with Presidential reservations.

It seems to me that this data is important for two reasons: First, it indicates that there is abundant precedent for Senate initiative in modifying international treaties; and, second, it indicates that such modifications are not necessarily "fatal" to such treaties. That is, a proposal of amendments and reservations cannot be equated with efforts to "kill the treaties."

GROWING SUPPORT

Frankly, I am encouraged by the broader interest within the Senate in attaching revisions to the Panama Canal treaties. In recent days, the Senate leadership has publicly indicated its support for treaty modifications, particularly with respect to the defense and passage rights provisions. Those of us who endorsed treaty amendments and reservations last fall are gratified that our expressions of concern about treaty defects are being heeded.

Even Panamanian general Omar Torrijos refuses to be "intransigent" on the question of treaty revisions. During my conversation with the general in Panama City during late December, he indicated his willingness to "keep talking" at the negotiating table should the Senate amend the proposed accords.

At this point, it seems that only the Carter administration remains adamantly opposed to substantive treaty amendments. The President's refusal to consider Senate amendments or reservations is vaguely reminiscent of President Woodrow Wilson's intransigence toward Senate modifications to the Versailles Treaty in 1919. The result of that standoff was, of course, defeat of the treaty.

I am hopeful, Mr. President, that the forthcoming Senate debate on the Panama Canal treaties will reflect not only a conscientious attitude on the part of all Members, but a spirit of cooperation on the part of the administration, and of course, the Panamanian Government.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 13 AND 14

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, this morning I announced my support for the Panama Canal treaties. I stated that I would vote in favor of the treaties if they are amended to include the October 14 statement of understanding issued, but never signed, by President Carter and General Torrijos.

When the Senate considers the canal treaties next month I shall offer two amendments designed to incorporate all relevant portions of the October 14 statement. The only changes I would make in the text are those necessary for accurate legal drafting. I recognize that similar amendments have been suggested, but note that they generally deviate in some respect from the text of the statement of understanding.

The importance of the points contained in the statement of understanding is self-evident. The communique clarified our right to take action to insure that the canal remains open, secure, and accessible; it provides appropriate assurances that, in time of need or emergency, our vessels will go to the head of the line.

The statement must be made an integral part of the treaty. There can be no ambiguity on the points it addresses.

The fact that this critically important document was left unsigned is a matter of grave concern, particularly in light of General

Torrijos' comments that he did not give any autographs during his October visit to Washington. We cannot accept a situation in which the validity and binding nature of the statement of understanding is open to challenge or interpretation.

The American people deserve clear and adequate assurances on the important issues of canal neutrality and priority passage. If my amendments are accepted, they shall have such assurances.

The people and Government of Panama cannot have it both ways. Either they accept the statement of understanding or they do not. If the October 14 communique is an accurate reflection of the Panamanian interpretation of the treaty provisions, then it should be no problem for Panama to accept a Senate amendment that adheres to the text of the communique. We are not adding anything new to the treaties; we are not asking Panama for concessions. We are simply incorporating important assurances already negotiated and agreed to by President Carter and General Torrijos.

At the same time, I think the Senate should make an honest effort to avoid a situation in which we set out to amend the treaties along the lines of the statement of understanding, adding a little here, snipping off a little there, until we have destroyed the symmetry of the established text and rendered it unacceptable to Panama or forced a new plebiscite. The communique, as it stands, provides acceptable assurances on the questions of neutrality and priority passage and I strongly believe that we should adhere to the agreed text.

Regardless of what one may think about the personality and character of General Torrijos, there is a general consensus among those who have visited Panama that he has been forthcoming and sincere in his willingness to accommodate our objections and respond to our concerns.

During my stay in Panama I was assured by General Torrijos that a Senate amendment incorporating the language of the statement of understanding would not require a new plebiscite since the people of Panama were aware of the statement and its contents prior to voting on the treaties.

I credit these assurances, but would also emphasize that the important point is for the Senate of the United States to establish clearly and unequivocally, by amendment, the legitimacy of the statement of understanding and its central role in the treaty.

Adoption by the Senate of the two amendments I shall offer will improve the treaties, will provide us with important, binding, mutually acceptable assurances, without doing violence to the 14 years of careful negotiation and compromise represented in the treaties.

I sincerely hope that my colleagues will join me in support, and hopefully in sponsorship, of these amendments. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the amendments be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 13 (EXEC.) TO Ex N, 95-1

At the end of article IV, add the following: "In order to carry out the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal shall remain open and secure to ships of all nations, each of the two Parties to this Treaty shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to such regime of neutrality and, consequently, shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal. The preceding sentence shall not be construed as conferring a right of intervention on the United States of America in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama. Any United States of America action shall be directed at insuring that the Canal shall remain open, secure, and accessible, and no such action may be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of the Republic of Panama".

AMENDMENT No. 14 (EXEC.) TO EX, N, 95-1

At the end of paragraph 1 of article VI, add the following: "The preceding sentence is for the purpose of, and shall be construed as, assuring the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, assuring that such vessels go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES AND SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Senate Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd made an important announcement last Friday regarding his views on the Panama Canal treaties. After thoughtful deliberation, a firsthand view of the Panama Canal and discussions with a variety of people—both for and against the treaties—Senator Byrd announced that he would "vote for the present treaties and work for their ratification."

I completely agree with Senator Byrd when he said:

It is my view that these treaties are the best means of assuring continued access to and use of the Canal—and that is our primary concern.

For the benefit of my colleagues who may have missed Senator Byrd's remarks, I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD

I have studied the past, assessed the present, and taken into account the future in reaching a decision on whether to support the Panama Canal treaties.

It has not been an easy decision, and in reaching it I have attempted to consider all the relevant information in an objective manner. As part of this process, I led a Senatorial delegation to Panama to gain as much first-hand knowledge as possible about the canal, the Americans living in the Canal Zone, the Panamanian people, and the Panamanian government.

Since first reviewing the treaties in September, I have taken the position that it would be necessary to clarify two important points: the rights of the United States in guaranteeing access to the Canal, and expeditious passage for United States military vessels. I felt that it was important for a clarification to be made prior to the Panamanian plebiscite of October 23, and I stressed the importance of this to President Carter. This clarification was made in the October 14 statement of understanding by President Carter and General Torrijos.

During our visit to Panama, we discussed this with General Torrijos, who clearly indicated his adherence to the statement of understanding. Further, it was clear that the Panamanian people had been informed about these points before the plebiscite.

I do not think there should be any question that we have the right to defend the Canal. However, in order that no doubt about that interpretation be left for future generations, I have on a number of occasions stated that the substance of the October 14 statement should be added to or incorporated in the treaties in some form. I plan to work with other Senators in seeing that such language is included.

Like most Americans, I take great pride in the Panama Canal. It represents a monumental achievement. Even in this space age it remains one of history's outstanding engineering feats. However, we should also understand the pride and aspirations of the Panamanian people.

During the period since the signing of the treaties, I have been impressed by the good faith exhibited by the Panamanians. Panama's interests are closely intertwined with our own and after visiting Panama, I am more hopeful and confident about that country's future political direction. In response to concerns expressed to General Torrijos by the Senatorial delegation of which I was a member, important steps have been taken to better human rights and civil liberties in Panama by abrogating certain repressive laws.

As I have said from the beginning, the basic question to be considered is whether these treaties are in the best interests of the United States, I believe that the weight of the evidence argues convincingly that they are.

It is my view that these treaties are the best means of assuring continued access to and use of the Canal—and that is our primary concern.

Panama would have a greater stake in the Canal and thus a strong interest in its efficient and unimpeded operation. However, the United States would retain a high degree of control over the Canal through the end of the century, as well as defense rights thereafter.

Ratification of the treaties would be consistent with our own role as a leader among nations. It is particularly important for our relations with Latin America and should open a new era of mutual trust and cooperation in inter-American relations. Given the history of the Canal and the principles of our country, the treaties are in our interest and ratification is the right step to take.

I am announcing today I will vote for the treaties and will work for their approval.

PANAMA CANAL: HISTORIC CONTRIBUTIONS BY EDWARD SCHILDHAUER IN ITS DESIGN AND CONSTRUCTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, my State of Wisconsin has produced many leaders of national stature including some whose contributions to the acquisition by the United States of the Canal Zone territory, 1903-04, and the construction of the Panama Canal, 1904-14, are historic.

Among such leaders were Senator John C. Spooner, author of the Spooner Act of 1902 under which the Canal Zone was acquired and the canal constructed, and Edward Schildhauer, a highly competent electrical engineer.

Recruited for canal service by chief engineer John F. Stevens of the Isthmian Canal Commission, a major builder of the Great Northern across the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific and the basic architect of the Panama Canal, Schildhauer measured up to the expectations of his famous superior by making notable contributions to the success of the enterprise. He designed the electrical and mechanical machinery for the locks and thus is largely responsible for the excellent safety record of the great interoceanic waterway in the lockage since 1914 of hundreds of thousands of vessels of various types of many nations during both peace and war.

A recent news story by the editor, Greg Hageman, of the New Holstein (Wis.) Reporter provides some little known history about Schildhauer's important services and, in view of current discussions about the Panama Canal, is a most timely contribution.

Mr. President, because the indicated article is highly informative and a noteworthy addition to the cumulating literature on the canal question, it should be of interest to all Members of the Congress as well as to students of the canal question in various parts of the Nation. I ask unanimous consent for it to be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NATIVE SON HAS LARGE STAKE IN PANAMA CANAL PROJECT

Now, as in the early 1900's, the subject of the Panama Canal is a timely topic discussion, but while much of the conversation in this area now concerns a man from Plains, Georgia, back when the canal was first being built, much of the local conversation centered on a man from New Holstein.

The story of the canal is long and steeped in political maneuvering. The 1977 question of whether it is right or wrong to give the canal back to the Panamanian government is only the latest chapter in the political history of the Panama Canal.

Spanish explorers as early as the 16th century sought a passage through the newly discovered land masses that became known as the North Central and South Americas, but none was ever discovered. As the explorers continued to look for what they were positive must exist, the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries dragged slowly by and still no such passage was found. The explorers left their ships and came ashore in hopes that at least gold and riches could be found and in hunting the riches of ancient Indian civilizations, it was noted that certain points in Central America were very narrow and might provide the proper position to construct a man-made passageway. Spain, England, France, Holland, and finally the United States all looked into the feasibility of constructing a canal across what became known as the Isthmus.

Most of the European planning was just that, and never left the drawing tables of the men assigned to produce such plans, but with the great westward migration taking place in the United States in the mid-1800's, our governmental leaders began to take a great interest in any type of passage way that would save the time and danger experienced by ships having to round Cape Horn on sea voyages between east and west.

Still, even with the United States' great interest in the canal, much of the work being done on such a project, was largely political, treaties drawn up and about to be signed with the New Granada (what is now Colombia) government which had control of the isthmus, then not signed because of intervention by European powers, and the same type of goings on repeated again and again.

The first great expedition to actually construct a canal came into being in 1875 at the Congress of Geographical Sciences held in Paris. As a result of that gathering, a French company, the Societe Civile Internationale du Canal Interocéanique was formed and in 1876 a route was selected that would run from the Colombian cities of Colon on the west coast to Panama on the east coast.

Ferdinand de Lesseps, the French engineer who had constructed the Suez Canal, was put in charge of the project and he determined that the canal should be a sea-level ditch type canal that joined the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. He estimated that the cost of the canal from start to finish would run about $208,000,000 and after using his infectious optimism to gain financial support of many of his countrymen, gathered capital amounting to $60,000,000 and inaugurated the canal project in 1880.

Most of de Lesseps' plan was built on his great enthusiasm and reputation, however, and not on foresight, and by 1887 it was evident that his plan was not feasible. Diseases such as malaria and yellow fever took great tolls of life among the workers dispatched to the canal site, corruption among the administrators of the project ate up much of the canal funds and it became apparent that the ditch-type canal would never work. De Lesseps came up with an alternate plan of a lock-type canal, but in 1888 the French company was dissolved and a great scandal took place in France over the graft and corruption involved with the loss of funds on the project. Over $262,000,000 was spent with only about $100,000,000 actually spent on the canal. De Lesseps himself was sentenced to five years in prison, but never served the time, and other officials were likewise sentenced. Some fled the country and others took their own lives.

A new Panama Canal Company was formed by the French in 1894 and a new contract was arrived at with the Colombian government, but the United States government felt that with the past French failure behind them, they would also fail in this effort and so began to seek out their own canal route and plans.

In 1899, the U.S. Congress appointed a Canal Commission which after investigating the French route from Colon to Panama and a route through the country of Nicaragua, recommended the Nicaraguan route. The Nicaraguan route was actually thought to be more costly canal-wise than the Panamanian route, but the French still had control of the Panamanian route and there appeared to be no way the right of way there could be purchased cheaply.

While part of the U.S. politicians had satisfied themselves that the Nicaraguan route was the right move, the other half had not and new negotiations with the Colombian government began on the Colon to Panama route. In 1902 under the urging of Senator John Spooner of Wisconsin, the Spooner Act was signed, which gave the president of the United States the right to select the route he thought best.

Negotiations with the French company continued and also opened with the Colombian government, but both demanded much more than the U.S. was willing to pay.

Just what amount of subtle undercover politicking began at this point and even before, is not fully known, but residents of the Isthmus had been for some time making rumblings about a revolt against Colombia and consequently setting up their own government and country. On November 3, 1903 the revolt occurred and was successful. Colombia sent troops, via the sea to quell the uprising, but the U.S. gunboat Nashville was standing off the coast of the newly formed Republic of Panama and personnel warned the Colombians not to land. The United States took the position that a treaty signed in 1846 had entrusted them to keep transit across the isthmus open and that if the Colombian troops were allowed to land this opening may become endangered.

Meanwhile, U.S. Secretary of State Hay under direction of President Theodore Roosevelt and new Panamanian minister Philippe Bunau-Varilla began negotiations for a canal treaty and on Nov. 18, 1903 the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty was signed, turning over exclusive jurisdiction of the Canal Zone to the United States with the understanding that in turn, the United States would appropriate a sum of money to the Panama government each year and would also insure the independence of the new country.

In April and May of 1904, agreements were reached with the French government to transfer all canal plans, equipment, and other property located on the isthmus to the U.S. for the sum of $40,000,000. A later payment of $25,000,000 was made to Colombia to appease their anger over the U.S.'s part in the Panamanian independence play.

Work began on the canal in 1904 by U.S. crews, and by 1906 they had come to the same opinion that de Lesseps had arrived at near the end of his work, the ditch-type canal was not feasible, the lock-type would have to be built. It is soon after this point that Edward Schildhauer, a New Holstein native son plugged in his contribution to the success of the Panama Canal project.

Schildhauer was born in New Holstein in 1872 and was educated in the New Holstein schools, going on to the University of Wisconsin at Madison and graduating from there in 1897 with a bachelor of science degree in electrical engineering. In 1898, he entered the employ of the Edison Company (now Commonwealth Edison Co.) in Chicago and worked there, advancing in position to Assistant Electrical Engineer, until 1906 when he resigned to accept a position as an Electrical and Mechanical Engineer with the Isthmian Canal Commission in Washington, D.C. Less than a year later he was on his way to Culebra in the Canal Zone to serve there.

An excerpt from the February 1915 issue of the publication "The Wisconsin Engineer" states: "Without Edward Schildhauer the methods of manipulation of the vessels through the locks at Panama would never have approached the present state of perfection."

Schildhauer was recruited for the Canal project by Chief Engineer John Stevens, who headed engineering from 1905 to 1907, and he stayed with the Isthmian Canal Commission until 1914 when the canal was opened to traffic.

The Panama Canal, as constructed by the United States is approximately 51 miles long and provided the world with what the ancient explorers sought, a link between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, through the land masses known as the Americans.

The canal incorporates eight principal features: (1) a seven mile dredged channel running at sea level from the Atlantic Ocean to the Gatun Locks; (2) the Gatun Locks themselves, which raise or lower ships 85 feet to or from Gatun Lake; (3) a 24 mile channel through Gatun Lake to Gamboa; (4) the Gaillard Cut, an eight mile channel, 500 feet in width that slices through the continental divide; (5) the Pedro Miguel Locks, which provide a 31 foot step down or up from the Gaillard Cut; (6) a 750 foot wide mile long channel running across Miafiores Lakes; (7) the Miafiores Locks, providing a 54 foot, two-step drop or climb from the lake level; and (8) a sea-level channel, eight miles long running from the Miafiores Locks to the Pacific Ocean.

In 1907 when work was progressing on the ditching needed to form the canal in which the above mentioned features could be incorporated, Schildhauer was busy on an investigation tour. His colleagues were busy investigating new methods of housing workers and keeping the workers free from the diseases which had so decimated the French work groups, but Schildhauer was concerned with the mechanics of the project. He made an extensive tour through Europe studying canals in England, Holland, France, Belgium, and Germany.

A major consensus arrived at by Schildhauer on his travels was that a principle source of accidents in the European canals was due to the break down in communications between the vessel's pilot and engineer while moving the vessel through the canal. The result of his findings was the invention of the famed "electric mule" that moves the ships through the Panama Canal with great safety.

The electric mules were in reality electric locomotives that operate on the center and side walls of the locks. A vessel enters the lock, ties up to the center wall, which is extended beyond the side walls at both the upper and lower ends of the lock to serve as a mooring wall, then waits until the "mules" or locomotives arrive.

Locomotives on the center wall take lines from the vessel and tow it to a point where more locomotives on the side walls can also secure to the vessel. The vessel then enters the lock chamber with two locomotives towing it, one on either side, and two following to retard the vessel's forward movement once she reaches proper locking position.

The locomotives operate on tracks close to the edge of the lock walls and engage on a center cog rail. The maximum speed they were designed for by Schildhauer was two miles per hour when towing. However when finished with a tow, the locomotives would switch over to another track located further back on the lock wall and return to their starting point at a much faster speed.

The locomotives were not Schildhauer's only contribution to the canal however, as he also invented and patented the mechanism by which the lock miter gates were moved. It may be noted that these lock gates were constructed of girders weighing between 12 and 18 ton each and that the finished gates varied in height, according to location, from 47 to 82 feet in height and weighed from 300 to 700 ton per half gate. The entire locking system incorporated 92 half gates each seven feet thick.

The machinery invented by Schildhauer for opening and closing these miter gates consisted of a crank gear, to which is fastened one end of a strut or connecting rod, with the other end connected to a lock gate. The gear wheel moved 197 degrees during operation to open or close the gate with the operation taking about two minutes. Each crank gear was constructed of cast steel and measured approximately 19 feet, two inches in diameter and weighs about 35,000 pounds. The crank gear was in turn; driven through a system of gears and pinions by an electric motor mounted in a contiguous room. An operator in a central control house could easily operate the lock gates with the simple pull of a switch.

In today's modern world, all this might seem a bit mundane, but in Schildhauer's time, electricity was just being harnessed in many ways by man and such an operation as these mechanisms for moving the lock gates was marvelled at far and wide.

Schildhauer's electrical genius was not limited to the ways and means of using electrical power once it was harnessed. The New Holstein native also was instrumental in the designing and constructing of the Gatun and Miaflores power plants which supply the needed electricity to run the machinery developed for lock operation by Schildhauer and his cohorts.

The hydro-electric power plant designed by Schildhauer for Gatun Lake used the waters of the lake to power the entire assemblage of machinery for the 51 mile long canal system.

Taking waters from the lake the plant funneled the fluid through turbines, down a 75 foot spillway to charge three 2,000 kilowatt generators producing 5,000 horsepower and a reserve system of 2,500 horsepower for operation of the machinery. The second power plant designed at Miaflores was implemented as an auxiliary plant should the waters of Gatun Lake ever fail, which owing to the climatic conditions of the area which produce an abundance of rainfall each year in the tropics are not expected to ever happen.

In 1935, the United States implemented the Madden Dam and Power Project which stemmed and controlled the amount of water flowing into Gatun each year and created a large reservoir in Madden Lake to further increase the amount of electric power available if needed.

When the first vessels moved through the canal on August 15, 1914, Edward Schildhauer was there to witness the events and handle some of the electrical controls that handle some of the electrical controls that he had supervised the installation of in one central operating plant. His achievements in electrical engineering for the canal go hand in hand with the medical advancements and the geographical engineering accomplishments that allowed the canal to come into being and allowed the United States to succeed where the French had failed.

Today, ships using the Panama Canal transport in the neighborhood of 150,000,000 tons of material through the interoceanic channel each year.

The future of the canal is in question right now, both as far as ownership and as far as existence. Proponents of a new canal project, thought to be necessitated by the ever increasing size of the oceanic liners and armed forces carriers have recommended building a new canal on several different sites in Central America over the past decade, but nothing has come of any of the plans. Some plans brought forth were for lock-type canals such as the Panama Canal and other proposals favored the sea level ditch advocated by the French.

The inventor of many of the canal's electrical systems died in California in 1952. He had left the Isthmian Commission in 1914, shortly after the canal opened and moved on to other pursuits. He retired in California in 1931 and lived there until his death.

Schildhauer's niece, Mrs. Sabina Paul still lives in New Holstein and she states that she doesn't really know what her uncle would have to say about the present politicking going on in regard to the ownership of the Panama Canal, but adds, "like many of the rest of us, he'd probably be spouting."

OPPOSING SENATORIAL VIEWPOINTS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Senate debate on the proposed Panama Canal treaties is expected to get underway soon. The distinguished majority leader of the Senate has already urged the chairmen of the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees to clear the treaties for floor debate by early February. This means that Members of the Senate have less than 30 days in which to prepare themselves for one of the most significant debates in this country.

It is important, therefore, that Senators become thoroughly knowledgeable about this issue as quickly as possible. To this end, I invite the Members attention to the extensive hearings that have been held by the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Two volumes of testimony have already been published, and publication of a third is expected in January. Although these hearings deal principally with the constitutional question of whether the President of the United States has the authority to dispose of American property and territory by treaty, without the approval of both Houses of Congress, a number of other salient issues concerning the treaties are addressed by the witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee.

In addition, the chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen), has given a series of penetrating, highly informative addresses on various aspects of the canal question. These addresses, delivered between September 12, 1977 and November 8, 1977, have been assembled as two sets of documents and are available upon request at his office.

Mr. President, the latest contributions to the cumulating literature on the Panama Canal treaties are two articles by two distinguished Members of the Senate in the December 1977 issue of "The Retired Officer," the monthly magazine of the Retired Officers Association of Washington, D.C. The membership of this prominent organization, which totals some 250,000 retired military officers from all of the States, includes many officers who served on the Isthmus, either with the Armed Services or the Panama Canal organization. They represent a highly informed body of opinion concerning the merits of these treaties, having had the benefit of personal observation of the many problems involved in the maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the Panama Canal in both peace and war.

The case for rejection of the treaties is presented by Senator Strom Thurmond, a recognized authority on the problems of national defense who has also been a careful student of the Isthmian question for many years.

The case for acceptance of the treaties is presented by the late Senator from Minnesota (Mr. Humphrey), who was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations that has been conducting some of the hearings on the proposed treaties.

One particular aspect of the articles upon which I wish to comment is the apparent assumption that the Panama Canal still operates solely under the 1903 treaty. This, of course, is not entirely accurate. The canal operates under the 1903 treaty as amended and reaffirmed in the 1936 and 1955 treaties. Likewise, it should be noted that major modernization of the canal is authorized under the "maintenance" factor of existing treaty provisions for "expansion and new construction."

Mr. President, these articles are instructive, because they highlight the major points of the Panama Canal controversy and offer startling contrasts in opposing points of view. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—SHOULD THE UNITED STATES RATIFY THEM?

THE CASE FOR REJECTION BY SENATOR STROM THURMOND

Thirteen years of negotiations with the Republic of Panama have reached their expected—and feared—conclusion. President Carter is asking the Senate to ratify a treaty giving Panama jurisdiction over the Panama Canal Zone immediately, and control of the Canal in the year 2000.

The case for rejecting the proposed treaty, and the supplementary treaty on the neutrality of the Canal, begins with one crucial point: The Panama Canal is United States property, and the Canal Zone is United States territory. According to the terms of the 1903 treaty with Panama, we acquired sovereign rights over the Canal Zone "in perpetuity." The Supreme Court upheld our exercise of sovereignty in 1907 in the case Wilson v. Shaw. Moreover, the maps of the world all show the Canal Zone as part of the United States.

Burden of proof

Thus, it is clear that the Burden of proof rests on those who favor the treaties; those who oppose them are merely standing up for American rights. Proponents must show that it is in the national interest to dispose of American property which, in addition to its strategic and economic value, represents a cumulative investment of roughly $7 billion.

To do this, they have advanced arguments which, far from supporting their case, can actually be turned against it. On August 14, the chief negotiator of the treaty, Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, stated that the basic purpose of the treaty was "to assure that the Canal is kept open, run efficiently, open to ships of all nations without discrimination."

An open Canal, operated efficiently and without discrimination—that is a worthy objective. It is an objective, however, that American control is already meeting.

That is the kind of Canal we have now. The likelihood is that Panamanian control would reduce rather than strengthen the chances of keeping it that way.

Panama is a weak, unstable, and impoverished country. Its current chief executive, the 59th in 74 years, is General Omar Torrijos a dictator who has openly flirted with Castro and the Soviet Union and has increased the national debt from $167 million to $1.5 billion during his tenure of office. It is hard to have any confidence in his ability, or his willingness, to work with the United States in running the Canal.

Interruption in our use of the Canal would do serious damage both to national security and to our economy. Four former Chiefs of Naval Operations recently wrote President Carter that "loss of the Panama Canal * * * would contribute to the encirclement of the U.S. by hostile navy forces, and threaten our ability to survive." At the very least, the separate neutrality treaty would force us to give access to the Canal to nations at war with us or with our allies.

Our economic interests

Our economic interest is also great. In 1975, 45 percent of the ships that passed through the Canal were coming from the United States, and 23 percent were bound for the United States. Moreover, Alaskan oil may soon produce even greater traffic. On whom would we be wiser to depend to see that this commerce is maintained—ourselves, or the Republic of Panama?

State Department officials are making ominous predictions about what will happen in Panama if the treaty is not ratified. Some have openly speculated about possible sabotage or guerilla warfare. Such statements on the parts of American officials are highly irresponsible. Their prophecy may be self-fulfilling.

It was equally irresponsible of President Carter to turn the signing ceremony into a public relations extravaganza. The President knows full well that the treaties have no force whatsoever unless ratified by the Senate. Yet he chose to treat the signing ceremony as the completion of the process, as an occasion for celebration and self-congratulation, and thus raised expectations in Latin America to an unrealistic level.

There is no way of knowing what will happen in Panama if the treaty is not ratified. On a recent trip to Panama, though, I learned that there is still considerable pro-American feeling in the country. In 1976, the United States infused $108 million into the Panamanian economy in wages to non-American citizens, another $39 million in expenditures by government employees, and another $29 million in purchases of Panamanian goods.

As for the future, modernization of the Canal, projected by our planners at a cost of $2.5 billion, offers the prospect of an economic bonanza. Adjustment of the present annuity and cession of surplus land within the Canal Zone would also help to extinguish smoldering discontent.

We must remember, too, that sabotage would harm Panama more than it would the United States. It is hardly conceivable that the Panamanian government would willfully destroy its greatest economic asset. Rebels or terrorists might make an attempt, but there would be an equal possibility of this if the Canal were transferred to Panamanian control.

Prognostications about the future, however, are beside the point. The Canal Zone is United States territory. The Canal belongs to the American people. To surrender them under the threat of violence would be to yield to blackmail. Would we give up Alaska to the Russians if they were suddenly to demand it? Such weakness is entirely contrary to our national character and heritage.

There are those who counsel generosity in our dealings with Panama. We must distinguish, though, between Panama and General Torrijos. This man has just signed a friendship and commercial pact with the Soviet Union. He has countenanced eleven violations of the present treaty in the last two years.

Conclusion

Finally, and perhaps most significantly, he has eliminated all civil and political liberties in his country. If we truly value the friendship of the Panamanian people, we will do nothing to legitimize the regime of their dictator, let alone award him the triumph of concluding this treaty.

The American people reject the barren reasoning of their diplomatic representatives. In the most recently published national opinion poll, they expressed their opposition to giving away the Canal by a margin of two to one. In a poll of South Carolinians which I took myself, the margin was nine to one. The Senate must heed this united voice.

The Panama Canal now stands as a monument to American foresight, ingenuity, and perseverance. Let us not, by entering into the proposed treaties, make it a monument to American folly.

THE CASE FOR ACCEPTANCE

(By Senator Hubert H. Humphrey)

The fundamental goal of the foreign policy of the United States is the promotion and preservation of the basic security, economic and political interests of our nation. The essential tools for achieving and maintaining these goals are the use of diplomacy and the treaty-making powers of the President (with the advice and consent of the Senate). These are tools which we utilize to prevent our basic interests from being placed in jeopardy now and at some future time. Therefore, diplomacy is the mechanism upon which we rely to avoid the necessity to use force—we use force only as a last resort—when our diplomatic efforts have been to no avail.

In essence, this is the primary issue involved in our consideration of the new Panama Canal Treaties. There are only two basic questions which the Senate of the United States must address in considering the utility of the new treaties. First, what are the interests of the United States in the Panama Canal? Second, do the new treaties more adequately protect these interests than does the present arrangement with the Republic of Panama? All other issues, including the question of sovereignty, negotiations with a dictator, and the ideological make-up of the Panamanian government, are irrelevant to the task before the Senate.

U.S. interest in the Panama Canal

Our interest in the Panama Canal is the continued access, efficient operation, neutrality, and security of this vital waterway. Our interest is nothing more and nothing less.

How best to protect this interest

Diplomacy involves the art of negotiating instruments or mechanisms, relevant to a present day setting, which seek to promote and protect basic national concerns by achieving mutuality of interests between nations. However, the real test is whether or not the level of consent achieved by diplomatic efforts to insure this mutuality of interest stands a good chance of enduring throughout the time period of the treaty.

The 1903 Treaty, relying upon the mechanism of sovereign-like rights in perpetuity to protect our interests in the Canal, has long been an unworkable mechanism in our relationship with the Republic of Panama. As a result, the very interests this mechanism was designed to protect are now jeopardized because we lack the primary element of any treaty relationship—mutual consent. When consent is gone, any agreement is, in fact, abrogated.

Thus, the 1903 Treaty no longer achieves the fundamental foreign policy goal of our nation. In fact, the existing treaty places our economics, political and security interests in the Canal in jeopardy. It naturally follows, then, that in order for our fundamental foreign policy goal to be achieved, we must employ the basic diplomatic tools at our disposal and negotiate a new treaty relationship which not only achieves mutual consent but also preserves our basic interests.

In my estimation, the new Panama Canal treaties meet this test. We have negotiated a treaty relationship in which the essential element of mutual consent has been achieved. We have employed the mechanism of joint partnership with the Panamanians, a modern-day relationship similar to agreements with our allies throughout the world, to better protect our only interest in the canal—the continued access, efficient operation, neutrality, and security of this vital waterway.

Under the new treaty, nothing will significantly change from the present circumstances for the management and defense of the Canal throughout the remainder of the century. The United States will continue to control operation of the Canal, and the United States military forces will continue to provide for the defense of the Canal from within Panamanian territory.

In addition, under the Neutrality Treaty, our basic interests are more than adequately protected in perpetuity, including the provision for maintaining the security of the Canal.

Yet, we have achieved more with these new treaties than just protecting our basic interests. Under the new treaties, the United States is granted the exclusive right to construct an interoceanic sea-level canal through Panama. Under the 1903 Treaty, it is debateable whether or not we enjoy this right. Under the 1903 Treaty, there is no assurance that the Soviet Union, or any other nation with the capacity to do so, could not construct and control a sea-level canal if the Panamanian government were disposed to grant this right. The new Treaty clearly spells out the exclusivity of the right of the United States.

Not only do we have the exclusive right to construct a new canal, but we also retain the same neutrality and defense rights we enjoy under the new treaty relationship with the Republic with respect to the existing canal. These include the responsibility to protect and defend the canal proper, and the right of "expeditious passage" of our warships during times of emergency.

It is obvious that if there is to be a sea-level canal through Central America, Panama is the only logical site. This was emphasized in the Atlantic-Pacific Inter-oceanic Canal Study Committee recommendation of December 1, 1970, that selected Panama as the preferred site for a sea-level canal. This recommendation came after six years of technical study and review.

Furthermore, under Article V of the Neutrality Treaty, Panama relinquished all rights to invite or accept foreign military forces to make available installations for foreign military forces anywhere in the territory of the Republic. Under the 1903 Treaty, there is nothing to prevent the Soviets, or the Cubans, or any other nation from stationing troops in Panama if invited to do so by the Panamanian government.

Considerable debate has focused on the issues of expeditious passage of U.S. warships and the right of the United States to defend the Canal beyond the year 2000. I believe the Neutrality Treaty more than adequately protects U.S. interests in these two matters. The Panamanians have clearly spelled out, as has our government, what our rights are.

Under the Neutrality Treaty, Panama and the United States have the responsibility for insuring that the Canal will remain secure and open to ships of all nations. Article LV relates only to the direct defense of the Canal installations, and the scope of this right does not extend to intervention within the Republic of Panama.

The right of "expeditious passage" of U.S. warships under Article VI of the Neutrality Treaty has also been clarified in a joint statement released by President Carter and General Omar Torrijos of Panama. Expeditious passage is defined as quick transit, without obstacles, and with the least possible processing. However, in the event of an emergency or necessity, "expeditious passage" would permit the warships of both nations to go to the head of the line of ships awaiting transit. Since the Republic of Panama does not have a navy, the U.S. should not be concerned over which nation's warships would move through the Canal first.

Conclusion

Clearly, no international relationship negotiated more than 70 years ago can be expected to last forever without adjustment. In sum, the new treaties, which establish a relationship of shared responsibility and benefit, increase Panama's stake in safeguarding the very interests we ourselves wish to assure.

Panama and her Latin American neighbors long have been dissatisfied with the 1903 Treaty. This declining level of consent transcends any one government and now encompasses Panamanians of all strata.

The U.S. image and its leadership ability are under careful scrutiny around the world. This image can only be enhanced by the abrogation of the 1903 Treaty, which is viewed abroad as one-sided and anachronistic, a holdover from a colonial era which other nations have discarded.

The ability of the United States to work through this emotion-fraught issue at home through the process of Senate deliberation on giving its advice and consent to ratification of the treaties will be viewed by friend and foe alike as a sign that we can make necessary accommodations to a changing world.

Perhaps former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger best summed up the diplomatic achievement of the new treaties when he testified during Foreign Relations Committee hearings on this matter. He stated:

"The question, therefore, is which arrangement puts us in the best legal, political, and military position to protect our rights and interests if we are forced to do so by the unilateral action of Panama. I believe the new treaties will significantly reduce the risks of abrogation, and will also create far better conditions in which we could defend our rights if abrogation should occur."

In capsule form, this analysis demonstrates how we achieve, through basic diplomatic tools at our disposal, the fundamental goal of U.S. foreign policy—the promotion and preservation of the basic security, economic, and political interests of our nation. The new Panama Canal treaties enhance our ability to avoid the use of force as the alternative—the only alternative we might have if we continue to insist on maintaining the status quo or making cosmetic changes in our existing relationship.

THE PANAMA CANAL QUESTION

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, when faced with the possibility of voting for or against the proposed Panama Canal treaties, I found that neither vote satisfied an analysis of the modern situation in Panama or in Latin America.

My main concern is that the treaties are bilateral, thus it only takes one party to break them. In such a situation, the nations of the hemisphere can have no real guarantee of nondiscriminatory rates and use nor can there be a guarantee that our actions in "defense" of the canal will have the sanction of the rest of the hemisphere.

Faced with this dilemma and other basic problems with the treaties as proposed, I have worked with several individuals who are experts in international institutional arrangements. We wished to see if the "Intelsat" system of international management could be modified to be applied to the hemispheric management and defense of the Panama Canal. We believe that it can be applied. I hope my Senate colleagues will agree.

I request unanimous consent that the remainder of my remarks describing a hemispheric management concept called "Intersea" be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

INTERSEA: AN ANSWER TO THE PANAMA CANAL QUESTION

The question of the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties presents one of the most complex technical, international and political questions of our time. Unfortunately, after fourteen years of negotiations, we find ourselves in a situation where neither ratification nor rejection of the treaties are acceptable answers. This situation is not the fault of anyone; it is the fault of history and our times.

The construction of the canal was the moon landing project of my father's generation. It caught the imagination and motivation of the country and much of the world just as did the Apollo Project of the 1960's.

The canal began, as did Apollo, with a presidential initiative in response to an international challenge to American technology and pride. It was built successfully only when the best developed new technology of the age, the technology of rail transportation, was applied through vigorous and innovative management efforts. Apollo was successful half a century later because of a similar use of air transportation technology.

On top of the base of railroad technologies was built the new technologies of advanced steel manufacturing, steel construction, electrical power utilization and remote control. This scenario was replayed by Apollo upon the base of aeronautical technologies with the development of new technologies in materials, electronics, communications and in energy and environmental systems.

The control of a hostile environment was essential for the building of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama just as it was essential to the movement of men through space. In the control of yellow fever and malaria in the jungles of Panama, as with the protection of human life, in space, medical science and mankind have benefited beyond any expectations.

The sheer scale and cost of building the canal was comparable to Apollo; 262 million cubic yards of earth were moved at a cost (in 1910 dollars) of about $650 million by a work force that probably totaled several hundred thousand people. Apollo's effort was measured in different terms—6.5 million pound space vehicles, a cost (in 1965 dollars) of about $22 billion, and about 400,000 workers—but clearly the two projects were in the same league.

The most critical element in the construction of an American canal in Panama, as in landing men on the moon, was the motivation of young Americans who believed that it should be done. They believed that nothing they could do with their lives would be more worthwhile or more rewarding. It is that motivation, when generated, that literally moves mountains and conquers other worlds.

Today, among most Americans, we find a personal and emotional involvement in the Panama Canal issue that seems to defy any quantitative explanation. In addition to hearing about its role in the lives of our fathers or grandfathers, most Americans have some direct or indirect attachment to the canal. It may have been childhood history books, civil or military service by a member of the family, a vacation, a Christmas card, or stamp collection that implanted the image of an "American canal in Panama."

Many other Americans, old and young, are just not satisfied with the national security and foreign policies of the United States over the last several decades. They feel we have backed down too often without considering what may be best for the long-term interests of Americans or the people of other nations.

Ratification of the treaties is not acceptable politically to a majority of Americans. Nor is it clear that the implementation of the ratified treaties will guarantee to all users an acceptable and equitable operation of the canal in perpetuity.

At the same time, rejection of the treaties is clearly unacceptable nationally and economically to a majority of Panamanians. Rejection also would ignore the political realities of radical opposition faced by most Latin American leaders. Most critically, the times are moving against the propriety of the unilateral control of territory or technology of international usefulness, such as an international waterway between oceans.

In the face of this dilemma, a new answer must be found. There are new currents in the world with respect to material, territorial or technological resources which have international significance. The unavoidable inertia of fourteen years of negotiations to change the 1903 Panama Canal treaties have frozen out consideration of these new currents. If we are to find a better answer than the treaties, we must now be willing to ride with such currents.

In searching for an alternative to the proposed treaties, it appears that there are many analogies between the international utility of the Panama Canal and the international utility of global communication satellites. Foremost among these analogies is a clearly definable international need for continuous and equitable operation in the interest of all nations.

The political and technical management of a global communication satellite system, as manifested by the INTELSAT Organization, is a unique new entry into the international scene. It is an organization that developed because of a coincidence of new technology and obvious international need. To the everlasting credit of the United States, we perceived this coincidence and guided the gradual trial and error development of INTELSAT. To the everlasting credit of the INTELSAT Organization, it has become an example of international cooperation that is not only remarkably successful, but is both utilitarian and profitable.

"Could this INTELSAT model of international cooperation be applied to the Panama Canal?" was the question I posed to Dr. Delbert Smith, a specialist in international law and international institutional arrangements. Not only was his answer yes, he formulated a theoretical framework using the INTELSAT experience as a basis for an "INTERSEA Organization." Dr. Smith has used this framework to create an internally consistent draft agreement which could be implemented immediately once signed by appropriate parties.

INTERSEA goes beyond INTELSAT in that it also incorporates modern trends toward regionalism by matching Western Hemisphere control of the canal with international users' participation in operational decisions. This is clearly more desirable than other proposals for international control which would have the well-known disadvantages of undue influence by those with the least definable contribution to make to the success of the enterprise.

It is my belief that INTERSEA would satisfy the most significant national and economic interests of the United States, the Republic of Panama, all of Latin America, and the user nations of the world. Most importantly, it would bring into the management and defense of the canal those nations with the greatest interest in insuring the successful implementation of that management and defense.

The INTERSEA concept is a concept of the space age and of an age of growing awareness of certain common international resources on this spaceship Earth. INTERSEA does not require that territorial sovereignty be given up, rather it requires that territorial sovereignty be shared.

THE INTERSEA ORGANIZATION¹

It is my strong belief that it is necessary to develop a plan for Western Hemisphere control of the Panama interoceanic canal. To this end, I propose INTERSEA, a regional organization. In setting forth the basis of its organization, its advantages, and a model of its institutional structure, mandate and powers, I considered the need for an institutional development adequate for the twenty-first century, a development taking into consideration both the common heritage of mankind and various national interests. In creating the INTERSEA proposal several examples of international cooperation were examined, including INTELSAT, the Outer Space Treaty and the Moon Treaty.

Since the Panama Canal runs through the center of the western hemisphere, all of the hemisphere's countries have an interest in the existence and use of the canal. There are also hemispheric political interests. INTERSEA would insure that the Panama Canal remains secure and neutral.

Since the opening of the canal, it has been operated by the United States as a "public service" for the nations of the world. It has become apparent that to turn the canal over to another individual country now would not be in the best interests of western hemisphere nations. The United States has a major interest in the canal because some 70 percent of the shipping through the canal is bound for American ports, carrying cargo that amounts to one percent of our gross national product. Other nations, including Panama and Colombia, have even greater proportionate economic interests in the continued operation of the canal.

One of the issues which must be resolved is maintenance of permanent neutrality for the Canal Zone. Severe questions arise over whether Panama or any nation would be interested in maintaining this neutrality and in maintaining expeditious transit of United States naval vessel when necessary.

In the draft agreement which would create INTERSEA, the United States is given a clear mandate to be the principal defender of the canal in order to insure that the canal remains neutral and open. To this end, the United States is assured of rights necessary to defense, including the right of priority transit by its warships.

BASIS FOR INTERSEA CONCEPT

Technological advancements have produced a trend towards realization of a "common heritage of mankind" in certain international resources. This trend is most apparent in negotiations regarding the resources of the seas and outer space. It indicates a general realization that nations have common interests in sharing benefits from the exploitation and environmentally sound use of these resources.

Recognizing that the Panama Canal has become a common heritage resource for western hemisphere nations, an institutional arrangement should be possible which would vest operation and control of this resource in a regional organization composed of the nations of the Americas. Regionalism—the grouping of nations by a common bond of policy and limited purposes—has been recognized for some time as a valid principle. Operation and control of the canal might be effectively accomplished by transfer of the Canal Zone to a regional organization rather than allowing it to remain unilaterally controlled by any single nation.

ADVANTAGES OF REGIONAL ORGANIZATION

The advantages of sharing sovereignty are clear in several ways. First, the current and potentially disastrous discontent over which nation should exert control over the Canal Zone could be alleviated.

Second, the provisions regarding United States rights to defend the canal could be better preserved in a regional organization than through bilateral understandings. These provisions include the right to assure through military force the openness and neutrality of the canal and the right for American warships to have expeditious transit. There was sufficient question on these provisions in the treaties now before the United States Senate to require a Presidential Statement of Understanding for clarity. Creation of a regional organization could render such a statement unnecessary.

Third, an analysis reveals that a regional organization may prove to be the best arrangement to accommodate the various national interests in the canal. This includes those of the users of the canal, the sovereign exercising jurisdiction over the canal (presently the United States), the operator of the canal (presently the United States), the nation surrounding the Canal Zone (the Republic of Panama), and nations having strategic defense interests. There is no guarantee that all these interests will be or can be considered when the canal is unilaterally controlled. However, creation of INTERSEA would institutionalize access and influence in an organization legally empowered to operate and control the canal. It would be in the clear self-interest of all hemisphere nations to make such an organization work.

Fourth, the operational goals of the canal would be best assured through management by a regional organization. Three of these goals are (1) assuring free access and unimpeded passage through the canal; (2) maintaining a reasonable and uniform rate structure bearing a realistic relationship to the value derived from use, while considering operating expenses and return on investment; and (3) assuring administrative stability over a long period of time. Two other important goals could be better accomplished in a regional organization, namely effective maintenance and operation of the canal and continued expansion, improvement and development of the canal and related facilities, such as railroad lines for containerized transverse of the isthmus and pipelines for passage of oil between supertankers which are too large for the canal. INTERSEA, with its broad base of member nations, could assure that these goals are consistently met and capitalized.

Fifth, INTERSEA would provide the forum for rational planning of future canals located in Panama or in other nations. Based on the assumption that all the nations of the Americas are represented and pledged to cooperate in the organization, future canals would be created only if necessary, and then in order to meet used demand rather than for other tangential purposes such as political influence, profit or strategic advancement.

Finally, formulation of a regional organization may improve the friendship and unity of the nations of the western hemisphere by providing dynamic regional cooperation resulting in quality service which benefits.

MANAGEMENT OF INTERSEA

The conceptual advantages of a regional organization will only be realized if the actual institutional structure is designed to provide an equitable system for the various interests to exert influence and control as well as to provide for efficient and proper management of the canal.

There are two distinct bases for nations to be involved in INTERSEA. The first relates to operation of the canal and has a geographical basis centered in the western hemisphere. The second relates to use and the terms and conditions for use, and this is world-wide in scope. The United States clearly has both bases for involvement.

To provide the first basis of national involvement, the proposed INTERSEA Preamble states:

"Use occupation and control of this Hemispheric Waterway should vest in an organization whose membership is composed of the nations of the Americas and that this organization should assume the rights, power and authority from the United States which is necessary and proper to effectuate the principles set forth herein."

The degree of representation in INTERSEA by each western hemisphere nation depends on usage of the canal. Each member's interest in INTERSEA will equal the amount of its "usage share" which is initially established and periodically reviewed. The usage share determines the number of votes each member has within INTERSEA.

Figure One illustrates the relationship between the member nations in terms of usage shares. It was created based on the assumption that the flag flown by a vessel is used to determine which nation to credit for its passage and that the number of transits per year is the proper criterion to determine use. Figure One is based on Fiscal Year 1976 statistics for commercial shipping. The multilateral agreement which would create INTERSEA provides that there shall be minimum and maximum usage share levels in order to insure at least minimal representation of all interested nations.

The second basis of national involvement is provided by the creation of a special body within INTERSEA, composed of world-wide user nations. There exists practical difficulty in defining user nations due to the practice of "flags of convenience" where vessels owned by entities from one nation fly the flag of a second nation because of tax, operational or other advantages. One of the priority tasks of this body would be to consider the flag of convenience question.

A greater appreciation of the relationship between western hemisphere nations and user nations within INTERSEA comes from a look at the organizational structure. The diagram in Figure Two depicts this basic structure.

² Total transits by all user nations were: fiscal year 1976, 12,157; fiscal year 1975, 13,609 and fiscal year 1974, 14,033.

The main bodies within INTERSEA are the Assembly of Parties, the Board of Governors, the Board of Users and the Director General and staff. As shown in Figure Two, all the western hemisphere nations exert authority over the Assembly of Parties, Board of Governors and the Director General. In addition, those western hemisphere nations which are users exert authority within the Board of Users. Non-western hemispheric user nations exert authority within the Board of Users which, in turn, is represented within the Board of Governors.

The primary function of the Assembly of Parties is to make major policy provision for carrying out INTERSEA activities, the objective of which is described in the proposed agreement as follows:

"INTERSEA shall have as its prime objective the provision, on a commercial not-for-profit basis, of interoceanic canal facilities and services of high, functional quality and reliability to be available on an open and non-discriminatory basis to all vessels, whether civilian or military, of the world, As an adjunct to this prime objective, INTERSEA shall insure the interoceanic canal's neutrality and security, and in addition, provide a mechanism and forum for resolution of disputes regarding the subject matter of this agreement."

The Assembly of Parties has specific mandates under the agreement to effectuate specific objectives, including:

1. to create general policy and long-term objectives;
2. to enter into a Security Agreement with the United States for protection of the canal and to establish a Defense Board which would include other hemisphere nations;
3. to establish general rules concerning the establishment and adjustment of the rates of charge for utilization of the canal on a non-discriminatory basis;
4. to consider complaints submitted to it by nations, international organizations and users;
5. to maintain a body of laws, rules, procedures and instructions to deal with dispute settlements; and

6. to negotiate equitable financial arrangements with host countries such as Panama.

The Assembly of Parties is composed of one representative from each member nation. Decisions on all matters are to be taken by a three-quarters majority.

A second vote technique is incorporated in the procedural rules of the Assembly of Parties. Decisions on all matters brought to a second vote are to be taken by a three-quarters majority of the votes cast when each representative casts the number of votes which are proportional to his nation's usage share. A second vote can be demanded by any representative, thereby insuring that the significant interest of major users are protected. This second vote is taken only after a decision is approved by the first vote where each nation is allowed a single vote. The effect is the same as if the Assembly of Parties was a bicameral body, with one unit based on equality of nations and the second based on usage.

The defense of the canal is primarily provided by the United States, but can be augmented by other nations. There shall be a Security Agreement between INTERSEA (specifically, the Assembly of Parties) and the United States which details the mandate given to the United States for protection of the canal. Other hemisphere nations may join in this with the approval of the Assembly of Parties. The Assembly of Parties shall establish a Defense Board which will serve to coordinate the security efforts of the parties to the Security Agreement.

The Board of Governors has the responsibility for the operation and maintenance of the canal, for design, development, construction, establishment, operation and maintenance of any canal improvements, and for carrying out any other activities which are undertaken by INTERSEA. These activities probably would be accomplished through contract with the United States or an institution growing out of the present Panama Canal Company.

Some of the specific duties of the Board of Governors are:

1. adoption of policies, plans and programs in connection with operation and maintenance as well as appropriate improvements;
2. creation of annual budgets and budget implementation;
3. periodic establishment of the rates of charge for utilization of the canal in accordance with the general rules established by the Assembly of Parties;
4. solicitation of capital;
5. appointment and removal from office of the Director General and approval of senior staff appointments; and
6. arrangement of contracts with a nation or nations or institution for the performance of the operation and maintenance functions of the canal and other facilities of INTERSEA.

The Board of Governors is composed of approximately fifteen members, consisting of one Governor representing the United States, one representing the host country (The Republic of Panama), one representing the Board of Users, and the remainder representing other nations or pairs of nations which qualify on a formula based on use. The relationships between and voting participation of the Governors would be defined by the Assembly of Parties. Figure Three illustrates what such relationships and voting participation could be. It should be noted, however, that Figure Three is intended only for purposes of illustration and does not constitute a recommendation.

The Governors shall endeavor to make all decisions by unanimous vote, but if that is not possible, they each shall participate equal to the usage share of their respective nations. A three-quarters majority of the total voting participation is necessary for substantive decisions while a simple majority is necessary for procedural decisions. The Governor representing the Board of Users has a voting participation equal to that of the Governor with the lowest voting participation.

The Board of Users is established under the auspices of INTERSEA with the duty to advise INTERSEA on matters of policy affecting the canal's operation, administration and maintenance as well as present advice with regard to policy alternatives for plans for the canal's future. Initially, all user nations will be invited by INTERSEA to a charter conference during which the organizational structure of the Board of Users and an agreement will be established. The Board of Users will then receive staff support and funding from INTERSEA and will be represented on the Board of Governors.

The executive body of staff of INTERSEA would be headed by the Director General. Among his specific duties are:

1. to be the legal representative of INTERSEA and responsible for all administrative and management functions;
2. to contract out, on behalf of INTERSEA, to one or more competent entities technical and operational functions to the maximum extent practicable with due regard to cost and consistent with competence, effectiveness and efficiency. It should be noted that such entities may be, according to the agreement, composed of various nationalities or may be an international corporation owned and controlled by INTERSEA; and

3. to serve as negotiator on behalf of INTERSEA.

The proposed agreement also provides for the establishment of a dispute settlement system on two levels. The first is an arbitration system for disputes by member nations among themselves or with INTERSEA, and the second is a judicial tribunal with jurisdiction over all other disputes arising as a result of the operation and maintenance of the canal. This tribunal would serve as the final court of appeals for the judicial system within the Canal Zone, using a code of criminal and civil law based on the existing Canal Zone and modified when appropriate by the Assembly of Parties.

RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF MEMBER NATIONS

The proposed agreement makes several declarations relative to the rights and obligations of the member nations. With reference to construction of other interoceanic canals in Central America, the member nations agree to refrain from establishing any such canals unless it is done jointly with INTERSEA.

With reference to the neutrality of the canal, the agreement provides that the canal shall be neutral in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of equality so that there shall be no discrimination. Thus, the canal will not be a target of reprisals in any armed conflict. Transit, however, is subject to several requirements which are consistent with neutrality, including:

1. payment of tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services, provided they have been fixed uniformly by class;

2. compliance with applicable rules and regulations, provided such rules and regulations are applied uniformly;

3. military vessels of member nations shall be afforded priority transit in a conflict between a member and non-member nation;

4. the requirement that transiting vessels commit no acts of hostility while in the Canal Zone; and

5. vessels of war shall at all times be entitled to transit the canal, irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination or armament, without being subjected, as a condition of transit, to inspection, search or surveillance. However, such vessels may be required to certify that they have complied with all applicable health, sanitation and quarantine regulations. In addition, such vessels shall be entitled to refuse to disclose their internal operation, origin, armament, cargo or destination.

CONCLUSION

The proposed INTERSEA agreement could be implemented in stages. The initial step would be ratification. Subsequent stages would provide for the continued successful and non-discriminatory operation of the canal, defense of the canal, structure of the Board of Users, financial arrangements with the host country, an expanded role for Panama in the operation of the canal and possible new ventures.

There would also be several subsidiary agreements created in conjunction with the basic INTERSEA agreement including detailed definitions and rules. A host country agreement and protocol would govern the diplomatic privileges, exemptions and immunities of the various INTERSEA representatives, Governors, judicial officials, staff and related officials with regard to their activities within the host country.

INTERSEA would provide management of the canal by a regional organization for the benefit of all hemispheric nations. INTERSEA recognizes the canal as an international resource with the common heritage of all nations. It provides for all users of the canal to have representation in decisions affecting its use, defense and expansion. INTERSEA is a model organization tailored to perform this management function through a sharing of sovereignty rather than unilateral control by any nation.

Implementation of INTERSEA would serve as a viable answer to one of the most complex technical, international and political questions of our time, the question of the future of the Panama Canal.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, those who favor ratification of the proposed Panama Canal treaties have maintained that control of the canal must be relinquished in the name of "fairness," that our past dealings with Panama have been less than just, and that, through these treaties, we will be ridding ourselves of an embarrassing colonial enclave, thus elevating our standing in world opinion.

This position is, of course, riddled with inaccuracies, but what I find particularly astonishing is the way these same people, who so glibly use words like "justice" and "human rights," overlook the injustices inherent in the causes they advocate. Has it occurred to none of the supporters of this hastily prepared version of a treaty agreement, that several very real violations of "human rights" will automatically occur if the agreement is ratified? Do the rights of the Canal Zone residents and employees, whose homes and jobs are seriously threatened by the proposed treaties, deserve to be considered? Should we be at all concerned about the Panamanian citizens and exiles whose will is not reflected in the actions of a dictator—a man whose regime we would be funding under this agreement? Treaty advocates apparently do not find it convenient to address themselves to questions like these.

A thoughtful article appearing in the November 7 issue of the New Leader magazine deals with yet another group of people whose lives will be seriously disrupted if the treaties are ratified. These are West Indian blacks, originally imported by the French to assist in the construction of the canal, and who now comprise a work force of 15,000 Canal Zone employees. They have never been assimilated into either the Panamanian or American communities, and stand to lose their livelihood should the United States abandon control of the canal, a project to which they made a significant contribution.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks, and commend it to my colleagues as yet another example of a group of people whose rights are being overlooked in the treaty proponents' bid to be "fair."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THREATENED BY THE TREATY PANAMA'S BLACKS: A U.S. RESPONSIBILITY

(By Steve C. Ropp, associate professor of government of New Mexico State)

Nearly every big power retrenchment of the past 30 years has brought with it a "refugee" problem. Not only must new jobs and homes be found for the displaced citizens of the disengaging nation, but there is also frequently a community that, because it served the departing country, finds itself unwanted or endangered. In the case of Vietnam, for instance, the United States has so far rightly provided a haven to some 145,000 South Vietnamese fleeing from the wrath of the victorious Communists.

The pending Panama Canal treaty involves a roughly analogous situation. For although the U.S. is now preparing to withdraw from Panama, while there it benefitted from the labors of a group that will fall to the tender mercies of General Omar Torrijos Herrera's regime if Washington does not offer it adequate protection. These people are the estimated 15,000 black employees—all nominally Panamanian citizens—of the U.S. government in the Canal Zone. But their plight lacks the high drama of retaliation for wartime cooperation. Indeed, few people in this country are at all aware of their precarious position.

The black's current predicament is rooted in the history of railway and canal construction on the Isthmus of Panama. In 1849, when some New York entrepreneurs decided to build a railroad there to expedite travel to the California gold fields, they imported about 2,000 Jamaican workers, who were more resistant to the ravages of malaria and yellow fever than their Chinese and Irish counterparts.

During the late 19th century, France, under the direction of Ferdinand de Lesseps, attempted to repeat its magnificent Suez performance across the swampy Panamanian isthmus. But health conditions were much worse than in the Middle East, prompting French to follow the earlier American example and hire blacks from Jamaica, Barbados and the smaller Caribbean islands. Thus when the United States picked up where the French had left off, it inherited equipment, a partially completed ditch—and a sizeable black work force that it continued to supplement from the islands as construction progressed.

The canal completed, the blacks successfully competed for the menial bluecollar and service jobs that became available with the start of operations. They had two advantages over native Panamanians: They spoke English and were Protestant. Pressure to integrate them into the white community, however, always has been strenuously and, for the most part, successfully, resisted.

For example when the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education ruling confronted residents with possibly having to desegregate their schools, it was suddenly stressed that blacks living in the Zone were Panamanians. Consequently, the argument ran, the issue here was not one of racial discrimination but rather of nationality: Being Panamanians, the blacks had to attend schools that taught the Spanish language and culture. This began the phase of "integrating" the workers into Panamanian life, a polite way of saying that white Zonians wished to rid themselves of the whole problem. Not unjustly do the blacks refer to themselves as the "forced Panamanians."

Segregated and discriminated against by the Americans, blacks have fared even worse with their fellow citizens. Spanish-speaking Panamanians view them as privilegiados (privileged ones) who should have been repatriated to their countries of origin after the canal was built. They resent the fact that 5,000 blacks continue to live in special Canal Zone communities, and that all 15,000 receive salaries which, while considered the minimum wage in the United States, are triple what the average Panamanian makes. Moreover, present racial antagonisms have a long history in Panama. The man General Torrijos overthrew in 1968, Arnulfo Arias, head of the nationalist and racist Panamenista party, advocated denial of citizenship or expulsion back to the islands for West Indian blacks.

In short, the blacks are a classic case of social marginality. Panamanians who work for Americans, they are disowned by both communities. Even under present conditions, whenever employment opportunities decline within the Zone, the black worker is the first to go. Displaced into Panama's economy, racial and linguistic difficulties leave him with slim chances of finding work.

Not surprisingly therefore, the prospect of an eventual United States departure from the Zone is so delicate a matter to the black community that few black canal employes living in the Republic of Panama are willing to comment on it. There can be no doubt, though, that they fear the treaty, believing their jobs endangered, and covertly wish to see President Carter's ratification effort fail. These feelings are sensed by the native population, heightening its resentment.

The blacks who reside in the Canal Zone are more outspoken, openly expressing concern and reservations. In testimony two years ago before a House subcommittee, representatives from the U.S.-administered communities argued that their interests were being ignored in the negotiations and that their loss of jobs under the 1955 treaty boded ill for the future.

A close reading of the new treaty indicates that U.S. negotiators did try to build a measure of protection for black workers into the document. Under the provisions, those fired from jobs transferred to Panama would, if possible, be placed by the United States in other positions. A special optional early retirement program is to be implemented, too, that would benefit both black and white Zonians who would find themselves jobless once the U.S. pulled out.

Nevertheless, the terms of the treaty are too qualified and too vague to offer the black population much real protection: Those holding administrative positions that come under Republic of Panama control are to be retained "to the maximum extent feasible"; displaced employes are to be offered "special job placement assistance" by Panama. Given the historical attitude toward blacks in the Republic, the treaty seems a rather weak reed for them to lean on.

This is particularly true for relatively young people. The treaty may be sufficiently generous to senior workers, allowing them to retire with a modicum of dignity—and money. But younger blacks working for the U.S. have no future either in Panama or in the Canal Zone. They see the problem they face being resolved only if the United States agrees to grant them preferential immigrant status. The black community in Panama has in fact proposed that such legislation be enacted as a necessary aspect of the treaty's adoption.

There seems little chance, though, that it will be. For one thing, letting in the Panamanian blacks would raise a host of difficulties vis-a-vis noncitizen Federal employes in other countries. For another, the President's new illegal-alien plan threatens to create a "raise-the-drawbridge" mentality on Capitol Hill that would hinder consideration of special cases. And unlike the trauma of Vietnam, which was sufficient to jar Congress into appropriating $203 million for refugee absorption, the situation of the blacks in Panama is barely known, not to mention understood. This, perhaps more than anything else, may mean the question of our moral obligation to a community that has served us so well, and at such a high cost to its social position in the Republic of Panama, will not even be raised.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF DAVID MCCULLOUGH

Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee:

My name is David McCullough. I am the author of the book, "The Path Between the Seas." It is a pleasure and honor to appear before you and I do so in the hope that my views will be of help in your historic decision on the proposed treaties with Panama. May I say also, by way of introduction, that I do not speak for any organization; I am not affiliated with any institution. As a writer I am self-employed; I speak only as a private citizen.

Mr. Chairman, I wholeheartedly support the new treaties. My feelings for the Panama Canal, for its physical grandeur, for its importance as a symbol of man's indomitable creative will, could not be greater. I am proud of the Panama Canal, as an American but even more as a human being, for I know what they were up against—the French, the Americans, the armies of black men and women from Jamaica and Barbados, all the many thousands from every corner of the world who went into the jungles to do the work.

But one of the lessons of history, one of the fundamental lessons surely, is that times change, the world moves on. Then was then and now is now. I wonder if we can remind ourselves of that simple fact often enough? The era that built the Panama Canal was immensely different from our own, with different needs, different realities. When Theodore Roosevelt went to Panama to look the work over, it was the first time an American president had ever set foot outside our borders while in office. The population of all Latin America then was less than that of the United States. In October 1914, just two months after the canal was opened, just two months after the start of the Great War in Europe, the American ambassador in London told Woodrow Wilson, "It is not the same world as it was last July, nothing is the same."

American history has become world history. Perhaps that is the most significant difference between our time and the era that built the canal.

I support the treaties because I support the canal: I know its importance, I know our interest in it is vital. As others have said, it is continued use of the canal that matters, not ownership. I support the treaties because of the very convincing case made before this committee by the Joint Chiefs. The treaties are a synthesis of the expressed policy of four consecutive administrations, Republican and Democratic; and our presence in Panama as presently constituted is an anachronism. More than this, it is asking for trouble.

A distinguished British historian tells us that the imperialist age ended twenty-two years ago, with the Suez War of 1956. I think it essential that we remember what our position was then before the world, when it was somebody else's canal at issue.

Inevitably there will be risks involved, there will be problems along the way. But the risks of holding fast, of trying to hang on to what has been, can not help but be far greater. Things simply can't go as they are in Panama.

It is a source of some pride to me that spokesmen for both sides in the present debate have cited my book as support for their case. The book has been offered as proof of why the canal is ours, and why it is not; of why we must hold the line in Panama, and why the new treaties are sixty years overdue. This is as it should be. For history is contradictory. The legitimacy of our sovereignty in the Canal Zone, as an example, can be both justified and undercut by reading the historical record.

When I began my research seven years ago, the Panama riots had occurred and negotiations for a new and different arrangement with Panama were under way. But my contention then—as now—was that so huge and powerful a human story as the origins of the canal was important unto itself, irrespective of how much or little Panama might be in the news. I had recently finished writing a book about the building of the Brooklyn Bridge, in which I had tried to say some things about the nature of American growth and individual initiative and had found in that heroic enterprise such an absorbing subject that I wanted to take on something even grander of the kind, an enterprise of even larger consequence. As time went on, as Panama became increasingly topical, until ultimately it had become a front page sensation. I felt an iron-clad obligation not simply to be thorough and fair in my efforts, but to make certain that what I wrote conveyed the actual complexities and ambiguities—and, yes, some of the mysteries—of what happened.

History is contradictory because people are. Philippe Bunau-Varilla, cause of so much that has been vexing in our relations with Panama down the years, was a man of so many shadings of mind and personality as to defy classification. In the eyes of the Panamanians he is, understandably, the villain of the piece; but it can also be said, and perhaps ought to be remembered by everyone involved with the present negotiations, that had there been no Philippe Bunau-Varilla there would probably be no Republic of Panama and the canal would be in Nicaragua.

One aspect of the treaty concerns me: Article XII, by which we agree to build no future waterway anywhere other than Panama. I question this. I don't understand why it is necessary. But Article XII is a relatively minor flaw. It is the large, long-range objective of the treaties that we ought never to lose sight of and to my mind, that objective is right and in the best interest of our country. Moreover, I can't see how anyone with a sense of history or a familiarity with present-day realities in Panama could fail to be impressed by the intelligence, the fairness, the legal-diplomatic brilliance of what the negotiators have achieved.

The greatest virtue of the agreements, their genius, it strikes me, is the slow, evolutionary manner by which control and ownership of the waterway itself are to be transferred. The process will be orderly. There will be ample time. The fact that Panama and the United States are to run the canal together, in partnership, for another generation nearly, will be of the utmost benefit.

As you know from your recent inspection tour of the canal, it is an immense, highly sophisticated piece of technology. To operate a conventional canal, a sea-level canal such as Suez, requires in essence, the employment of able pilots and sufficient dredging equipment to keep the passage clear. "The big ditch," as applied to Panama, is a foolish misnomer. The canal is a bridge of water, and as such dependent upon fine balances of natural resources, complex engineering, and a large dedicated personnel with innumerable special skills. Ships are carried up and over the land barrier, lifted 85 feet above sea level through a system of giant locks, these equipped with tremendous steel gates, ingenious safety mechanisms, control devices, literally thousands of moving parts.

The canal is a huge hydroelectric dam and power station, a water utility, a railroad, port facilities, hospitals, medical research laboratories. And when the time comes, the canal must be turned over to a generation of Panamanians who don't just know how to run the canal, but who have technology in their bones. Their technical-managerial competence must be second to none.

So in that regard, I would like to recommend that consideration be given to a program of special scholarships, something on the line of the Fulbright scholarships, whereby, every year, until the end of the century, some ten to twenty exceptional young Panamanians could attend the best of our technical colleges and universities. The cost of such a program would be comparatively small, the rewards enormous.

Mr. Chairman, the Panama Canal is expressive of one of the oldest, noblest desires in the human heart, to bridge the divide and bring people closer together. These treaties are expressive of that same desire. They are a progressive step, an act of strength and confidence, and of good will.

Reflecting on those Americans who played such decisive parts in the creation of the canal—Theodore Roosevelt, William Crawford Gorgas, John Stevens, George Goethals—I am struck, as I am sure you have been, by how much lasting good they were able to accomplish in their lives, what benefit they were to future generations. They were not the kind to spend overly much time looking backward, dwelling on past glories. Theodore Roosevelt never went back to Panama to see the finished canal, the work he took greater pride in than anything else in his career. The only one of those four men who went back in later years was John Stevens, who flew down on a Pan American clipper and looked the canal over from end to end. Perhaps you recall what he said when he reached home again.

When the reporters asked what had impressed him most, he said it was the ride on the airplane.

They were forward-looking people. I urge that the decision on the treaties be made in that same spirit.

STATEMENT OF JULES DAVIDS

The treaties signed by the United States and Panama on September 7, 1977, which provide for a new Panama Canal Treaty and a Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, that are now under the advice and consent of the Senate for ratification must be viewed not only in terms of their specific provisions, but also from a broader historical perspective. This is necessary, in part, to provide a clearer insight into the relations between the United States and Panama, and to indicate how and why changing conditions have made the assumptions and beliefs of many Americans concerning the Panama Canal obsolete.

Numerous differences have plagued both countries since the birth of the Republic of Panama in 1903. These controversies have been rooted in past events, in conflicting and divergent interest, and in opposing cultural outlooks.

To illuminate the significance of the new treaties, I should like to present an overview of the issues between the United States and Panama as they relate to three main considerations in the context of their times. The first entails the involvement of the United States in the Isthmian region, and the circumstances that led to the building of the Panama Canal. The second deals with the relationship established between the United States and Panama as it was affected by the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty of 1903, and the terms and conditions specified by Washington. These concerned the requirements that the United States deemed necessary for the operation, maintenance, and defense of the Canal. Finally, I should like to examine the cultural and psychological considerations, and opposing nationalistic attitudes.

The involvement of the United States in the Isthmian region was a product of American expansionism in the nineteenth century, a recognition of the strategic importance of the area, a desire on the part of the United States to extend its influence in the Western Hemisphere, and its interest in building a canal across Central America. This interest was expressed as early as 1821, shortly after Panama declared its independence from Spain. Two years later, the United States proclaimed the Monroe Doctrine, warning Europe against any further colonization in North America, and against intervention or interference in the Western Hemisphere.

From 1821 to 1848, the United States was largely occupied with three objectives in Central America: (1) ensuring that the benefits of a transisthmian transit would not, as Secretary of State Henry Clay declared in 1826, be "exclusively appropriated to any one nation," but would be extended "to all parts of the globe upon the payment of just compensation and reasonable tolls"; (2) thwarting British penetration in the isthmian region and its efforts to establish a protectorate over all of Central America; and (3) strengthening the position of the United States in the Caribbean.

Two developments intensified America's interest in the Isthmus and affected the involvement of the United States for the next half-century. The first was the signing of the Bidlack Treaty with New Granada (Colombia) in 1864; the second event was the discovery of gold in California in 1848. On his own initiative, American Minister Benjamin A. Bidlack responded to New Granada's request that the United States protect its territorial integrity. New Granada, in return, agreed to grant the United States a "right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama."

In submitting the Bidlack Treaty to the Senate for ratification in February, 1847, President James K. Polk stressed that the territorial guarantee did "not extend to the territories of New Granada," but was "confined to the single province of the isthmus of Panama." He gave assurances that it in no way constituted an "entangling alliance." The President heavily emphasized its advantages to American commerce. A trans-isthmian passage, Polk declared, would "render our communication with our possessions on the northwest coast of America comparatively easy and speedy." It would, he said, not only shorten the route to the west coast, but also to Asia and the Pacific islands.

The Bidlack Treaty, which was ratified in June, 1848 shortly after the Mexican War, set a pattern of direct American involvement isthmian affairs. Political disturbances, instability, and virtual chaotic conditions in New Granada and Central America led to sporadic American interventions to protect the transit routes across Panama and Nicaragua, as well as the railroad built in the 1850's by the Panama Railroad Company. In 1856, the first landing of American troops took place in Panama to quell the so-called "Watermelon War." The United States intervened in the Isthmus on seven subsequent occasions: in 1860, 1861, 1865, 1873, 1885, 1901, and 1902.

Violence in the Isthmian region reached capstone in Colombia's War of a Thousand Days during 1899-1902. More than 100,000 Colombian lives were lost. The attempt of Panamanian leaders, however, to attain independence in this struggle failed. Before 1902, it should be noted, American interventions were mainly initiated by requests of local Panamanian authorities of the Bogotá 1 government to put down disturbances or by U.S. consuls to protect the Panama Railroad Company. All were undertaken principally to aid the established Colombian government.

When Theodore Roosevelt took steps to carry out the terms of the Spooner Amendment of 1902, he did not expect serious complications to ensue, especially since the United States had always supported Bogotá. The Spooner Amendment had authorized the President to buy the assets of the defunct De Lesseps company for no more than $40,000,000 and to acquire from Colombia perpetual control of a zone at least six miles wide across the Isthmus to build a canal. The rejection of American overtures angered Roosevelt. It led, as we know, to the President's tacit endorsement of the Panamanian leaders separatist movement. By inaction, and benevolent, protective "gunboat" neutrality, Roosevelt provided the opportunity for the Panamanian insurrectionists to secure their long sought goal of the attainment of their independence. The success of the Panama Revolution of 1903, however, probably owes more to Panama's deep-rooted separatism and its nationalist fervor, and to the dogged efforts of Philippe Bunau-Varilla than to the actions of Roosevelt.

Down to 1903, the primary concern of the United States in Central America centered on the building of an isthmian canal, and on preventing any European power from obtaining a monopoly control over transit routes. To be sure, the stipulation in the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, signed with England in 1850, against "any exclusive control" over a ship canal in Central America, and the attempt of Ferdinand de Lesseps in the 1880's to construct a canal across Panama, created difficulties for the United States. Until the turn of the twentieth century, neither private American capitalists nor the United States government were in a position to build an isthmian canal. With the collapse of the De Lesseps venture and the conclusion of the second Hay-Pauncefote Treaty in 1901, however, the way finally cleared for the construction of an American controlled canal. These events coincided with the emergence of the United States as a major world power, following the Spanish-American War.

We can now take up the second consideration, namely the relations between the United States and the Republic of Panama. This involves the sources of tension that arose in the implementation of the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty of 1903, and in the measures taken by the United States in assuring the efficient operation, maintenance, and security and defense of the Panama Canal. Although Roosevelt did not directly instigate the Panama Revolution, America's naval presence in the isthmian waters during the early days of November 1903, and Washington's guarantee of the infant republic's independence, made it possible for the Panamanians to establish their separation from Colombia. By his "big stick" diplomacy, the President insured the building of the Panama Canal on bargain terms. Though the construction of the Canal was a remarkable technological and engineering feat, the American presence in Panama, and the extension of its power and influence throughout the Caribbean region was to incur the animosity of Colombians, the resentment of Panamanians, and the distrust and suspicion of the Latin American republics against Yankee imperialism.

Difficulties in United States-Panama relations developed almost immediately after the creation of the Republic of Panama. The Canal Zone formed a colonial enclave splitting Panama in two. Within the Zone, the rights of extraterritoriality were extended to all Americans making them immune to Panamanian law and its jurisdiction. The United States is today the only country in the world that continues to retain the vestiges of extraterritorial rights. All other major powers have long since abolished the exercise of extraterritoriality.

Since the establishment of the Republic of Panama, the principal concern of the United States has centered on the country's political stability. Because disturbances, revolts, insurrections and chaotic conditions were for so long a part of Panama's history. Washington believed it would not be possible to build or maintain a canal unless the American right of intervention was officially secured. At the insistence of the first American Minister to Panama, William Insco Buchanan, this right was included in the country's new constitution. Article 136 declared that "the government of the United States of America may intervene in any part of the Republic of Panama to reestablish public peace and constitutional order in the event of their being disturbed . . ."

From 1903 to 1939, dissension and agitation arose not only over the problems dealing with American intervention in Panama, but over the interpretation of American treaty rights, commercial relations, commissary privileges, land use for the protection of the Panama Canal, and the payment of the annual rental. Expectations that prosperity would result from the Canal Zone settlement never materialized. Panamanians quickly discovered that economic benefits accrued mainly to Americans and not to native merchants. Commissaries undersold Panamanian merchants, which generated resentment. After the opening of the Panama Canal in 1914, the competitive disadvantage to Panamanian merchants became even more severe.

Most galling to Panama was the American expropriation of land. The Panamanian government insisted that land could only be acquired by special treaties. Washington declared, however, that the right of expropriation was contained in the Treaty of 1903; all that had to be proved was that the land was needed for the Canal's operations or its defense. Under this interpretation, hundreds of square miles outside of the Canal Zone were acquired despite the protests of the Panamanians.

Efforts to revise the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty, that defined American rights in Panama and the terms of the building and operation of the Canal, began in 1915. Shortly after World War I, a Commission was created to investigate Panama's complaints. Numerous abuses were cited, but little progress was made in seeking their remedy. Minor concessions were finally made in a treaty concluded in 1926. None of the rights under the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty, however, was surrendered. With the onset of the Great Depression, a new orientation of American policy toward Latin America occurred. Attention focused on strengthening the security of the Western Hemisphere, and promoting a more cooperative relationship with the Latin American republics. Under the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration, negotiations were resumed for a new agreement between the United States and Panama. This resulted in the signing of the Hull-Alfaro Treaty in 1936, which was ratified three years later.

This agreement marked the first substantial revision of the Treaty of 1903. It acknowledged Panama's independence; the United States gave up its right to intervene in Panama's affairs; and the annual rental paid to Panama for the use of the canal strip was increased from $250,000 to $430,000.

Although relations with Panama improved considerably after the ratification of the Hull-Alfaro Treaty in 1939, they were again marred when Arnulfo Arias, a Harvard-trained physician and critic of the United States, became President of Panama in 1940. A spellbinding public orator, Arias allegedly sympathized with fascist ideology and purportedly condoned Axis sabotage and espionage during World War II. As President, he sought to stimulate Panamanian nationalism and to modernize Panama's political institutions by a new constitution that broadened the executive powers and created a highly centralized government. Panamanian leaders voiced their alarm at Arias' actions, and apprehension arose in the United States over the protection of the Panama Canal and the security of the Canal Zone. During World War II, a pro-Allied political coalition, opposed to Arias' dictatorial tactics, effected his ouster in October, 1941.

With the entry of the United States in the Second World War, Panama's cooperation proved to be unstinting. Panamanian leaders agreed to the establishment of American air and naval bases, and sites for radar stations, permitting in all the acquisition of bases at 134 locations outside the Canal Zone. It was specified, however, that these bases would be evacuated within a year after the end of World War II. When they were not, a serious crisis erupted. Efforts of the United States to obtain a treaty in 1946, providing for the lease of thirteen bases for an additional five years, and the Rio Hato airbase for ten years, with an option for renewal, led to a virtual mob uprising and to a unanimous rejection of the treaty by the National Assembly.

Taken aback by the violent outburst, President Truman ordered a pull out of all equipment. At the same time, he halted plans to further Panama's development, including the building of highways, and the conversion of the present lock-type Canal to a sea-level canal at a cost of $2.5 billion. The Panamanians also lost the annual rental for the bases in peacetime that would have brought more than $180,000 in revenue.

Although the economic impact of the American military withdrawal was severe and resulted in a post-war economic recession, Panamanians were intent on asserting themselves. They sought especially to break free of American paternalism, and, in particular, to preserve their dignity.

During President Eisenhower's first term, conditions gradually improved and an easing of tensions occurred. In January, 1955, a new agreement was concluded that granted major concessions to Panama. The annual rent for the Panama Canal was increased to $1,930,000; commercial activities in the Canal Zone not connected with the operations of the Canal were cut back; and the principle of a base wage for all Canal Zone employees was accepted. In return, Panama agreed to permit the United States to establish military bases.

Despite the benefits that accrued to Panama from the building of the Canal—and they were by no means insignificant—the frustrations experienced by the Panamanians were never fully resolved. This stemmed, in part, from the fact that the United States gave little thought to preserving at least the appearance of a shared sovereignty. Instead, the United States asserted what was in effect a direct colonial control in the Canal Zone. At the same time, however, it also exerted an informal colonial relationship with Panama itself. This was not imposed in any systematic fashion, but was derived from the overwhelming dependence of Panama on the United States; economically, financially, and militarily.

While Panamanians are grateful to the United States for making possible their country's independence, they have, at the same time, always resented the fact that the Treaty of 1903 was negotiated not by their own representatives, but by a Frenchman, Philippe Bunau Varilla. More hurtful to their dignity, too, is the fact that the Canal Zone cuts through the heartland of their country. This Zone of a ten-mile wide stretch of United States controlled land, complete with the American flag and extraterritorial rights, bisects Panama on a north-south axis, from sea to sea, and in perpetuity. Unfortunately, "la dignidad," so important to the Panamanians has been largely ignored by the United States in its relations with the Republic of Panama. Americans might get some idea of the situation existing in Panama if they tried to visualize a foreign power's flag planted on a River Zone running the full length of the Mississippi—a Zone complete with extraterritoriality rights and political controls, in which such a foreign power exercised authority as if it were sovereign. Here, in essence, lies the source of continued tensions between Panamanians and the United States, and which the new treaties before the Senate seek to remedy.

Finally, we need to turn our attention to a third consideration that relates to cultural and opposing nationalistic attitudes. Subtle, yet more deep-seated than political or economic grievances, they reflect the emotional feelings and cultural prejudices of both the Panamanians and Americans. At the turn of the twentieth century, many Americans were influenced by the ideas and doctrines of Manifest Destiny and Social Darwinism, which extolled the superiority of Anglo-Saxons and held that the United States was destined to spread democracy throughout the world. These beliefs were to be pervasive, and they were to be reinforced by the idea that the world was divided between civilized nations—that were equated with the advanced, industrial countries of the United States and Western Europe—and the "backward" peoples, such as those in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. The latter were viewed as "inferior" and uncivilized.

From the building of the Panama Canal to the post-World War II years, Americans hardly disguised the fact that they regarded Panamanians as persons of a lesser status than themselves. Discrimination was accepted as a fact of life. Especially distasteful to the natives were the "silver" payments for them as opposed to the "gold" for Americans. Resented, too, was the differential in wage rates for similar work performed by Panamanians and Americans in the Canal Zone. It was not until the signing of the Eisenhower treaty in 1955 that the first steps were taken toward ameliorating wage inequities. Like Americans, Panamanians, of course, take great pride in their own traditions and culture. The practice of racial discrimination, and the intimation of "inferiority" are matters that have long disturbed Panamanians. What they insist upon is an acknowledgment of respect and equality. These, more often than not, have been denied to them by Americans in the Canal Zone, and by Washington.

Although the Treaty of 1955 helped to improve relations between Panama and the United States, it did not satisfy the aspirations most prized by the Panamanians. Washington refused to rescind the "perpetuity" clause in the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty of 1903, and to limit the Panama Canal concession to ninety-nine years. The United States also flatly rejected relinquishing extraterritoriality rights in the Canal Zone, and it rebuffed Panama's request that American citizens who were accused of crimes be tried by joint United States-Panamanian tribunals. Nationalist fervor increasingly intensified. This was partly a product of a world-wide resistance to colonialism, the emergence of new nations, especially in Africa, the Suez Crisis of 1956, and the rise of indigenous, nationalistic, revolutionary movements in Latin America, the Middle East, and Asia. These developments emphasized the anachronistic character of United States-Panamanian relationships.

The turmoil in Panama also became explosive. The clash of rival nationalistic attitudes was to be symbolized by flag incidents in 1959 and 1964, and by the demands of the Panamanians that the United States acknowledge their nation's sovereignty. Massive anti-United States demonstrations were staged in 1959 on Panama's Independence and Flag Day holiday. Violence occurred when several hundred Panamanians crossed into the Canal Zone. American troops were called in to control the situation. After the crisis subsided, the United States built an eight-foot fence on the Canal Zone's border in Panama City to protect the zone residents.

To placate the Panamanians and to ease the strained relations, President Eisenhower proposed in 1960 a nine-point program that pledged, among other things, bettering of job conditions, the construction of 500 homes for Panamanians in the Canal Zone, and the ending of discrimination in the zone. In September, 1960, the President also ordered the raising of the Panamanian and United States flags, side by side at the Shaler Triangle in the Canal Zone, as evidence of Panama's titular sovereignty. These measures temporarily quieted the situation.

Within a few years, a new and more explosive flag incident erupted in January, 1964. This resulted in mob riots that lasted for three-and-a-half days. Four American soldiers and twenty-four Panamanians lost their lives; more than 200 persons were seriously injured; and damage to American property was estimated at over $2,000,000. The disturbances brought to the forefront the virulence of Panamanian nationalism, and the need to reappraise the relations between the United States and Panama. Both Panamanian leaders and President Lyndon B. Johnson recognized that a new basis of relationship had to be worked out, one which acknowledged the equality of interest of both countries in the Panama Canal. This required not merely another revision of the Treaty of 1903, but the negotiation of a new treaty.

President Johnson initiated a process of treaty negotiations that have continued from 1964 to the present day. The treaties now before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee are the result of these fourteen years of negotiation. In rejecting or ratifying them, the Senate makes a choice of holding on to our past policies or looking ahead to a relationship with Panama based on cooperation and equality of interests. Since 1964, it has become clear that the Treaty of 1903 is no longer tenable as a means of assuring indefinitely continued accessibility of the Panama Canal to world shipping without Panama's cooperation. The climate of international affairs has changed dramatically during the past two decades. A decision to perpetuate the status-quo can only nurture a hostile atmosphere that would have as its result a sharpening of cross-cultural conflicts and a deepening of animosity.

At the present time, all conceivable facets of the problems that might be posed by the provisions of the United States-Panama treaties have been exhaustively examined in Senate hearings, and in public debates. I believe the Senate's approval of the treaties will not diminish the prestige or influence of the United States in the world in any way. Quite the contrary result would occur. Its reputation would be enhanced, and the United States would be seen as living by the ideals upon which the country was founded.

While points of clarification and some changes may be required, the fact that Panama and the United States have reached a stage where major points of differences are near resolution is a remarkable achievement. One can only hope that what has been accomplished to date will be endorsed by the Senate's approval of ratification. The new treaties offer the prospect of the opening of a new era not only in the relationship between the United States and Panama, but with the Latin American Republics as well.

STATEMENT BY ELTING E. MORISON

I think I was invited here because I know something about Theodore Roosevelt. So I will start with him. He was, said Eliher Root, the greatest educator he ever knew. Self government is really the process of continuous learning and it falls to the President and others in authority to stimulate and give direction to this process. If self government is to work in changing times, the whole society has to engage itself in the search for constructive accommodations for new conditions.

Theodore Roosevelt could get the attention of his fellow citizens and make them think. He knew how to put the hard questions a little before they became obvious to others; how to make the search for sensible answers exciting; how to startle the country into informing debate; and how to move people in their thinking beyond short run self interest toward some longer view of the general welfare.

Take one of the hardest questions of his time. Where exactly did we, as a sort of emerging country bursting with hope and energy, fit within the family of nations? How could we define and maintain an appropriate place for ourselves in the world?

Like any educator or professor he used a good many words to make his points. "We cannot," he said "sit huddled within our borders and avow ourselves an assemblage of well-to-do hucksters who care nothing for what happens beyond. No nation can help in securing an organized, peaceful and justice-doing world community until it is willing to run risks and make efforts in order to secure and maintain such a community." He said things like this from the bully pulpit day after day.

He liked words but he preferred to use the greater educative power of deeds. Take three small ones. He brought the Russians and Japanese to Portsmouth, New Hampshire to frame a peace. He interfered to get the meddlesome Kaiser off the hook at Algeciras. He sent the fleet around the world. Very small—but very striking demonstrations in the school room. They set people thinking about the necessary means—a battle line—and the appropriate ends—what he would call righteous agreements—for a constructive foreign policy.

One of those deeds, of course, was Panama. Conceived in legitimate self interest, it became a contribution to the general welfare—indeed as he said over and over again to all of civilization. In its construction and results as we have all been taught in school, it was a marvelous, truly American achievement. In its beginnings—that is in the way the rights to build and maintain the Canal were acquired—which is less often taught in school—there is less cause for satisfaction.

Here there is some difference between the great educator and me. He thought and forcefully said a thousand times that everything he did concerning the Canal was right in purpose, principle, detail and in the eyes of all higher powers. He usually did. Once he was asked about his action in another matter. "You say it was right, how do you know it was right." "Because," he replied, "I was doing it. I was doing my best." He was in court and under oath at the time.

For my part, it was one of those moments when the teacher blotted his own copy book. It seems a poor business, unbecoming in a country that likes to believe it is setting standards of international conduct for others to repair to. And, as you know, how we got there has left a legacy of resentment among those already there.

You have the history of all this before you and can make up your own minds without further lectures from Theodore Roosevelt or me. The usual comforting explanation falls, as you know, somewhere between us. He was only doing what all other ambitious nations were doing in those days. The times were different. It was the common custom for those who sought spheres of influence and maintained colonial empires. This is, on the whole, true enough. The matter can safely be left there while we turn to the matter at hand—our relations to Panama in quite different times.

The treaties you have before you seem to me one of those imaginative, educative deeds designed to help us, and others, think and act constructively in a set of new conditions.

As I read them we give up two considerations. A title that has meant different things to different people since it was written in the Treaty of 1903 and the management of a waterway that takes up a certain amount of our time, effort, money and manpower.

We retain every right and necessary condition to use the Canal, protect its integrity and defend our larger national interest and security that we now possess under the present arrangements. Those who have appeared before you from the State Department and the Pentagon who are responsible for these matters are very clear about this.

What new thing is to be gained from these treaties is this. We make available an asset—the water that flows through their own land—to Panamanians. In joint action with us over a period of years they can acquire the economic stability, technical skill, responsibility and confidence any country needs to reach full development in modern circumstances. In a period when all those earlier arrangements between nations, lands, and territories are breaking up, this is a striking demonstration of a new kind of arrangement. It demonstrates our intent to use our great influence in an area of continuing interest to us to create a new and prudent ordering of relationships that will better fit the new times. It offers the chance in one part of the distracted world to create what we have always claimed we searched for, a community in which all nations could find membership as good—and self respecting—neighbors.

Not everybody reads these treaties this way—or there would be no debates in this particular learning process. One school of thought holds that the treaties will produce a dangerous psychological and symbolic damage. By the terms it will be revealed to all that the Old Colossus of the North has suffered a failure of the nerve and a decay of the will even to defend himself. I think this is a misreading of both the treaties and the times.

This view rests at bottom perhaps on a feeling we must all share in some degree. As an old friend who served in the Canal Zone during the war and who strongly opposes the treaties said to me in the course of our debate, "It all boils down to the fact that I just hate to give anything up." Translated into the language of international relations, this takes us back to the conditioned reflexes of 1903 and thereabouts when the usual measure of national strength was the capacity to hold another man's territory.

Today we are all groping for more constructive ways to lead from strength. These treaties are an enlightened and enlightening example. I hope you will approve them and will leave you with one more word from Theodore, the educator.

"The important thing is the next step. It often happens that the good conditions of the past can be regained not by going back, but by going forward. We cannot recreate what is dead; we cannot stop the march of events; but we can direct this march and out of the conditions develop something better than the past knew."

STATEMENT BY RICHARD W. LEOPOLD

Mr. Chairman, it is a great privilege and a unique experience for me to testify this morning. Although I have taught the history of United States foreign policy at two major universities since 1938, I have never appeared before this distinguished body. I have, however, benefited enormously, in my teaching and research, from the publications of this committee—its hearings, reports, prints, legislative summaries, and more recently—the extremely valuable Historical Series which I hope will be continued. For this largesse I am indebted to the chairman and his predecessors, especially Senator Fulbright, and to Dr. Carl Marcy and his successors.

I shall begin by making clear those areas in which I feel competent to speak and those in which I claim no expertise. I am not a specialist on Latin America or an authority on international law. I have had no connection with drafting the present treaties or with organizations that support or oppose them. As a historian, I have ranged widely over the evolution of our foreign relations from independence to the present day. In 1962, I published an 848-page survey entitled "The Growth of American Foreign Policy: A History." My research has focused on the period from 1890 to 1945. One fruit of that research was a short biography published in 1954 and entitled "Elihu Root and the Conservative Tradition." I am particularly interested in the relations between President and Congress in the formulation and execution of foreign policy and in the role played by the armed forces in shaping foreign policy. I know much less, I am sure, than do the members of this committee about the current negotiations and the details of the agreements before you.

My chief service to this committee will be to discuss the treaties as a historian, to place the current controversy in proper perspective, and to note those elements of continuity and change that are inherent in the problem. A century and a half ago, when Panama first impinged on American thinking, many Senators regarded the area as outside the proper scope of United States foreign policy. They opposed the request of President John Quincy Adams in 1825 to send two delegates to a conference, called by Simón Bolívar to meet on the isthmus, to discuss hemispheric subjects. Although consent was eventually given, no tangible results ensued. One delegate died en route; the other arrived after the conference had completed its labors.

Twenty-five years later the situation had changed. With the extension of the republic's borders in the Pacific and the discovery of gold in California, the isthmian region was very much in the mind of the policymakers. But they then faced there a rival—Great Britain—that was much stronger in diplomatic influence, naval power, and commercial ties. Hence the Whig administration of President Zachary Taylor had to be content, in the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850, with an agreement to share equally the construction, operation, and defense of any future canal in Central America.

Twenty-five years later, attitudes had changed again. In the White House and on Capitol Hill the notion of sharing a canal with England had become unacceptable; on March 8, 1880, President Rutherford B. Hayes told Congress that henceforth "the policy of this country is a canal under American control." Initial efforts to negotiate an end to the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty failed. But by 1899 the enthusiasms generated by the War with Spain and by the dramatic dash of the battleship Oregon from the Pacific around Cape Horn to engage the Spanish in the Caribbean made it likely that Congress might abrogate the pact unilaterally. Faced by that prospect and greatly aided by the Senate's advice, Secretary of State John Hay in 1901 gained England's consent to terminate the Clayton-Bulwer pact and in 1903 concluded with Colombia a treaty that would have enabled the United States to build alone a canal through Panama. Rejection of that treaty by the Colombian Senate led to an uprising on the isthmus against the government at Bogotá, a revolt that could not have succeeded without questionable steps of the United States. The Theodore Roosevelt administration recognized the new republic of Panama with unseemly haste and then negotiated with equal precipitancy the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty of November 15, 1903 that conferred many rights we still enjoy today.

The events of November 1903 left a legacy of bitterness with Colombia, who felt she had been despoiled of valuable territory by the Colossus of the North, and with Panama, who later claimed she had been inadequately represented in the treaty creating the Canal Zone. A note of partisanship also appeared as the Democrats first sought to blame Roosevelt for instigating the uprising and then to placate Colombia by expressing regret and offering a thinly disguised indemnity. The Wilson administration's treaty of April 6, 1914 was bitterly opposed by most Republicans and did not pass until April 1921. This acrimony was overshadowed in part by the completion of the canal in 1914—a magnificent achievement that owed much to technical ingenuity, medical science, and individual heroism—and in part by the outbreak of the First World War.

The end of that war ushered in another period of change. The defeat of Imperial Germany removed, for the time being, the last European threat to the security of the hemisphere. Wilsonian ideals trumpeted the end of colonialism. Panama became an original member of the League of Nations. The death of Roosevelt in 1919 freed Republicans to reconsider the events of 1903 without fear of being disloyal to their late leader. In the Senate, progressive Republicans, led by William E. Borah, launched a campaign to modify the special privileges the United States had gained earlier in many Caribbean countries. Inevitably, these developments prompted Panama to seek alterations in the treaty of 1903.

The issues in the ensuing negotiations have a familiar ring. They included the sovereignty of Panama, the compensation she should receive from canal tolls, the privileged position of those working and residing within the Zone, the impact of these arrangements on Panama's economy, and the defense of the waterway. A new treaty signed on July 28, 1926 in Washington did not pass the Panamanian National Assembly, partly because it required Panama to "consider herself in a state of war in case of any war in which the United States should be a belligerent." Not until October 1933 when, following a visit from President Harmodio Arias, President Franklin D. Roosevelt decided to make a new agreement part of his Good Neighbor policy was the way cleared for the first revision.

The resulting Hull-Alfaro Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation recognized that 1936 was not 1903. The United States relinquished its guarantee of Panama's independence, its right to intervene to maintain order, and its power of eminent domain. The annual payments were raised from $250,000 to $430,000, but that concession was largely offset by the devaluation of the dollar. Defense of the canal became a responsibility of both nations, but this provision aroused criticism in Washington and Panama City. Panamanians feared that it represented a military alliance; Americans worried lest it prevent them from acting unilaterally in an emergency.

Signed on March 2, 1936, the new treaty did not enter into force until July 27, 1939. The delay was caused mostly, though not solely, by the United States. The signing coincided with Japan's decision to free herself from treaties limiting her fleet, and this fact created fears in some American minds. Even more worrisome was the growing effectiveness of airplanes which meant that, in addition to large fixed guns and a mobile navy, the defense of the canal must also depend on fighter planes and bombers based outside the Zone. Hence opposition by the Army, together with Roosevelt's diminished political clout that followed his defeat in the court reform bill of 1937 and his unsuccessful purge of recalcitrant Democratic Senators in 1938, prevented action until July 25, 1939. Even then it was necessary to include an exchange of notes on February 1, 1939 that made clear the right of the United States to take unilateral steps to defend the canal when a sudden crisis precluded joint consultation and the right of the United States to hold military maneuvers outside of the Zone if such operations were deemed essential to the security of the waterway. The tally was 65 to 16, with 15 not voting. The division was largely along party lines. Only one of the 69 Democrats voted against the treaty. Of the badly outnumbered Republicans—a mere 23 in all—15 voted nay, 5 voted aye, and 3 abstained.

Skipping over the special circumstances surrounding the often acrimonious negotiations to obtain wartime and postwar bases outside the Zone, we come to the Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation of January 25, 1955, consummated under a Republican administration. The scenario resembled that of 1933. In October 1953, President José A. Remón came to Washington to confer with President Dwight D. Eisenhower, much as Arias had done in 1933. A communique recognized the need for further change to stimulate the Panamanian economy and to halt the growth of anti-Americanism on the isthmus. Events abroad had not gone unnoticed. Two years earlier, Egypt had unilaterally abrogated British rights to maintain a base at Suez and to station troops along the canal route. A year hence, the United Kingdom would renounce those rights by treaty and also promise to evacuate its armed forces within twenty months. The Chapin-Fábrega pact, signed symbolically in Panama, raised the annual payments from $430,000 to $1,930,000, returned certain lands to Panama, surrendered many sanitary controls, and shared more equitably the economic benefits of the transit route. This time the Senate acted more promptly and decisively. After six months, instead of the forty in 1936-1939, it gave its consent by a tally of 72 to 14, with 10 not voting. If we count the absentees according to their expressed views, the result would have been 80 to 14. Of the 47 Republicans, only one voted against the treaty; of the 49 Democrats, 36 favored and 13 opposed.

The spirit of accommodation and the acceptance of change shown by President Eisenhower and Secretaries of State John Foster Dulles and Christian A. Herter were continued by Presidents John F. Kennedy, Lyndon B. Johnson, Richard M. Nixon, and Gerald R. Ford and by Secretaries Dean Rusk, William P. Rogers, and Henry Kissinger. The historian would stress the bipartisan belief since 1955 that agreements suitable in 1903 no longer serve the nation's interest. To the executive branch, the solution was the same whether it be the joint declaration of April 3, 1964 that reestablished relations with Panama and sought to eliminate the sources of conflict, or the unperfected treaties of June 1, 1967, or the statement of principles of February 7, 1974, issued by Secretary Kissinger and Foreign Minister Juan A. Tack. The reliance of presidents of both parties on veteran diplomat Ellsworth Bunker has insured continuity and consistency.

I am aware, of course, that since 1955 many members of the legislative branch have not shared these views of the executive. I do not intend in this prepared statement to attempt to shake the deeply held convictions of those Senators and Representatives. Rather, as a historian, I shall say a word on the potential conflict in the treaty-making process. The Senate can play and has played a constructive role. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 was certainly the better for amendments insisted upon by the Senate. Approval of the Hull-Alfaro Treaty of 1936 was helped by the Senate's demand for clarification in the exchange of notes of February 1, 1939. In recent years, however, too many committees of both houses have assumed responsibility for passing judgment on some treaties, and it is imperative that this committee in this instance be the spokesman for the Senate.

Certainly there is no need to oppose these treaties in order to avoid the charge of executive domination. The historian is impressed by the attempts of all Presidents beginning with Eisenhower to work closely with the legislative branch on this issue. In my judgment, this difficult problem would have been satisfactorily resolved at least ten years ago if it had not been for congressional opposition. The situation is not unlike that of normalizing relations with the People's Republic of China. For years the President was inhibited by legislative resolutions against such steps. In retrospect, congressional opposition seems to have been a mistake. I do believe that future historians will render the same judgment on the canal treaties if we lose the present opportunity to negotiate amicably an end to an arrangement which, in the eyes of the world, is anachronistic in the 1970's.

For there is more at stake in the treaties before you than the deployment of the Navy, the welfare of interest groups within the United States, and the rights of citizens resident in the Canal zone. It is the image we project in a world eager for peaceful change and for just dealings between nations large and small. As Ambassador Bunker has suggested on countless occasions, the essence of the present treaties offers an opportunity to revitalize an outmoded relationship, to solve a serious international problem while there is still time, and to demonstrate the qualities of justice, reason, and vision that men and women of all parties and sections believe should characterize the acts of this great republic.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD FALK

In my judgment, the debate on the proposed Panama Canal Treaties has been dangerously narrow. It has presupposed the desirability of maximizing the U.S. role in relation to the Panama Canal for as long as is negotiable. Domestic critics have mainly attacked the treaties because not enough control has been retained. Supporters defend the treaties by arguing that no element of essential control has been relinquished.

I believe that far too great a U.S. role has been retained to make the treaties an effective adjustment to changing international realities. That is, I believe we have "forced" the Panamanian government to accept a bad bargain. Panama's current leadership has accepted the 1977 treaties for a variety of reasons, but principally because it is faced with a deteriorating and desperate economic situation and badly needs the economic relief that is part of "the sweetener" added to the treaty terms by U.S. negotiators. As the distinguished Cornell historian Walter LaFeber concludes, "Only large Canal revenues could rescue the governmental debt" and avoid an anti-governmental uprising in Panama and quite possibly "even those revenues could be insufficient." LaFeber believes that "[t]he rapidly deteriorating Panamanian economy and Torrijos's increasing dependence on outside private investors set the stage for the climactic negotiations of a new treaty during the summer of 1977." (Walter LaFeber, "The Panama Canal," Oxford, 1978, at p. 202; see generally on the economic situation in Panama as an element in the Canal negotiations, pp. 195-208.)

In essence, these agreements are not likely to quell Panamanian nationalist demands for very long and, thus, will probably produce a situation in which the United States will be the target of a continuing anti-colonialist campaign that is widely supported within Panama and elsewhere in international society. Indeed, the only way that the treaty regime can succeed is if the Panamanian government becomes even more repressive. The 30-percent opposition to the treaty plebiscite in Panama, together with intense opposition to ratification among Panamanian nationalists across a wide political spectrum indicates the degree to which the treaty is already unacceptable to the Panamanian people. Even General Torrijos, at the September ceremony in Washington where the leaders of both countries signed the treaties, indicated his own misgivings by drawing a distinction between "two types of truths—logical truth and pleasant truth." He signed the treaties "In the name of logical truth," indicating that it was not pleasant to accept an arrangement that "does not enjoy the support of all our people, because the 23 years agreed upon as a transition period are 8,395 days, because during this there will be military bases which make my country a strategic reprisal target, and because we are agreeing to a treaty of neutrality which places us under the protective umbrella of the Pentagon." (Remarks by General Torrijos," reprinted in "State Dep't Bull," Oct. 17, 1977, pp. 482-3, at 483.) This is hardly a triumphant statement and it should suggest the degree to which the new treaty regime remains vulnerable to Panamanian discontent.

Supporters of the proposed Panama Canal treaties often concede their colonialist features but argue that the new arrangements are a definite improvement over the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty and that they move as far in an "enlightened" direction as American public opinion will tolerate. Furthermore, the claim is made that the failure to satisfy Panamanian aspirations to some extent by a new treaty of the sort proposed would lead to a serious wave of anti-American bloodshed, including possible sabotage against the Canal. These agreements, then, are claimed by their supporters to be instances of politics as to art of the possible. Such a pragmatic defense is filled with dubious, unexamined presuppositions, especially the conviction that a wait of 23 years before American troops leave Panama will prove acceptable or that a regime of permanent protective custody administered from Washington is preferable to the present arrangement.

The evidence at my disposal suggests that Panamanian nationalists are neither satisfied nor appeased by the 1977 treaties. It is one thing to struggle against a colonial heritage that arose at the beginning of the century. It is quite another to lend substantial legitimacy to the colonial character of the relationship late in the twentieth century. To dramatize such reasons Leopoldo Aragon, a former political prisoner who was expelled from Panama by Torrijos, burned himself to death in Stockholm outside the American Embassy in protest against the treaties on September 1, 1977. One of the most widely known and respected political figures in Panama is Miguel Antonio Bernal, also living abroad in exile, who has denounced the new treaty as being "very far from fulfilling the aspirations of the Panamanian people."

Bernal argues that proposed arrangements replace the 1903 "perpetuity" imposed by force with a "legalized perpetuity". Bernal indicts the Torrijos regime for conferring legality on the American presence and on a permanent right of intervention: "We consider this as the most aberrant, disgraceful, and unacceptable type of perpetuity, as a stigma that this generation and future ones will be forced to bear, for it legalizes the American presence on our soil." Furthermore, Bernal reminds "the Panamanian and American governments, which have been working hand in glove, that the disappointment and dissatisfaction of a people can only be followed by hatred and rebellion"; the treaty represents "one of the worst concessions in Panamanian history, because it flies in the face of the struggle and sacrifices of our people for seventy-three years." (Interview with Bernal, Aug. 24, 1977, published in Intercontinental Press, Sept. 12, 1977, pp. 974-5.) It is crucial to listen to such responses to these proposed treaties before definitely enmeshing the United States in what is likely to be a turbulent future in Panama.

Such Panamanian reactions to the treaties gain some additional credibility by the extent to which the 1977 agreements win support from individuals such as Admiral Zumwalt and William F. Buckley, that is, from individuals who are normally associated with an aggressive U.S. foreign policy that makes no sentimental or idealistic concessions to Third World positions. And it is clear that this support, as well as that from opposition figures such as Gerald Ford or Henry Kissinger, is based on the conviction that, indeed, the new treaties effectively maintain (rather than transform) the American role with respect to the Canal. Such an impression is also fostered by Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher's almost gleeful insistence that "According to the Joint Chiefs, these treaties are not only as good as the existing arrangement in terms of our national security, they are far better." ("Deputy Secretary Christopher Discusses the Panama Canal Treaties," "State Dep't. Bull." Dec. 12, 1977, at p. 836.)

Part of the confusion about the treaties arises because General Torrijos has been quite successful in his campaign to project a leftist, nationalist image, especially here in the United States. And it is true that Torrijos built his political base by claiming nationalist and social reformist credentials. Increasingly, these earlier features of his rule seem to have opportunistic trappings and his true political inclinations seem associated with personal power and wealth. An examination of his recent governing policies reveal a rightist drift that includes opening the country to foreign investment, siphoning off a personal fortune for his family and coterie, an abysmal human rights record, and the increasing alienation of progressive elements in his own society necessitating repression. As one Latin American expert concludes, "... the odds are that Torrijos's leftism and nationalism will erode and the lineaments of a classic personalistic Latin American dictatorship not interfering with the social and economic status quo will emerge." (Martin Needler, "Omar Torrijos: The Panamanian Enigma," "Intellect," Feb. 1977, p. 243.) The same author even suggests that Torrijos is following a path strikingly similar to that of the Cuban dictator Batista, who also started out as a populist reformer but moved right to satisfy personal greed and meet economic pressures. It has often been noted that whatever happens in Cuba will eventually occur, as well as in Panama.

In essence, then, the advantages of the new treaty are not apparent to those Panamanians who have been struggling against the American colonial presence in their country. Their opposition raises serious doubts about that part of the pragmatic position that argues that this treaty is better than the 1903 arrangements. It also suggests skepticism about the other part of the pragmatic position which argues that with the 1977 concessions American interests in the Canal can be reconciled with Panamanian aspirations.

These concerns can be further clarified in relation to the intervention issue, what virtually all sides of the American debate concede to be the "Achilles heel" of the 1977 agreements. In the foreground, is the necessity to say one thing to reassure the Panamanians that their sovereignty has not been infringed and quite another to reassure Americans that a right of intervention will persist even after the removal of American troops in 1999. To obtain ratification in the United States, Senators require as much reassurance as possible that the U.S. retains permanent, discretionary interventionary rights to uphold its interests in the Canal. Since the negotiated text was agreed upon last August various steps have been taken to provide some added reassurance for the American side, including the October 14 "Carter-Torrijos Understanding" and the apparent willingness of General Torrijos, as conveyed to Senator Baker during his January 1978 visit to Panama, to have the substance of this Understanding added to the treaty by way of formal amendment. Torrijos has been much praised by American politicians for his "flexibility" in these respects. As dictator in Panama Torrijos does not have to obtain any genuine assent from Panamanian lawmakers to assure ratification. However, tilting the treaty even further in the American direction exposes the colonial features and thereby strengthens anti-treaty sentiments in Panama.

As is well-known the non-intervention norm is for Latin Americans practically synonymous with sovereignty itself. To grant the United States a permanent, unilateral right to intervene in Panama to uphold its view of what is needed to assure the neutrality of the Canal is assuredly inconsistent with even moderate nationalist aspirations in Panama. It is no wonder that Panamanian demonstrations against the treaty contend that Torrijos has accepted a colonial status for Panama, evidently renouncing Panama's sovereign rights for a few Yankee dollars.

Even before the American pressure for reassurance on interventionary rights mounted the treaty was necessarily ambiguous on this crucial issue. From the very beginning, Administration spokesmen sought to quiet conservative critics of the treaty in this country by maintaining that a unilateral right of intervention was implicit in the 1977 arrangements even if it was not spelled out. For instance, earlier in these hearings Secretary of Defense Harold Brown responding to a question by Senator Stone as to whether the United States could intervene to deal with an internal situation in Panama that it believed might threaten the neutral operation of the Canal had this to say:

"My reading of that situation and of the language of the neutrality treaty is that a threat to the neutral regime would give us the right to take whatever action we considered necessary . . ." (Panama Canal Treaties, Hearings, Part 1, Administration Witnesses, p. 169.)

Secretary Brown added that such an interpretation was what General Torrijos had in mind when he acknowledged at the signing ceremony in Washington on September 7, 1977 that by agreeing to the Neutrality Treaty Panama was placing itself under the "protective umbrella of the Pentagon." (p. 170) Significantly, Torrijos went on to say this pact could, if not administered judiciously by future generations, become an "instrument of permanent intervention." (Statement of General Torrijos, Dept. of State Bull., Oct. 17, 1977, p. 482) Ambassador Linowitz also supported this view of American rights by stressing that there was "no limitation" on U.S. rights: There is nothing which says that threat is to be limited to a particular type of threat. (Hearings, p. 481.)

Problems emerged because the Panamanian negotiators back home were giving their own version of the U.S. role. Speaking before the Panama National Assembly, Romulo Escobar, the chief Panamanian negotiator, indicated that the U.S. role did not extend to situations threatening the Canal that arose out of problems of "internal order." General Torrijos also speaking in Panama stated that the Neutrality Treaty meant that "If we are attacked by superior forces, the United States is obliged to come to our defense." Somewhat self-consciously, he explained "that a weak country like Panama needs the protection of a major power if we are attacked by superior forces." (N.Y. Times, Oct. 21, 1977.) And reassuringly added that nothing in the treaties gave the United States any rights to take action in relation to internal strife in Panama.

Surely, these two sets of reassurances are contradictory in spirit, and the treaty text is ambiguous enough to make them both plausible. Rational pro-treaty forces in the United States understood the necessity of the ambiguity. Even the conservative National Review wrote an editorial in which it indicated that its pro-treaty position was premised on an unlimited, discretionary "right of intervention," but that it understood why such a right couldn't be spelled out. ("The Right to Intervene," National Review, Nov. 25, 1977, pp. 1347-48.) The dominican operation of 1965, it pointed out, enabled U.S. troops quell a domestic threat of radicalism without ever having to defend its action by claiming a right to intervene. On that occasion, the Organization of American States, after some pressuring, granted the U.S. an approprate fig leaf justification. In the Panama Canal context all that is necessary, the editorial argues, is that future U.S. leaders understand and act upon their right of intervention should the occasion arise, whether the threat is internal or external. Ambassador Linowitz gave an interesting demonstration of how a future international lawyer might deal with the touchy issue of intervention if the occasion ever arose:

"Q. Under what conditions would we intervene in the canal to protect the neutrality?"

"Ambassador Linowitz. I don't like the word intervene. Under what conditions would we be in a position to move? The answer is if the permanent neutrality of the canal were jeopardized—

"Q. Who would decide that?"

"Ambassador Linowitz. We would. Then the United States would be in the position to take such steps as might be deemed necessary." (Press Briefing, White House, Aug. 12, 1977, "Dept. of State Bull.," Oct. 17, 1977, p. 529.)

The interventionary right is endorsed in the Statement of Understanding by conferring upon the United States an unrestricted right to defend the neutrality of the Canal without securing the prior assent of the Panamanian government. It is true that the Statement of Understanding retains an element of ambiguity by expressly stating that the Neutrality Treaty shall not be "interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of Panama." (for text see Hearings, p. 454.)

This continuing element of ambiguity, given plausible developments in Panama, including the possibilities of a left-turn in Panamanian politics, might place future American leaders in a difficult, dangerous situation. It is worth recalling that the "ambiguity" in the Geneva Accords of 1954 encouraged Hanoi and Washington to proceed, each on reasonable grounds, in contradictory directions that culminated in the Vietnam War. (see e.g. J.N. Moore, "Law and the Indochina War," Princeton, 1972, esp. pp. 353—478.) The North Vietnamese regarded the Geneva Accords as settling the future of all of Vietnam after a two-year interval enabling an "honorable" French withdrawal, while the Americans construed the agreements as partitioning Vietnam into two states thereby giving South Vietnam full sovereign rights to make whatever arrangements it saw fit to defend itself against internal and external enemies.

The Vietnam analogy is instructive in one other respect. The United States converted the ambiguity into "a commitment" to the Saigon regime that, then, took on a life of its own. It was widely argued that a refusal to uphold the Vietnam commitment, however foolish it might have been to make it in the first instance, would damage the reputation of the United States as an ally and an alliance leader. Here, the commitment to defend the "neutrality" of the Canal is also likely to assume a symbolic standing that may induce American leaders to honor it even when they realize that it is foolish and costly to do so.

The ambiguous point in the Panama treaties is vital to the bargain. If the ambiguity is resolved in Panama's favor, then it becomes non-ratifiable in the United States. The reason for this insistence is easy to understand. The main threat to American interests in the Canal comes from the possibility of internal developments in Panama. the prospect of an external invasion seems remote to the point of irrelevance, and in that eventuality, Panama would almost certainly welcome whatever help it could get. However, to legitimate an interventionary right in relation to a Dominican-type situation in Panama would be a perpetuation of a colonial relationship.

Neither alternative seems very desirable. In the first instance, the treaty bargain is ambiguous and each side is convinced that its view of the treaty terms is the authoritative one. In the second instance, the interventionary right is evidently endorsed in its plenary form and the treaty becomes an immediate target for Panamanian nationalist attack. The surfacing of this dilemma raises some deep questions that have been kept off the agenda of debate so far. The main such question is whether it is feasible or beneficial for the United States to insist upon a colonial role for itself in the Canal that extends into the next century. Such a role seems likely to entangle us on the reactionary side of Panamanian politics, as well as to risk involvement in a series of unpopular violent struggles. The situation in Panama is very unstable; rapid population growth, a highly inequitable distribution of wealth, growing unemployment, heavy foreign indebtedness, an adverse trade balance, and a long tradition of militant oppositional politics.

Under all these circumstances would it not be better and cheaper to leave the Canal to the Panamanians? Have not the British been lucky to be free since 1956 from the burdens and prerogatives associated with their prior administration of the Suez Canal? The Panamanians need Canal revenues so badly that it is difficult to imagine that they would interfere with transit rights, and in the unlikely event of such interference action appropriate to the circumstance could be taken whether authorized by treaty or not.

I believe the treaties before this Committee, although intended as a positive contribution to international peace and security, are an anachronism. Their only justification is a continuing insistence that the United States must dominate the Caribbean-Gulf of Mexico area as, in Hanson Baldwin's words, a "mare nostrum of the United States." (see argument contra 1977 treaties to this effect by Baldwin, "The Panama Canal: Sovereignty and Security," "American Enterprise Institute Defense Review," No. 44, 1977, pp. 12-35, at p. 12.) If such an objective is indeed a national goal, then Baldwin is probably right to oppose even the gradual withdrawal of U.S. military presence implicit in the 1977 treaties. If such a goal is indeed anachronistic, then the treaties do not go nearly far enough in according Panama sovereign rights nor in disentangling the United States from responsibility for the future of the Canal, in the direction of affirming Panamanian national rights in relation to the Canal, nor in relinquishing U.S. rights, nor do they proceed at a rapid enough pace.

George Kennan, sensitive to the difficulties of going part way on the Canal, proposes "turning the canal over entirely to the Panamanians." (George F. Kennan, "The Cloud of Uncertain Danger," Princeton, 1977, p. 53). He is convinced that the Canal is no longer militarily or commercially important enough for the United States to justify the burdens of joint administration and defenses. In light of this geopolitical reality, Kennan argues that it places the United States in an exposed, risky, and unpopular position to maintain its role in the Canal. And so he concludes, as follows: "The retirement of the United States from the canal and all that hangs together with it has been the indignant demand of the whole Latin American community for years on end. If the United States should find it advantageous at this point (and it is my belief that it would) to yield to this demand, it would be acting on a sober and realistic judgment of its own interests." (Kennan, 58). It is sad that Kennan's view, which proceeds from rather conservative principles of assessing U.S. interests, has not even been seriously considered in the public debate. I would go further than Kennan and argue that it would not only be advantageous for the United States to end its special role in the Canal, but that it would be a positive contribution to the construction of a viable system of world order.

It seems clear that there are several options that should be compared in the context of the present debate:

- (1) retaining the 1903 arrangements;
- (2) ratifying the 1977 proposed treaties;
- (3) modifying the 1977 proposed treaties by shortening the transition period, by renouncing any unilateral rights to use force, and by giving Panama an option after U.S. withdrawal to terminate any arrangements of joint defense;
- (4) retiring from the Canal altogether and giving Panama total responsibility.

So far the debate has been limited to a controversy between positions (1) and (2) with a heavy effort by the Carter Administration to incorporate enough elements pleasing to advocates of (1) to build a ratifying consensus in support of (2), i.e., (2) has been modified to make it more similar to (1). I believe that U.S. and world interests would be better served by adoption of positions (3) or (4), possibly by a combination of both, i.e. an interim treaty providing for U.S. withdrawal over a period of 10-15 years.

In the end, pro-treaty forces fall back on their contention that a failure to ratify would produce dire results. This prediction is not convincing if the United States were to take some mitigating actions such as extending Panama the financial benefits expected to accompany the 1977 arrangements and initiating a serious study of the retirement option. It is evident from General Torrijos' remarks on various occasions that he would much prefer a treaty that went much further in according Panama full sovereign rights.

It is true, of course, that the narrow range of acceptable debate seems to have foreclosed consideration of such an option at this time. Again we should recall from our recent past that foreclosing options in this way is not conducive to rational behavior in world affairs. It defers the day of reckoning, but makes the reckoning worse when it occurs. I fear that we are dealing with the Panama Canal in a reckless, sentimental fashion, fashioning "a solution" that will bring grief to ourselves and the Panamanians.

All of these considerations lead me to oppose ratification of the 1977 proposed Panama Canal Treaties.

STATEMENT OF PROF. R. R. BAXTER

The three major questions of international law to which the conclusion of the New Panama Canal Treaties gives rise are:

1. What rights which the United States now enjoys with respect to the Panama Canal Zone will be relinquished to Panama under the terms of the new Panama Canal Treaties?

2. What rights will the United States and other countries enjoy under the new Panama Canal Treaties with respect to passage of merchant vessels and governmental ships other than warships?

3. What rights will the United States have to assure the availability of the Panama Canal to its warships and the protection of the Canal?

These three issues will be taken up in turn.

I. The existing rights of the United States in the Canal Zone.

The rights of the United States in the Canal Zone now derive from Articles II and III of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903. Article II grants to the United States "in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of said Canal [referred to in the Preamble of the Treaty] of the width of ten miles * * *". Article III then grants to the United States "all rights, power and authority * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory * * * to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

Throughout the history of the Canal, the United States has acknowledged that the Panama Canal Zone remains subject to Panamanian sovereignty. As early as 1904, Secretary of State John Hay responded to Panamanian assertions of continued "titular sovereignty" over the Zone by observing that, in view of the United States plenary power under the Treaty of 1903, any such "titular sovereignty" could only be "a barren scepter." Letter to J. D. de Obaldia, Minister of Panama, [1904], 1 Foreign Rel. U.S. 613 (1904). In the following year, Secretary of State Taft wrote to President Roosevelt:

"The truth is that while we have all the attributes of sovereignty necessary in the construction, maintenance, and protection of the canal, the very form in which these attributes are conferred in the treaty [of 1903] seems to preserve the titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the Republic of Panama." Letter of January 12, 1905, reprinted in Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, S. Doc. 401, 59th Cong., 2d Sess. pp. 2392-93, 2399 (vol. III), 32 Senate Documents (1907, 59th Cong., 2d Sess.) 2392-93, 2399.

The letter was sent by President Roosevelt to the Congress with the first annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

The distinction between titular and effective sovereignty was finally given formal recognition in Article III of the General Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation between the United States and Panama of 1936, which stated that the Canal Zone constituted "territory of the Republic of Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States of America." 53 Stat. 1807, T.S. No. 945.

In 1959, Deputy Under Secretary of State Merchant stated that he had assured the President of the Republic of Panama "that the policy of the United States Government with respect to the status of the Canal Zone remains as it had been stated more than 50 years ago to the effect that the United States recognizes that titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone remains in the Government of Panama." 41 Dep't State Bull. 859 (1959). President Eisenhower at the same time ordered the Panamanian flag flown within the Canal Zone as "visual evidence that Panama does have titular sovereignty over the region." Eisenhower, "Public Papers of the Presidents," 1959, 785, 794.

United States courts have frequently been called upon to consider the Canal Zone's legal status, but the cases have always arisen in a domestic legislative context. Pronouncements that the Zone is "a territory or possession of the United States" or that it is "foreign territory" are therefore nothing more than judicial determinations of Congressional intent concerning the applicability of particular United States statutes to the Canal Zone. In Luckenbach Steamship Co. v. United States, 280 U.S. 173 (1929), for example, the Supreme Court expressly avoided the international law question of "titular sovereignty" and made clear that its determination that the Canal Zone ports were "foreign" was only for purposes of construing the statute governing the Postmaster General's rate setting for mail carriage. Id. at 177-178. Other frequently cited cases are similarly circumscribed. The Court's assertion in Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24 (1907) that "It is hypercritical to contend that * * * the [Canal Zone] does not belong to this Nation * * *", Id. at 33, amounts only to a holding that, for purposes of the Panama Canal Act of 1902, the United States possessed a sufficient interest in the Canal Zone to authorize the Government's expenditure of tax revenues for the building of the canal. By the same token, the statement of the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Husband R. (Roach), 453 F.2d 1054 (1971), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 935 (1972), that "The Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States," 453 F.2d at 1057, occurs in the context of a decision defining the domestic legislative authority of Congress with respect to the Canal Zone; it does not purport to address the question of sovereignty over the Canal Zone in an international sense.

The Supreme Court did, however, refer to the Canal Zone's international legal status in Vermilya-Brown Co., Inc. v. Connell, 335 U.S. 377 (1948). The Court held the Fair Labor Standards Act to be applicable to United States employees on bases leased from the United Kingdom in Bermuda, notwithstanding statutory language making the Act applicable only to "territories" or "possessions" of the United States. The Court cited precedents for application of the Act in territories over which the United States was not sovereign, noting that the Act had been applied "to the Canal Zone, admittedly territory over which we do not have sovereignty," 335 U.S. at 381. The reference to the Canal Zone is clearly dictum, but it is deserving of notice as a rare Supreme Court statement on the question of international sovereignty.

The United States thus never acquired "sovereignty" over the Panama Canal Zone but only rights within the terms of the various treaty arrangements between the United States and Panama, beginning with the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903. The area at all times remained subject to the titular sovereignty of Panama. The relinquishment by the United States of rights under the existing treaties, pursuant to Article 1, paragraph 1, of the new Panama Canal Treaty, will thus not be a surrender of sovereignty by the United States but a retrocession of certain rights to the Republic of Panama. The continuing sovereignty of Panama over the Zone is recognized in the Preamble of the new Treaty, wherein the United States "Acknowledg[es] the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory."

II. The rights of the United States and other users under the new Panama Canal Treaties.

The legal guarantees now afforded to users of the Canal are to be found in Article III of the Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom to Facilitate the Construction of a Ship Canal of 1901 (the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty), as incorporated into the Isthmian Canal Convention between the United States and Panama of 1903 by Article XVIII thereof. The portion of Article III of the Treaty of 1901 pertinent to the passage of merchant vessels provides:

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship Canal, the following Rules, substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these Rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. * * *

Secretaries of State have in the past expressed the view that third states other than the Republic of Panama and the United Kingdom have no rights under the Treaties of 1901 and 1903. Charles Evans Hughes wrote to President Harding that "other nations . . . not being parties to the [Hay-Pauncefote] treaty have no rights under it" (5 Hackworth, Digest of International Law 221-222 (1943)), and Secretary of State Dulles said in 1956: "And there is no international treaty giving other countries any rights at all in the Panama Canal except for a treaty with the United Kingdom which provides that it has the right to have the same tolls for its vessels as for ours." In practical terms, he said, a large number of countries rely on the Suez Canal, but no country in the world fears that its economy would be jeopardized by possible misuse or abuse of United States rights in the Canal (3 Whiteman, Digest of International Law 1150 (1964)).

Under the new Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, substantially the same regime as under the Treaties of 1901 and 1903 will be maintained for the Canal. The relevant portions of Articles II and III of the Neutrality Treaty provide:

"ARTICLE II

"The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the Canal in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there will be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, concerning the conditions or charges of transit, or for any other reason, and so that the Canal, and therefore the Isthmus of Panama, shall not be the target of reprisals in any armed conflict between other nations of the world. The foregoing shall be subject to the following requirements:

"(a) Payment of tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services, provided they have been fixed in conformity with the provisions of Article III (c);

"(b) Compliance with applicable rules and regulations, provided such rules and regulations are applied in conformity with the provisions of Article III;

"(c) The requirement that transiting vessels commit no acts of hostility while in the Canal; and

"(d) Such other conditions and restrictions as are established by this Treaty.

"ARTICLE III

"1. For purposes of the security, efficiency and proper maintenance of the Canal the following rules shall apply:

"(a) The Canal shall be operated efficiently in accordance with conditions of transit through the Canal, and rules and regulations that shall be just, equitable and reasonable, and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal;

"(b) Ancillary services necessary for transit through the Canal shall be provided;

"(d) Tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services shall be just, reasonable, equitable and consistent with the principles of international law;"

It will be observed that the significant duties incorporated in Article II are assumed by the Republic of Panama. However, under Article IV:

"The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties."

The duties assumed by Panama thus seem to rest upon the United States as well under the terms of Article IV.

The rights of users under both the 1901 and 1903 Treaties and the new Panama Canal Treaties fall in the following categories:

a. Neutralization of the Canal.

The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty states that the rules in Article III of that Treaty are on the basis of the "neutralization" of the Canal, while the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty provides that the "Canal * * * shall be neutral in perpetuity."

The new Neutrality Treaty contains a declaration by Panama in Article I that "the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this Treaty." Under Article IV, "The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, * * *"

The regime of permanent neutrality established by the Treaties of 1901 and 1903 is maintained and confirmed in the new Neutrality Treaty.

b. The Canal to be Free and Open.

Rule 1 of Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty provides that "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these Rules." Under Article II of the new Neutrality Treaty, the neutrality of the Canal is declared "in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations," subject to four lettered requirements concerning payment of tolls and other charges, compliance with applicable rules and regulations, and a duty not to commit acts of hostility within the Canal, as well as other conditions and restrictions established by the Treaty.

It will be observed that the formula of 1901 and 1903 is that the Canal, as well as other conditions and restrictions established by the Treaty.

It will be observed that the formula of 1901 and 1903 is that the Canal is to be "free and open," while the Neutrality Treaty stipulates that it is to be "secure and open." Some refinement of meaning was undoubtedly intended, but the nuance is of the kind that means much more to the negotiators than to those to whom the Treaty is directed. "Free" does seem to provide greater security to the user than does "secure," which places emphasis on the interests of Panama, although it may be contended that the security of the Canal is likewise intended for the benefit of users.

c. Equality and Non-discrimination.

The Canal, under the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, is to be free and open "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any . . . nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise." The neutrality of the Canal is declared by Article II of the Neutrality Treaty in order that the Canal may be open to "peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation." The obligation of Panama appears to be the same under both the Neutrality Treaty and under the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, which incorporated by reference the Rules laid down in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

d. The Justice, Reasonableness, and Equitable Character of the Rules of Transit.

Rule 1 of Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty provides that the "conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." Paragraph 1(a) of the Neutrality Treaty stipulates that the "Canal shall be operated . . . in accordance with conditions of transit through the Canal, and rules and regulations that shall be just, equitable and reasonable, and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal." The interests of users appear to be given greater protection by the broadening of the language to include the concept of "reasonableness" and by placing a limitation on the purpose for which the rules are promulgated to "safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal."

e. Standards for Tolls.

Under the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, "charges of traffic shall be just and equitable," while under the new treaty, "Tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services shall be just, reasonable, equitable and consistent with the principles of international law."

The proliferation of detail in the new Neutrality Treaty, in particular the requirement that tolls and charges be "reasonable" and "consistent with the principles of international law," enhances the protection of the rights of users. The term "reasonable" imparts a greater objectivity to the standard than is provided by the terms "just" and "equitable". "Just" is the vaguest of the terms. "Equitable" might be taken to mean equitable to the territorial sovereign of the Canal, Panama, or may have some of the coloring of non-discriminatory. The standard of reasonableness is an objective one, commonly employed in connection with rate regulation, and is more weighted toward the interests of users than are the terms "just" and "equitable."

The requirement of consistency with "the principles of international law" has the beneficial effect of permitting the parties to a dispute or a third-party decision-maker to invoke precedents in the form of arrangements made with respect to other international waterways, particularly interoceanic canals.

The Neutrality Treaty creates rights enforceable by the United States and the Republic of Panama, each against the other, to allow "peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations." But to what extent may third states themselves claim and enforce rights on behalf of their vessels under the new Neutrality Treaty?

Notwithstanding the earlier statements by Secretary of State Hughes and Secretary of State Dulles concerning the position of third states, it appears that third states, not parties to the Neutrality Treaty, may themselves claim rights under that agreement. The first basis for this view is that they are third-party beneficiaries under the Neutrality Treaty. Article 36, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969, to which the United States is not a party but which is widely regarded as reflecting contemporary customary international law, provides:

"A right arises for a third State from a provision of a treaty if the parties to the treaty intend the provision to accord that right either to the third State, or to a group of States to which it belongs, or to all States, and the third State assents thereto. Its assent shall be presumed so long as the contrary is not indicated, unless the treaty otherwise provides."

Conditions on the exercise of the right are referred to in paragraph 2:

"A State exercising a right in accordance with paragraph 1 shall comply with the conditions for its exercise provided for in the treaty or established in conformity with the treaty."

The statement in the Neutrality Treaty that Panama declares the Canal secure and open "to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations" appears intended to confer a right on "all nations," not simply on the parties to the Protocol to the Neutrality Treaty.

The second possible basis for the rights of third states is the fact that a unilateral declaration by a state may give rise to rights to be enjoyed by the states to which the declaration is addressed. In the French Nuclear Tests case, [1974] I.C.J. Rep. 253, 267, the International Court of Justice stated:

"When it is the intention of the State making the declaration that it should be bound according to its terms, that intention confers on the declaration the character of a legal undertaking, the State being thenceforth legally required to follow a course of conduct consistent with the declaration. An undertaking of this kind, if given publicly, and with an intent to be bound, even though not made within the context of international negotiations, is binding. In these circumstances, nothing in the nature of a quid pro quo nor any subsequent acceptance of the declaration, not even any reply or reaction from other States, is required for the declaration to take effect, since such a requirement would be inconsistent with the strictly unilateral nature of the juridical act by which the pronouncement of the State was made."

Although the obligations of Panama are assumed in a bilateral treaty with the United States, Article II of the Neutrality Treaty is in form of unilateral declaration by Panama ("The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the Canal . . ."). That declaration, without more, creates rights in other states, since the declaration seems to have been made with the intention that it should be binding.

This conclusion is not invalidated by the existence of the Protocol to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. Under that instrument the Contracting Parties will "agree to observe and respect the regime of permanent neutrality of the Canal in time of war as in time of peace, and to ensure that vessels of their registry strictly observe the applicable rules" (Art. II). The Contracting Parties will thereby undertake individual obligations to respect the regime of the Canal which, in the absence of the Protocol, would only be conditions on the right to use the Canal conferred by the Neutrality Treaty. The effect of the Protocol is thus to convert conditions into promises.

Actually, the new Treaties will do no more than to make specific obligations resting upon both the Republic of Panama and the United States under customary international law. In "The S.S. Wimbledon," P.C.I.J., ser. A. No. 1 (1923), the Permanent Court of International Justice spoke of the Kiel Canal as "an artificial waterway connecting two open seas [which] has been permanently dedicated to the use of the whole world" (at 28). The dedication in that case came through the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, whereby the Canal was thrown open to navigation by the ships of all nations. The corresponding dedication in the case of the Panama Canal was effected through the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 and the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903. Dedication alone may not be sufficient and should be followed by reliance by the international community in general before third states may with sound legal basis rely on that dedication to free and open use. That reliance has long since taken place in the case of the Panama Canal.

At the present time, the right of free and open passage through the Panama Canal has thus been established in customary international law through the dedication effected by the Treaties of 1901 and 1903 and exists independently of those treaties. The new Panama Canal Treaties will provide a more refined and precise definition of these rights.

III. The rights of the United States to protect the canal and to assure the unfettered passage of its warships.

A. The Concept of Neutralization.

As has been observed earlier in this statement, the Republic of Panama will, under the terms of the new Neutrality Treaty, declare that "the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral" (Art. I). The Canal is, of course, already "neutralized." The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty states that the rules of Article III of the Treaty are on the basis of the "neutralization" of the Canal, while the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty provides that the "Canal . . . shall be neutral in perpetuity."

The terms "neutrality" and "neutralization" have always been used in a somewhat Pickwickian sense when applied to interoceanic canals such as the Panama Canal. In general, the neutralization of territory would mean that the territorial sovereign would be precluded from taking any measures, such as the building of defenses, there and that all states recognizing the status would be obliged to refrain from military activities there. In the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, on the other hand, "neutralization" rests on the basis of a number of rules, ranging from a requirement of non-discriminatory tolls to the duty of belligerents to refrain from acts of hostility within the Canal. It was even suggested by Sir Edward Grey during the tolls controversy between the United States and the United Kingdom before the First World War that "neutralization must refer to the system of equal rights." [1912] Foreign Relations of the U.S. 481-489, quoted in N. Padelford, The Panama Canal in Peace and War 35 (1943). The term "neutralization" is thus used synoptically to refer to the whole regime of the Canal. The "neutrality" of the Canal proclaimed in the new Neutrality Treaty is likewise linked to the rules and conditions for use of the Canal.

Nothing in the Treaty of 1901 or the Treaty of 1903 has stood in the way of defense or fortification of the Panama Canal. It has been closed to the warships and merchant ships of enemies of the United States in both World Wars, and restrictions were placed on neutral shipping. The neutrality of the Panama Canal thus does not preclude the United States—or under the new Treaties, the Republic of Panama—from taking belligerent measures in the Canal and in the area of the Canal when either state is at war.

The Neutrality Treaty incorporates a requirement that “transiting vessels commit no acts of hostility while in the Canal.” Art. II, para. (c). In this respect the Treaty carries forward the obligation already imposed on transiting vessels under Article III, Rule 2, of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty: “The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.” The Protocol to the Neutrality Treaty will make this duty of transiting vessels or condition on passage into a legal duty incumbent upon the states whose vessels use the Canal “to observe and respect the regime of permanent neutrality of the Canal in time of war as in time of peace, and to ensure that vessels of their registry strictly observe applicable rules.” The duties of states and of transiting vessels “in time of war” would appear to interpose no obstacles to measures that might be taken by the operator of the Panama Canal to close the canal to warships and merchant ships of states enemies to the operator of the Canal and to neutral ships carrying contraband to and from the enemy.

B. Protection of the Canal.

Article IV of the new Panama Canal Treaty provides that before 2000 the United States will have the primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal, with subsidiary responsibility resting upon Panama. Both countries will be required to act to repel armed attack or any other threats to the security of the Canal or ships transiting it. The two parties are to form a Combined Board of senior military representatives to consult on all matters relating to the protection and defense of the Canal and to plan actions to be taken by the parties in concert. These combined arrangements are not to inhibit the “lines of authority” of the parties’ respective armed forces.

Until 2000, the United States may station military forces within Panama in conformity with the rights and limitations de-

Panama Canal Treaty. The United States is to “endeavor to maintain” its forces during “normal times” at a level not in excess of that prior to the entry into force of the Treaty, to the extent consistent with its primary responsibility to defend the Canal. In other words, it would be within the discretion of the United States to increase the level of forces when it perceived an emergency or threat to the Canal. Whether the United States may act unilaterally to protect the regime of neutrality is not addressed explicitly in the Panama Canal Treaty. However, the interpretation that it may be consistent with the discretion granted to the United States to decide troop levels and the primary responsibility placed upon it to defend the Canal. This view is held by the chief United States negotiators of the Panama Canal Treaty. Hearings on the Panama Canal Treaties Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 32-33 (1977) (Statement by Ambassadors Bunker and Linowitz) [hereinafter cited as Hearings]. Moreover, under the Neutrality Treaty, each party may act independently to defend the Canal. See discussion infra.

After the expiration of the Panama Canal Treaty, the Neutrality Treaty alone will govern the protection of the Canal. Both the United States and Panama are to maintain the regime of neutrality notwithstanding other subsequent treaty commitments.

Only Panama will maintain “military forces, defense sites, and military installations within its territory.” This stipulation requires the removal of the United States military presence and indicates that Panama may not invite a foreign state to introduce military forces into its territory either informally or pursuant to a treaty. However, the blanket exclusion of foreign military forces and installations must be balanced with the overriding goal of keeping the Canal open and with the obligations of the United States to defend the Canal, a task which, as a practical matter, would be impossible in certain situations without the reintroduction of troops.

The Neutrality Treaty places no limitations on the discretion of each party to the Treaty to identify a threat to the neutrality of the Canal or to select methods which they may employ to deter dangers to the neutrality of the waterway. One implication of unilateral decision-making is that the United States may act contrary to

Panama's wishes or directly against it if, in the opinion of the United States, Panama's actions endanger the neutrality of the Canal. (Statement by Ambassador Linowitz, id. at 27.)

In order to clarify the interpretation which the parties gave to their rights under the Neutrality Treaty, President Carter and General Torrijos issued a Statement of Understanding (Understanding) on October 14, 1977. It states that

"Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity of political independence of Panama."

The first paragraph recognizes the rights of unilateral action including the use of force, in the event of threats to navigation through the Canal, while the second paragraph limits such action on the part of the United States to the purposes referred to in the Understanding. The prohibition of actions infringing upon the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama must be interpreted in such a way as to allow the United States to fulfill its obligation to meet aggression directed against the Canal.

That the Understanding is an authoritative interpretation of the Neutrality Treaty may be established in three ways. The Statement of Understanding is a binding agreement between the United States and Panama. Even if it were not to be regarded as itself an international agreement, the Understanding still would form part of the travaux préparatoires of the Neutrality Treaty or subsequent practice under that Treaty.

A treaty need not be formal in form or style. The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties defines a treaty in Article 2, paragraph 1(a), as "an international agreement concluded between States in written form and governed by international law, whether embodied in a single instrument or in two or more related instruments and whatever its particular designation." (U.N. Doc. A/CONF. 39/27 reprint ed in 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 875 (1969) and 8 Int'l Leg. Mat. 679 (1969))

The International Law Commission stated, in its commentary to this article when it was in the form of a draft that "very many single instruments in daily use, such as an 'agreed minute' or a 'memorandum of understanding,' could not appropriately be called formal instruments, but they are undoubtedly international agreements subject to the law of treaties." Report of the International Law Commission to the General Assembly, 21 U.N. GAOR, Supp. (No. 9) 21, U.N. Doc. A/6309/Rev. 1 (1965) (emphasis added). Neither the Vienna Convention nor the commentaries require that a document must be signed by representatives of the parties in order to constitute a "treaty."

In addition, two decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Court of Justice have found informal unilateral statements by high officials to states as to the intentions and policy of their governments to place binding obligations upon those states. In the Legal Status of Eastern Greenland case the Permanent Court of International Justice held binding an oral declaration later written and initiated by the Norwegian Minister of Foreign Affairs, advising his Danish counterpart that "the plans of the Royal Danish Government respecting Danish sovereignty over the whole of Greenland * * * would meet with no difficulty on the part of Norway." [1933] P.C.I.J. ser. A/B, No. 53.

As a result, later Norwegian steps to occupy parts of Greenland were held unlawful. The Court based its holding on the negotiating context in which the statements were made; Norway had made its assurances in response to a Danish request and had in return received Danish assurances.

Later, in the French Nuclear Tests cases, the International Court of Justice held binding even unilateral declarations in the form of statements made outside of the negotiating context and without the receipt of reciprocal assurances. The Court required only that the declaration be made publicly and "with an intent to be bound;" nothing in the nature of a quid pro quo or subsequent reply was necessary. Nuclear Tests (Australia v. France), [1974] I.C.J. Rep. 253, 267.

According to the standards of the Nuclear Tests cases and the stricter Eastern Greenland case, the bilateral Understanding appears a fortiori to be a binding obligation. It was issued at a meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos which was held for the purpose of negotiating and drafting such a statement. Its official release was accompanied by a press conference in Panama by the Chief Panamanian negotiator and appearances in the United States by the two Chief United States negotiators to explain the function and meaning of the Understanding to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The validity of the Understanding as an international agreement under United States domestic law remains to be considered. Two issues must be addressed: first, whether the Understanding will be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent in conjunction with the other Panama Canal Treaties; and second, whether such a submission to the Senate is required.

In hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Ambassador Linowitz asserted that the Understanding was a "part of the record." Id. at 455-456. He and Ambassador Bunker testified in detail as to the background, meaning, and implication of the document. However, the Understanding will not be appended in a physical sense to the agreements submitted to the Senate. Id. Yet, the Understanding has been and will in all likelihood continue to be a subject of discussion in the Senate as an authoritative interpretation of the Neutrality Agreement. Thus, it would be an exaltation of form over substance to say that the Senate will not give its advice and consent to the contents of the Understanding if it gives its approval to the Neutrality Treaty.

Even if the Understanding were not binding by itself, it would represent an authoritative interpretation of the agreement, either as part of the preparatory work of the Neutrality Treaty prior to ratification or as a subsequent practice under the Treaty after its signature. See Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, arts. 31 and 32. In either case, it is relevant that both parties regard the Declaration as the definitive interpretation of the meaning of the Neutrality Treaty.

An additional indication of the importance of the Understanding is found in General Torrijos' expression of desire that the Understanding be issued before the plebiscite in Panama on October 23, 1977. Press conference by Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, Chief Panamanian negotiator, in Panama, October 18, 1977, reprinted in Hearings supra at 457.

In light of the fact that the Understanding resulted from negotiations held especially for the purpose of clarifying the positions of the parties, was carefully drafted jointly by the heads of state, and was issued officially and publicly in both countries, its conclusiveness as an interpretation of the Neutrality Treaty is not open to serious challenge.

C. Possible Limitations on the Power of the United States to Assure Freedom of Passage Through the Canal and the Defense of the Canal.

It remains to consider whether the United Nations Charter, the Charter of the Organization of American States or the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance would place any limitation on the power of the United States to assure freedom of passage through the Canal for its warships and merchant ships or to defend the Canal.

Under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, the Security Council may determine that there is a "threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression" and order member states to comply with the measures ordered by that organ of the United Nations. Under Article 41, the measures falling short of the use of force which may be employed by the Security Council are "complete or partial interruption of economic relations" and of "sea * * * means of communication." In addition, the United Nations may also take action by air, sea, or land forces in order to maintain or restore international peace and security under Article 42. Article 103 of the Charter provides that the obligations of a member state under the Charter prevail over the state's obligations under any other international agreement. Thus, the Security Council could order the Canal closed to the ships of a particular state or group of states and that order would prevail over the duty of Panama and the United States to allow transit.

A recommendation adopted by the Security Council under Chapter VI of the Charter or by the General Assembly under Chapter IV would not be legally binding under the Charter. The new Panama Canal Treaty and Neutrality Treaty would limit the freedom of the United States and Panama to follow such a recommendation.

So far as the Inter-American system is concerned, Article 25 of the O.A.S. Charter provides:

"If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an armed attack or by an act of aggression that is not an armed attack, or by an extracontinental conflict, or by a conflict between two or more American States, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the American States, in furtherance of the principles of continental solidarity or collective self-defense, shall apply the measures and procedures established in the special treaties on the subject." Charter of the Organization of American States, April 30, 1948, 2 U.S.T. 2394, T.I.A.S. No. 2361, 119 U.N.T.S. 3.

The special treaty referred to is the Inter-American Treaty for Reciprocal Assistance (Rio Treaty), opened for signature Sept. 2, 1947, T.I.A.S. No. 1838, 21 U.N.T.S. 77, under which the ministers of foreign affairs of the parties may decide jointly what measures are to be taken. Under Article 8, these measures may include "partial or complete interruption of economic relations or of * * * sea * * * communications." Article 20 requires that the parties to the Treaty comply with measures falling short of the use of armed force. Thus, if Panama and the United States were called upon by the O.A.S. to close the Canal to the vessels of a state or group of states, a conflict would exist between the obligations of either country under the Panama Canal Treaties, on the one hand, and the O.A.S. Charter and Rio Treaty, on the other. If the state whose ships had been excluded were a party to the Inter-American agreements, it could not complain because it would have consented to such an action by virtue of its being a party to two treaties. A state not a party to the O.A.S. Charter and Rio Treaty would not be bound by their provisions (Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, art. 34), which would be res inter alios acta. It could properly insist that Panama and the United States perform their obligations under the Panama Canal Treaty and the Neutrality Treaty. However, the possibility of a similar conflict between the treaties governing the Canal and these two inter-American treaties has existed over the past thirty years but has caused no difficulties.

Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter prohibits "the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations." The Neutrality Treaty implicitly contemplates the use of force to maintain secure and open passage through the Canal.

The conventional rights conceded by Panama to the United States under the terms of the Neutrality Treaty are further particularized in the Understanding arrived at between President Carter and General Torrijos. There are thus two treaty bases for the right of the United States to defend the Canal.

In order to comply with the Neutrality Treaty, the Understanding and the United Nations Charter, any exercise of force by the United States would have to be limited in purpose, in intensity, and in duration to what would be strictly required for the maintenance of the neutrality of the Canal. It could not be directed toward detaching territory from Panama or altering its government, nor could it involve a long-term military presence in Panamanian territory unless that presence could be justified by a continuing threat to the Canal.

Article 15 of the O.A.S. Charter forbids intervention "for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other States. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed force but also any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the State or against its political, economic and cultural elements." Article 17 of the Charter provides that "[t]he territory of a State is inviolable; if may not be the object, even temporarily, of military occupation or of other measures of force taken by another State, directly or indirectly, on any ground whatever." Because the neutrality of the Canal is the subject of a treaty commitment, action taken by the United States directed toward keeping the Canal secure and open would not relate to the internal affairs of Panama.

So far as the external affairs of Panama are concerned, reliance upon an implementation of a treaty right by a party to the Treaty would not constitute intervention. Limited action by the United States to protect the neutrality of the Canal would not be directed against the "personality" of Panama or against the "political, economic and cultural elements" of Panama, but would be undertaken exclusively to keep the Canal open. In the event that United States military forces entered Panama, they would not "occupy" its territory in the sense of exercising control of that territory to the exclusion of Panamanian sovereignty. Neither would the territory be the object of the use of force, provided the military action was a proportionate response to the threat to the Canal.

Article I of the Rio Treaty forbids the use of force by parties to the Treaty in any manner inconsistent with the United Nations Charter or the Rio Treaty. Its purpose of mutual assistance and common defense is not inconsistent with the rights of the United States under the Neutrality Treaty.

The provisions of Article 103 of the United Nations Charter, providing that "in the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail," do not preclude the exercise of rights by the United States under the Neutrality Treaty and the Understanding. There is no conflict between Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter and the Treaty and Understanding, for, as has been shown above:

a. Panama has consented by treaty to the measures that the United States might take for the defense of the Canal, and

b. Measures to defend the Canal would not be directed against the "territorial integrity" or "political independence" of Panama, nor would they be "in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations."

STATEMENT BY JOHN NORTON MOORE*

Mr. Chairman: It is pleasure and a privilege to meet with this Committee to discuss the proposed Panama Canal Treaties. The decisions to be made by the Senate in considering advice and consent to these treaties will be of profound importance for all Americans.

In considering the Panama Treaties, my statement will be organized in three parts: general views on the nature of United States interests and choices concerning the Canal; analysis of the principal international-legal issues, particularly the transit and defense rights under the Treaties; and analysis of the constitutionally permissible modalities for Congressional approval of the Treaties.

GENERAL VIEWS

The question facing the Senate and the Nation is not whether the Panama Treaties are in all respects ideal. In common with many Americans, and I would expect even our treaty negotiators, I do not believe the treaties are ideal. Indeed few are since by definition a treaty is an agreement which, if meaningful, has been bargained for and is the product of compromise. Rather, the question is whether United States interests are better served by the treaties, with any necessary clarifying understandings, or by the context that can reasonably be expected should the treaties fail. I believe the answer to this question is that the treaties better serve our interests and should be ratified, assuming clear acceptance by both sides of the Carter-Torrijos understanding clarifying United States defense rights.

It need not detract from the remarkable achievement of the United States in building the Canal, an achievement in which we can take great pride, to recognize that a treaty suitable in 1903 may not present the most appropriate basis for United States-Panamanian relations in 1978. Every American President since Lyndon Johnson has recognized that fact and has been committed to renegotiation of the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty. Similarly, Latin American countries, sensitized to issues of equality in United States relations with the hemisphere, have indicated that settlement of the Canal issue with Panama "is a matter of common interest and high priority for Latin America * * *".¹

The reality is that the United States and Panama have had a significant dispute about the Canal for much of the more than half century since the Canal has been in operation. The core of that dispute has been the question of residual or "titular" sovereignty over the Zone left in doubt by the language of Article III of the 1903 treaty which granted the United States rights within the zone "which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory. * * *".² Increasingly the dispute has also focused on fairness in distribution of Canal benefits.

If the United States can settle the long Canal dispute by new agreements with Panama, it is in our interest to do so both to enhance the basis for stable Canal operations and to demonstrate that the strength of a truly great power is not just its firmness but rather its firmness in defense of the common interest. Such new agreements, to be viable and fair, must also protect important United States interests in the Canal. Fortunately it may be possible to recognize both Panamanian aspirations for a new regime and the essential national and common interests in the Canal. Those interests are, I believe, that the Canal will remain open to all vessels, without discrimination, under just and reasonable conditions, and that the United States as builder and principal user of the Canal will retain the right to defend against any threat to assured transit of vessels. Indeed, the United States may remain legally obligated by the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 with the United Kingdom to maintain such assured access and neutralization of the Canal.³

Both to deter future conflict and to protect the core national and common interests in the Canal, these access and defense rights should be clearly recognized and endorsed by any new treaties. We should not repeat the mistake of the past and accept ambiguity on core interests as good enough. Instead a good agreement should reflect a genuine understanding clearly accepted by all parties.

THE INTERNATIONAL-LEGAL ISSUES

The "Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal" is intended to go into effect simultaneously with the "Panama Canal Treaty" and to last in perpetuity, unlike the Panama Canal Treaty which by its terms would expire on December 31, 1999. As such, the "Neutrality Treaty" is the more important and enduring legal basis for permanent access and defense rights.

Articles I, II, III and VI of the Neutrality Treaty establish the basis for assured navigational rights through the Canal for vessels of all nations. In my judgment the legal guarantees of transit contained in these articles are strong and in several significant respects stronger for modern conditions than those in effect under Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.⁴ Thus, there is an obligation that the Canal shall be operated "efficiently" and that rules and regulations for transit shall be "reasonable" as well as "just and equitable." In addition, such rules and regulations are limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal.⁵ Finally, there is an additional provision in Article VI(1) unmistakably guaranteeing transit rights of United States and Panamanian warships and auxiliary vessels "notwithstanding any other provisions of this Treaty."

There are, however, two ambiguities on transit rights of possible concern.⁶ I raise them largely to make a record that in my judgment reasonable interpretation of the Neutrality Treaty requires favorable interpretation on both points. If the Senate is concerned with either ambiguity it would seem an easy matter to further clarify the point as part of a general understanding.

First, it is important that the transit rights provided by the treaty apply from high seas to high seas, that is beginning and ending at the seaward limits of Panamanian Caribbean and Pacific territorial or other ocean claims. At the present time Panama and the United States claim different territorial set limits. The United States recognizes a three nautical mile territorial sea (as opposed to its 200-mile coastal fisheries claim). Panama claims a 200-mile territorial sea and at least if the Law of the Sea Conference is successful we seem to be heading toward a twelve-mile limit.

Pursuant to Annexes A and B of the Neutrality Treaty the treaty areas is defined to include Panamanian territorial sea areas around the entrance to the Canal delimited pursuant to three mile limit. This is an obvious device to avoid introducing law of the sea hassles in the Canal issue. But as a result it is remotely possible that Panama would feel free to apply the more restrictive "Innocent passage" provisions as they claim to apply them beyond the three-mile area out to 200 miles. I do not believe such an interpretation to be sound. By a reasonable test of major purposes the Panamanian guarantees must apply from high seas to high seas

³ Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty pledges free navigation and neutralization of the Canal Based on the 1888 Constantinople Convention for the Suez Canal. Article IV of the Treaty then provides:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the High Contracting Parties under the present Treaty."

⁴ The transit guarantees of Article III, Section 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty are incorporated by reference as the transit standard in the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty by Article XVIII of that Treaty.

regardless of any change in oceans jurisdictional limits. It would be surprised if this were not also the Panamanian interpretation.*

Second, since Article VI(1) provides an unambiguous right of transit for United States warships and auxiliary vessels "irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination * * * or cargo carried," by negative implication it is arguable that these features could be the basis for discrimination against certain categories of commercial vessels. To avoid this kind of problem we did not accept any such differentiation between warships and commercial vessels in the definition of transit rights in the law of the sea negotiations. Once again, however, I do not believe such an interpretation to be sound. For pursuant to Article III 1(a) all rules, regulations and conditions of transit must still be "reasonable" and "limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal." Moreover, Article VI(1) seems intended to provide "expeditious" transit for United States and Panamanian warships and auxiliary vessels and to make transit rights for those vessels doubly clear rather than to provide a standard for discrimination against commercial vessels.

As a final point on transit rights, although the Neutrality Treaty makes no reference to the claim, some have referred to the Canal as a "Panamanian national resource." The notion that an international canal is a national resource is, I believe, unsound and fails to consider the strong community common interest in access through such canals. The United States has consistently rejected such claims with respect to straits used for international navigation. In addition, the United States has not sought to operate the Canal as a profit venture and I do not believe it would be "just, reasonable and equitable" to seek to extract maximum economic rent at the expense of the international community.

Turning to United States defense rights, Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty is the only article in the treaties laying a permanent basis for such rights, although the "Canal Treaty" has a much more detailed regime explicitly spelling out such defense rights prior to the year 2000. Pursuant to Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty:

"The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties."

There is nothing in this article inconsistent with the right of the United States, acting alone if necessary, to use force to defend the Canal or transit rights of vessels through the Canal. Indeed it seems consistent with a continuing United States legal obligation in this regard under the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. That is, we agreed under the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty to guarantee the neutrality of the Canal, including transit rights, and Article IV seems to reinforce that right. Without more, however, this article is only an ambiguous basis for clear recognition of United States defense rights after the year 2000. Moreover, since this is one of the core United States interests it would seem important to reduce any basis for future disagreement with Panama on this issue. As such I was pleased to see the Carter-Torrijos "Joint Statement of Understanding" of October 14, 1977. If both Panama and the United States are clear that this understanding reflects the correct interpretation of the Neutrality Treaty then I believe permanent United States defense rights in the Canal are reasonably well protected as a matter of legal right. That understanding seems to contemplate that the United States, acting alone if necessary, can use force to defend against any "threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal." Any United States action must be "directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama." Similarly it is not "a right of intervention * * * in the internal affairs of Panama." This wording seems broad enough to include any external or internal threat to assured transit, including denial by Panama of such rights and including actions on Panamanian territory, provided any such actions are necessary, reasonable, and aimed solely at ensuring transit rights through the Canal. Moreover, I believe retention of such a right by a guaranteeing power is consistent with general international law, including the United Nations Charter and the treaties of the OAS system.

In essence the United States as builder and principal user of the Canal has undertaken to guarantee the Canal neutrality, including transit rights through the

* The United States, of course, would still be free not to recognize the Panamanian 200-mile claim and on sound ground in rejecting it. Moreover, we are not much worse off in this regard than at present under the 1903 treaty which also includes no explicit guarantees of transit rights beyond three nautical miles.

Canal. As long as any necessary use of force in defense of those rights is reasonable and carefully limited to those objectives it would not seem a "use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state * * *" proscribed by both the understanding and the United Nations Charter. Moreover, the legal case would seem even stronger since the treaties and understandings simply retain for the United States a defense right we have had since 1903. With respect to the treaties of the Inter-American System (OAS), however, there may be a potential ambiguity under Articles 20 and 22 of the Revised Charter of the Organization of American States, which is binding on the United States in relations within the hemisphere. Article 20 provides:

"The territory of a State is inviolable; it may not be the object, even temporarily, of military occupation or of other measures of force taken by another State, directly or indirectly, on any grounds whatever."

Article 22 then goes on to provide that "Measures adopted for the maintenance of peace and security in accordance with existing treaties do not constitute a violation" of this principle. If the defense rights to be retained by the United States and that are now exercisable pursuant to the 1903 treaty—an "existing treaty" under Article 22—are properly viewed as continuing under Article 22, as I believe they should be, there is no problem. Moreover, I do not believe that Article 20 contemplated the situation of a specific retention of defense rights by the United States pursuant to clarification of a dispute with Panama concerning sovereignty over the Canal. It might be useful, however, to examine whether any minor changes in the understanding might be desirable to clarify the general interrelation with the OAS system.⁷ We should also remember that a Protocol to the Treaty is contemplated that would be open to all nations and that would make clear the continuing United States right, indeed obligation, to "ensure permanent access to the Canal by vessels of all nations * * *". This Protocol, to the extent signed by our OAS treaty partners, would be later in time than the OAS Charter and presumably if there were any ambiguities in interrelating the two treaties the later in time would control.

In order to clearly incorporate the October 14 Joint Understanding on defense issues, I believe that the preferable modality would be either a signed "Memorandum of Understanding" as was incorporated in Senate advice and consent to the 1955 Eisenhower-Romon Treaty with Panama or an "Exchange of Notes" as followed the 1936 Hull-Alfaro Treaty. The first of these seems closest to the present Joint Understanding and when signed by both sides it could be made part of Senate advice and consent.

As to other modalities, I do not recommend a formal reservation since this implies a contrary legal interpretation of a treaty clause and in the case of Article IV and the Joint Understanding that would not seem appropriate. Similarly, I do not believe that formal treaty amendment would add anything legally to a clear understanding embodied in a signed Memorandum of Understanding or Exchange of Notes. Such a formal amendment would also seem cumbersome and unnecessarily risky in possibly requiring another Panamanian referendum.

As a final international-legal point, I regret that the treaties do not have a mechanism for compulsory third party adjudication of differences concerning non-defense issues. Nations are understandably reluctant to submit military or defense issues to third party settlement. Sometimes this reluctance prevents agreement on any compulsory dispute settlement mechanism. To avoid this pitfall, in the law of the sea negotiation it has been generally accepted that "disputes concerning military activities" will not be subject to the dispute settlement mechanism otherwise embodied in the treaty draft (the Informal Composite Negotiating Text) if a party opts to except such activities when accepting the treaty.⁸ Had this realistic approach to the art of the possible been followed in the Panama Treaty negotiations it may well have been possible to obtain agreement on submission of disputes concerning transit of commercial vessels to compulsory arbitration or to the International Court of Justice.

Such a provision would be in both the United States and Panamanian interests in reduction of future grounds for conflict and in giving greater life to the permanent neutrality regime. Moreover, it would raise the threshold of use of force for defense of commercial transit rights and provide a useful additional option for protection of transit rights in the area arguably less clear than military transit rights. If at any time we seek further clarifying agreement with Panama in order to strengthen the treaties, I hope that we will again consider the desirability of a compulsory third party dispute settlement mechanism for disputes concerning non-military activities arising under the treaties.

⁷ On a related point the Joint Understanding also provides that United States and Panamanian vessels of war or auxiliary vessels can "in case of need or emergency * * * go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

⁸ Article 297(1) (b) of the Informal Composite Negotiating Text.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL-LEGAL ISSUES

Article II of the Panama Canal Treaty and Article VIII of the Neutrality Treaty provide that they "shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties." For the United States I believe that there are two permissible procedures for Congressional approval of the treaties, either of which would fully meet Constitutional requirements.

First, the treaties may receive advice and consent by the Senate pursuant to the treaty power as the Administration has recommended. Some have questioned whether Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2, of the Constitution requires that international agreements disposing of territory or property of the United States must be approved by a majority of both houses rather than a two-thirds majority of the Senate alone. That clause provides "The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States" * * * .⁹ The issue, however, is whether this clause was intended to create an exclusive modality for transfer of property that would derogate from the treaty power or whether it was to be a concurrent procedure with the treaty power.

Though there is little authority specifically on the point, I believe that the best evidence as to the intent of the framers concerning both powers, Supreme Court decisions concerning the treaty power in general and boundary treaties disposing of claimed United States territory in particular, constitutional practice, and policy considerations all suggest that the property clause is not an exclusive modality for transfer of property in derogation of the treaty clause. Since elsewhere these issues have been debated at length I will not repeat the general analysis.⁹ My own appraisal of that debate, however, is that though the proponents of interpreting the property clause to be exclusive have shown in response to Administration witnesses the lack of definitive evidence as to the framers intent and that there are no Supreme Court cases squarely on point, they have not made an affirmative case for their own position. Moreover the debate seems to have ignored several relevant factors that support the concurrent interpretation.

In seeking to distinguish the Supreme Court boundary cases the proponents of the exclusive position have sought to distinguish those cases as involving disputed territorial or property rights. It is puzzling, however, why apparently these proponents feel despite a half century of dispute with Panama over Canal rights that there is no dispute concerning United States territorial or property rights in the Canal (whether supportable or not is not the question under these precedents). Such a judgment can rest only on the most narrow textual reading of the 1903 treaty divorced from real-world context. Resolution of the long-standing dispute with Panama is after all what the treaties are about. Similarly, it seems to me that the kind of momentous foreign policy issues presented in the Panama Canal Treaties are precisely the kinds of issues that may be constitutionally dealt with by treaty. The foreign policy implications of the treaties, including our relations with Panama and throughout Latin America are strong and obvious. In such a setting I believe that the proponents of the "exclusive" interpretation have a large burden of persuasion as to why the treaty power is unavailable. I do not believe they have remotely met that burden.

Second, the agreements with Panama could, I believe, be constitutionally approved pursuant to a joint Executive Congressional agreement; that is, by majority vote of both houses of Congress. Just because the treaty power is a constitutionally permissible modality does not mean that it is the only permissible modality. United States constitutional law and practice permits international agreements to be constitutionally approved pursuant to Executive-Congressional agreement procedures as well as the treaty power. Indeed, this is so regardless of importance of the agreements as has been demonstrated many times in our history.¹⁰ The truth of the ⁹ See, e.g., the statement of Attorney General Griffin Bell and the State Department Legal Adviser, Herbert Hansell, before this Committee on September 29, 1977 and the statement of Professor Raoul Berger and Charles Rice before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary on November 2, 1977.

¹⁰ See, e.g., Moore, "Executive Agreements and Congressional Executive Relations," reprinted in "Congressional Oversight of Executive Agreements," Hearing before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, 92d Cong., 2d sess. 149 (April 25, 1972); McDougal & Lans, "Treaties and Congressional-Executive or Presidential Agreements: Interchangeable Instruments of National Policy," 54 Yale L.J. 181-351, 534-615 (1945), reprinted in M. matter is that the United States has two constitutionally permissible modalities for approval of international agreements requiring Congressional approval. In this case the dispute concerning whether such a procedure is constitutionally required at least adds further support to a majority vote of both Houses as a constitutionally permissible modality.

CONCLUSION

The Panama Canal Treaties are not perfect. The issue, however, is not whether they are perfect but rather whether core national interests at stake are better protected by acceptance or rejection of the treaties. I believe that the core interests of the United States at stake are:

Maintenance of assured transit rights through the Canal for both military and commercial vessels;

Retention of a clear right to defend the Canal against any threat, whether internal or external, to such assured transit;

Settlement of the dispute with Panama to reduce the risk of future conflict and to establish a better basis for Canal stability; and Demonstration to the international community particularly concerned Latin nations, that the United States is firm in the defense of the common interest. A great power deserves the title of great as much by the goals which it supports as by the power with which it supports them.

Assuming at least a signed memorandum of understanding or exchange of notes embodying the October 14 Carter-Torrijos Joint Statement of Understanding I believe that these goals will be better served by Senate advice and consent to the treaties.

Thank you.

STATEMENT OF PROFESSOR COVEY T. OLIVER, UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA LAW SCHOOL

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: It has been some years since I appeared before this honorable Committee, and I come here now as your invited "citizen" witness, rather than as an official of the Executive Branch. I am grateful to you for the invitation to appear today, along with colleagues from the specialties of international public law and United States foreign affairs law. I have not been here in the capacity in which I now appear since 1949 or 1950, during the Bricker Amendment "bicker" as to the treaty power. Strangely, one of the treaties you are now considering also raises for some an issue as to the scope of the treaty power under the Sixth Article of the Constitution.

I have always been received with thoughtful courtesy by this Committee, although more than once in my days as an official my feet have felt a touch of the flame here! One episode, I fervently hope, will not be repeated: I was opposed for the Senate's approval as Ambassador to Colombia by an intense-looking gentleman who, clutching a briefcase, said he did not know me but he did know my type and hence objected. Senator Fulbright showed him great courtesy and he departed peaceably. Two days later this same person was apprehended as he sought to dash into the office of the Governor of Michigan, and a very large revolver, loaded, was found in that briefcase! To paraphrase the old Texas lawyer's fabled response to a famous question from the Supreme Court bench about the fate of John the Baptist, I trust this Committee is no longer susceptible to such influences!

I am your witness on legal matters. I honestly think that my views on them are not the product of my outlook as to these treaties as a onetime "Latin-American hand" at State. But I feel that I must disclose briefly my political viewpoints, so that you can judge for yourselves the degree of my objectivity or the lack of it.

A life-long Democrat, I was immensely privileged to have grown up in the only part of my native Texas where, at that time, the Mexican-American had his full civic rights—and exercised them. I am of a very small minority of WASP-Texans who grew up in minority status in that State. Thanks to my wise father, my brother and I learned the language and ways of our preponderant neighbors. These early experiences have shaped my life in many ways, including the development of an interest in international affairs and the acquisition of a capacity to look at my country and my people from both "inside" and "outside" perspectives. In an issues paper I prepared on our Constitution and U.S. foreign affairs operations in America's third century for the Bicentennial reassessment of the Constitution organized by the American Academy of Political and Social Science, I wrote:¹

"It would be interesting to know whether the American people believe there is a crisis today in the management of American foreign relations under the Constitution of 1789. Most expert American observers of, or participants in, the conduct of the nation's official dealings with the rest of the world would agree that we have a unique, complicated, energy-depleting system of public law for the allocation of authority for the governance of our official conduct offshore. And they would find the present situation of this system at least somewhat controversial, both at home and abroad.

"But these same American experts would divide as to whether anything can or should be done structurally. A considerable majority, probably, agree with the general thrust of Appendix L to the Report of the Commission for the Study of the Organization of the Government for Foreign Affairs, that by mutuality, patience, and other attitudinal acts of moderation, the qualified players of the 'Foreign Relations Game' for the American side can improve the 'game plan' result for the United States. So far as the evidence from writings goes, it seems that the preponderant opinion of experts, with some exceptions (as always among experts), is that it is unnecessary, unthinkable, or illusory to contemplate changing significantly the structure of American government for any reason liked to 'The United States and the World.' Nonetheless, some believe that it might be useful now to go through the exercise of reviewing the basic law controlling America's relationships with the rest of the planet.

"Basic issues of governmental structure for foreign relations should not always be examined, as they usually are, only from the standpoint of our internal concerns and expectations about the Constitution and our associations with the rest of the world. The rest of the world is also vitally concerned with, is affected by, and hence reacts to, how America does things internationally.

"Let us begin by seeing ourselves as others see us. We are a country that in its first 200 years has been phenomenally successful in every way in which the achievements of nations are measured; but usually the world does not credit our institutions and our way of life for this, as we tend to do, but rather believes that the good fortune of natural riches explains our success. Major resources, however, are seriously depleted now; and substitutes have not yet been assured. Some foreigners, following Adam Smith's view as to the fundamental wealth of nations, are willing to credit the American people also for the nation's success. But even this limited perception of us, the people, as the true wealth of the nation is in decline now.

"The United States is a federal, participatory democracy, whose state and federal constitutions all incorporate some version of separation of powers with checks and balances—thus requiring the interrelated independence of three branches of government. This makes us unique—truly solitary—in the world community. As Ambassador Moynihan did not tire of saying, democracy itself is no longer the form of government that a majority of states provide for or practice. Within participatory democracies, only a very few (not more than a dozen) states are federal in form, and of these options federalism is a serious legal factor in the foreign relations of only five! Finally, no other federalistic democracy has an operational separation of powers/checks and balances constitutional system. Nor, for that matter, do unitary (non-federal) states often practice separation of powers. In Iberic-America, for example, where the American Constitution was the model, of the few remaining democracies, only in Colombia and Costa Rica have separation of powers problems occasionally arisen in regard to relations with other states.

"Although in the world community the American system of governance for foreign relations is thus exotic, our national tendency, exhibited even in the evaluation of our Constitution, is to disregard this basic fact and to treat the problem of foreign affairs and the Constitution largely as a matter of internal values and preferences. We ascribe an almost incontestable value to the constitutional status quo and expect the rest of the world to adjust to it; or, at most, we assume that the domestic gains outweigh the possible foreign affairs losses, now and possibly for all time to come.

"But there is a rising tide of evidence that the rest of the world—especially the shrinking world of our friends—is finding our blandness in this particular increasingly irritating and destabilizing. We should not accept such evidence as conclusive, but we should not disregard it either. Thus, consider two recent illustrations:

"1. Alfonso Lopez Michelsen, elected President of Colombia, observed, in regard to an unannounced shift in United States policy (from supporting a Colombian cut-flower export industry as relevant to Colombia's development to a Congress-pressured Treasury investigation of Colombian cut-flower imports as being subject to extraordinary [dumping] duties) that the episode brought sharply to attention questions of the reliability and authoritativeness of United States foreign policy declarations and assurances.

"2. The Prime Minister of Singapore at a White House dinner in his honor remarked in his toast that the friends of the United States are becoming increasingly uncertain and concerned as to who effectively speaks for the United States.

"Hence, as we proceed in accordance with the wishes and interests of the participants to examine issues of (or close to) constitutional dimensions arising from America's contemporary and projected roles in the world community, let us consider the perspectives of that community, as well as our attachment to our present system. 'Independence' requires no less."

Also, I know that as to many situations in Latin America a sense of injustice and an "envy-shame" syndrome are deep-seated. Like it or not, these inject elements of intense human relations into what some have mistakenly supposed diplomacy to be, a cool, dehumanized calculus of national interests. Surely, if the attitudes of certain key Latin American countries about the United States and Panama as to the Canal were formed on the basis of national interest in assured Canal service at the lowest possible tolls, these countries would not have so firmly aligned with Panama as, inter alia, to have supported vehemently the urging of Panama for a most unusual special session of the Security Council in that country several years ago, and with equal intensity to have continued to be with Panama as to the undoing (by novation) of the 1903 treaty.

Latin American countries, moreover, have not yet completed the evolutionary process of establishing complete national identities; and, meanwhile in the United States and elsewhere in the developed world the expectations of the immediate post-War that national will would be considerably moderated in the interests of wider communities have not been very effectively achieved. Under these circumstances, from the beginnings of my association with the "Panama problem," I have been forced by what had gone before to suppress my own preference for the internationalization of artificial straits connecting two or more sectors of free seas. When I came on the scene in 1964, President Johnson told me that it was already too late to consider any other solution than a direct one with Panama as sovereign of the soil. Certainly all that thereafter happened has pointed this same way.

There is no use doing more than to mention the possibility that, had our decision-makers on foreign affairs, going back many years, been more aware of—more sensitive to—the situation that was festering, things might have been different. Not often are we or other states able with calm foresight to provide for provident futures. But we ought to learn from our failures so to do.

And, to complete this disclosure, I personally wish that the arrangements with Panama had been structured into what are known as "legislative-executive agreements," put into effect by ordinary legislation by simple majorities in both houses. I do not wish to hide my very strong preference for a more efficient and more democratic way of participating in international community life (where international agreements are the most fundamental element of advancement of world order)² than the arrangement that in 1787 reflected an internal political need that I am convinced we no longer have. It is almost beyond controversy, I believe, that "legislative-executive agreements" are fully equivalent to the "treaty-making powers" of the President and two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.³ No amendment of the Constitution would be required. By practice alone, we could streamline the "ratification" process, put ourselves into the situation of most other democratic countries as to legislative approval of international agreements, and end the charge that the Senate is the "graveyard of treaties."

However, gentlemen, we have to deal with the treaties that have been negotiated and the processes chosen for their approval. Perhaps through study I am as familiar as most of you from membership here with the problems of the Senate's additions of ² Many scholars have observed that international law grows mainly today through "law making" treaties, not by the customs of nations. Customary law is not usually a law for intricate details; and the existence of 155 or more states in the world community today complicates immensely the task, if it is attempted with honesty, of finding a consentio juris, especially where there are lines of cleavage, such as those between rich nations and poor nations and "free world" and socialist ones.

"The argument that the Constitution permits international agreements only by treaty was long ago rejected," (citing authorities, including Opinions of the Attorney-General.)

reservations and understandings to closely negotiated international agreements. The Restatement of United States Foreign Relations Law, on which I worked, is useful on the international legal aspects of the effects of "conditioned advice and consent:"⁴ and for all time we shall have the fate of the Treaty of Versailles and its annex, the Covenant of the League of Nations, to remind us that closely bargained treaties are not easily re-negotiable to take account of Senators' preferences. Some may say that the example cited is distinguishable, it being a multipartite arrangement involving a great many states, whereas here we have only bilateral agreements. However, it is to be noted that at this stage the rest of the world (including as far as public statements go, other Latin American states) has kept itself in a cone of silence. It is not hard to foresee, however, the possibility that the Panamanian leadership could rally organized and solid opposition to some possible changes in the present texts.

On the politico-military front I need say very little. Far greater experts than I have already gone into these matters. Perhaps some were a very little bit discreet in painting the physical limitations of defense against guerrillas in jungle conditions not unlike those of Viet Nam, but on this front surely you do not need much more to prompt foresight. The possible outbursts of destructive activity aimed against this country and the interests of its citizens in other Latin American countries—and even elsewhere—likewise need no reiteration. The situation has come to be one in which we must act, and the Administration has wisely and justly chosen to act well and generously, as befits the American people. As major nations go history has so far treated us lightly as to on-going, inevitable adjustments of global society that parallel those taking place internally in our and other free societies.

THE CANAL TREATY

Turning now to the Panama Canal Treaty, I recall being taught by a very great teacher of international law at Columbia, (now) Judge Phillip C. Jessup, that an inherently inequitable treaty is never stable. This I had not been taught previously as to private law by a less wise contracts teacher elsewhere, who used to say, "Boys, boys, a contract must be performed even if it takes the hide off." We all soon come to know that many types of untenable or unjust contracts will not be required by law to be performed.⁵ Professor Jessup was speaking in the context of the trauma of unilateral violations of treaties, concession agreements, and the like. In the contemporary situation Panama has sought no more than to mobilize all available pressure to its advantage as to terms in seeking a novation that the United States also supports as the right type of solution. That the bargaining has been hard I have no doubt. The negotiations on both sides have, in essence, put details on the principles for a new Canal regime agreed upon by national leaders in the Joint Declaration of April 3, 1964, the Johnson-Robles Agreement of September 24, 1965, the Joint Statement of principles of February, 1974, and its affirmation as policy by the incoming Carter Administration.

There is considerable doubt in my mind as to the desirability of attempting through the advise and consent power to seek, in effect, to participate in the details of negotiations. The Senate has great responsibilities, but in my view they link to great issues, not to preferences as to details.

Now, as to "great issues." These seem to me to be the following ones:

(1) "Internationalization" of the waterway (as distinguished from "neutralization"). This is a lost cause. If this concept ever had a "time," that time has passed. And this solution has not been accepted elsewhere by territorial sovereigns. Nationalism and the "machismo" of sovereignty are too strong.

(2) Interests of third ("user") states. These are as well protected, legally speaking, under the proposed treaty as they have been in past.⁶ The major difference as to them is that the United States has been either a generous or an indifferent toll-fixer, whereas it seems almost certain that during the life of this treaty and certainly when "its time comes" Panama will continue to treat the Canal as its major national asset, unless in the meantime through development assistance and otherwise other important national assets develop there. Or, who knows? By 2000 AD, if not before, other factors may work to keep Panama's appetite for tolls moderate. I take it that the Hay-Pauncefote Convention is not definitively tossed upon the ash heap of history and that in any event, its principles are adequately incorporated into portions of both the proposed new treaties.

⁵ Thanks in large part to legislative relaxations of stringent common law principles and a corresponding tendency of the judiciary to favor the underdog party in interpreting contract obligations.

⁶ Professor Baxter's excellent statement, cited later in the text of my statement, should be consulted for material pertinent to my conclusion.

(3) Transfers of United States property without compensation. This policy issue is seemingly "bigger" than actually it is, when we consider that the phasing of non-Canal asset transfers is largely in the control of the United States; that the transfer value of the Canal itself must be discounted until the year 2000; and that Panama does not in the real world have the capacity to pay. The basic lesson of J. M. Keynes' "The Economic Consequences of the Peace" (1919) is still valid: unrealistic foreign exchange obligations, contracted for or imposed (Treaty of Versailles), are bad politics as well as disastrous international economics.

(4) The Constitution and transfers of U.S. Government property by self-executing treaty. Personally I do not view this as a "great issue." However, in view of the state of the authorities as detailed by the Attorney General and the Legal Adviser of the Department of State, on the one hand, and certain opposition witnesses, notably Professor Raoul Berger before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Judiciary Committee, on the other, I recognize that this Committee, and ultimately the Senate, must formulate a position on the "disposal power" (Art. IV, 3, Cl. 2) and provide a rationale therefor. I find Professor Berger's doctrine that the disposal power is "impliedly excluded" from the treaty power (Article VI) decidedly unconvincing, both as to the history of the deliberations at Philadelphia that hot summer of 1787 and as to what uses actually have been made of the treaty power in the matter of transfers, even excluding Indian treaties.

True, in the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court there are statements that determined contenders can strive to elevate to the level of obiter dicta, some strongly in support of the Administration, some, perhaps, in support of Dr. Berger. But, obiter (if that) is not decision! And my guess is that the Supreme Court would not intrude upon the "political branches" as to this point. The issue is readily distinguishable from the Court's venture beyond the "political question" doctrine in Powell v. McCormick, 395 U.S. 486 (1969). The line as to that doctrine in relationship to foreign relations still seems to me to be that of the dictum in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), at 211-218, unaffected by U.S. v. Nixon 418 U.S. 683 (1974) and Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976).

Unlike Dr. Berger, I do not believe that a self-executing treaty purporting to dispose of government property, " . . . even if ratified by the Senate, would be void . . ." What of standing to sue? And would the Supreme Court intervene under its self-granted authority to say what the law is? I have difficulty as to a plausible hypothetical showing standing to sue. Who? But even if the Senate should believe it faces a clear and present danger of being overruled by the Supreme Court on this issue, the Senate should nonetheless respond to the Constitution upon its own responsibility as to a matter so closely connected to its unique role as to treaties. Finally, the implementing legislation that the Legal Adviser has foreseen as necessary to put into effect many aspects of the Canal Treaty will probably tend to cure even Dr. Berger's notions of invalidity.

Conclusion: Overall, the Canal Treaty provides for a gradual transition of authority, postpones the transfer of the Canal and areas essential to its operations, maintenance, and defense for more years than there are "lives in being plus 21 years" for some of us. The price includes the transfer without compensation to Panama of "surplus" American property in the Zone and elsewhere in Panama as it becomes redundant, the phasing out of judicial and other governmental authority of the U.S. in the present Canal Zone, and the immediate ending of the irritations for Panamanians inherent in the commissary, banking, and housing situations. This is a sound trade off, considering our North American tendency to mild masochism and guilt complexes, Latin American sensitivities, and, simply, the spirit of the times. There are only two other ways than an accommodation of this sort to deal with the situation: (1) "stonewall" it, with consequences too dire to contemplate or (2) think the "unthinkable" and offer Panama political linkages with this country. As to the second alternative, I mention it only for completeness of the record, and to suggest, once again, that it is too late for much innovation. The issues have set in their historic concrete; the lines are drawn; and tiny states are seen to have, as against even super-powers, tremendous leverage authorized by the world community as a whole. In my view this country will be fortunate to be able to end the "Panama problem" on the essentially favorable terms provided in this treaty.

THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATIONS TREATY

Professor R. R. Baxter's statement of December 1, 1977, before the Panama Canal Subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries contains substantially all of a legal nature that I otherwise might wish to say as to this Treaty. In that statement Professor Baxter answered ten important questions posed by the Subcommittee. I consider Questions 4, 5, 6, and 8 the most significant ones; and I agree with the answers given.

Politically, Secretary Rusk has given the Foreign Relations Committee what I also believe is the wise perspective, when he points out that, as the Permanent Neutrality and Operations Treaty does not become the primary obligation of Panama until the year 2000, there will be ample time in the interim " * * * to test the ability of Panama and ourselves to proceed on the basis of the agreement * * * "

The Protocol to the Neutrality and Operations Treaty that will be open for accession by all nations of the world in accordance with a resolution to be sponsored by the United States and Panama in the Organization of American States provides a desirable politico-legal basis for "third state rights" beyond those explicitly provided under the present treaty arrangements. Both Secretary Rusk's and Professor Baxter's responses cited above confirm and explain this generalization.

There is one "Catch-22" about non-discriminatory passage that not even a more generous arrangement as to third countries alone could have cured. Old World War II warriors—including economic warfare ones—know that in time of conventional weapons war the Canal will be closed to enemies de facto by submarine and aircraft interdiction offshore from the territorial waters of Panama, even as their width may be extended under projections from contemporary Law of the Sea negotiating stances. But given improvements in long range weapons technology since World War II transit of the Canal by the United States of any major military importance can also be made into an unacceptable risk by a spatially remote enemy power center. Thus, even barring nuclear interdiction and sabotage, the Panama Canal (or Canals) does not seem to have much future relevance "in time of war. * * * "

This, it seems to me, makes problematical and illusory many of the concerns that have been voiced about American rights of defense and passage in the farther future. Military operations involving the Suez Canal since World War II have shown that even non-lock ditches are hopelessly vulnerable.

In possible contentions of force between Latin American countries both the great rivers and the artificial waterway of the region might become of significant interest, both to contending countries and to the inter-american and world communities. In such situations the present treaty's neutralization provisions might be of practical significance—until (or unless) the Security Council, the General Assembly (under the Uniting for Peace Resolution), or the Rio Pact/OAS system (to the extent still viable in this field) should "take over." In my view neutralization by bilateral arrangement—even with the possibility of third state accessions—cannot control the "higher law" regulating or controlling use of force. However, given Latin American coolness as to the Rio Pact and considering post Viet Nam influences here, it seems reasonably clear that U.S. policing of the Hemisphere against use of force by countries within the region is no longer a prime national interest.

GENERAL CONCLUSION

In relationship to neutrality, operations, and defense, the wartime national interest of the United States in the present lock canal would have to be heavily discounted in any serious military operation involving the United States and an enemy with normal modern interdiction capabilities. Thus, it is only in time of peace that the Canal seriously matters to the United States. And even in peacetime, it is an installation that is steadily declining in importance as modes of transport shift and its natural limitations restrict its use. We should avoid, therefore, an American version of the Suez Syndrome that gripped the British and the French in 1956 and led to their humiliation. The "Sad Port Said" episode seems only foolish today.

Let us take care not to run the same risk! To repudiate these treaties and to attempt to "hold" the Canal and the Zone under present political conditions in the world would be to repeat here a lamentable, "lifeline of empire" syndrome.

The Senate should, of course, give full attention—but not necessarily full faith and credit—to those of military backgrounds or viewpoints who have declared that the Canal must be "defended" against "international communism," etc. Defended when? Against what? How? With what assurance of success as against sabotage and jungle warfare? After losing over five billion dollars of materiel alone in Viet Nam?

STATEMENT BY ELY M. BRANDES

My name is Ely M. Brandes and I reside at 554 Madison Way, Palo Alto, California. I am an economist and president of International Research Associates, also of Palo Alto, a small economic research company.

I did my undergraduate work at Birmingham Southern College in Birmingham, Alabama, and I received my graduate degree from Harvard University. I have worked as an economist for more than 30 years, including 13 years for the Federal Government. Among the federal agencies which I worked for were the Department of Commerce, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the Atomic Energy Commission. In 1959 I joined the Stanford Research Institute in California as a senior economist. In 1968 I became an independent consultant and in 1971, an associate and I formed our present company of which I have been president since the beginning.

I have worked on projects related to the Panama Canal since 1964. During the last 14 years I have authored or co-authored more than 20 studies sponsored by the Panama Canal Company on such subjects as traffic projections, the sensitivity of Canal traffic to toll increases, and the economic value of the Canal, etc. My most recent assignment on this subject was sponsored jointly by the U.S. Department of State and the Panama Canal Company and just within the last few days we completed a draft of our reports. Because of the relevance of our findings to the treaties being considered by this Committee and by the United States Senate, I would like to present before this Committee a brief summary of our report and an assessment of its significance. I also wish to say that my statement here this morning represents the first public release of any information concerning the results of the study.

Our study had three major objectives. First, we were asked to develop a comprehensive set of traffic and revenue projections for the Panama Canal covering the period from 1978 to 2000. Second, we conducted a sensitivity analysis to determine what effect toll rate increases of various levels would have on future traffic and revenues of the Panama Canal. As part of this exercise, we also made an estimate of the maximum amount of toll revenue that could be raised. Finally, we made an analysis of the likely effect of inflation on the Canal's future ability to raise sufficient revenue to meet its costs.

With respect to future traffic and revenues, our study projects that Panama Canal traffic will increase from about 123 million tons of cargo in 1977 to about 202 million tons in the year 2000. In terms of toll revenue, and assuming present rates, the increase will be from about $163 million to $182 million in 1978, to $197 million in 1980 and to about $264 million in the year 2000. The projected growth rate in traffic for the 23 year period is slightly more than 2 percent per year. This is less than the growth rate in traffic experienced over the last 25 years when the Canal benefited greatly from the economic expansion in the Pacific basin area, and particularly, from the enormous growth in trade between the United States and Japan.

Included in our projection of future Panama Canal traffic was a significant volume of North Slope petroleum which began to move through the Canal last summer. The volume of this movement will grow sharply in the next few months. We estimate, for instance, that Alaska oil shipments will total about 25 million tons in the FY 1979, which starts October 1, 1978, and will contribute nearly $30 million or 15 percent of all toll revenues during that year. After 1980, Alaska oil shipments through the Canal will begin to decline but their contribution to traffic will be substantial throughout the 1980's.

It is obvious from these figures that the contribution by Alaska oil to Panama Canal traffic and revenues over the next five years will be very significant. In making our estimate with respect to Alaska oil shipments, we were fully aware that the entire question of moving Alaska oil to the East is still surrounded by many imponderables, such as the likelihood of new pipelines, the possibility of new oil finds, the future effect of conservation measures, etc. We believe we have been able to deal with most of these imponderables realistically and we think our projection is sound in spite of the many uncertainties.

However, there is one key reservation that we must make with respect to our forecast of future Alaska oil shipments through the Panama Canal, and, by extension, with respect to our total forecast of Panama Canal traffic and revenues over the next five to ten years. The reservation is that our forecast only holds as long as the present law which prevents the sale of Alaska oil to Japan remains in effect. We say this not because we have any firm convictions about the fundamental merits of this law; in fact, we have no opinion on this. But our knowledge of the economics involved simply tells us that should the oil companies be permitted to dispose of Alaska oil overseas, they will do so and not ship any of it through the Panama Canal.

With respect to the second major objective of our study, the sensitivity of Canal traffic to toll increases, we found that toll rate increase of 15 percent to 50 percent would result in traffic losses, on a tonnage basis, ranging from about 2 percent for a 15 percent increase to a 12 percent loss for a 50 percent increase. In terms of revenue, however, a toll rate increases in that range would result in revenue gains of between 13 percent and 33 percent. Increases in toll rates of more than 50 percent would result in little additional revenue. In fact, we found that the very maximum amount of revenue that could be obtained was only about 40 percent more than the revenue that was projected without any toll increase. To get this maximum amount would require a total increase of somewhere between 75 percent and 100 percent.

Since we had conducted a similar maximum revenue study some three years ago, we had an opportunity to compare the results of the two studies. We found that the estimates in the two studies were quite similar in the sense that both indicated that the attainment of maximum revenue would require total rate increases of between 75 percent and 100 percent. The two studies differed in their estimates of the amount of additional revenues that can be gotten through total increase. Our 1975 study showed that setting toll rates at the maximum level would yield 50 percent more in revenues; the present study shows that maximum toll rates would yield only 40 percent more in revenues.

The basic reason why the Panama Canal's ability to raise additional toll revenue is so severely limited can be found in the fact that many, if not most, users of the Canal have alternatives available to them which, in terms of total costs, are not much greater than the cost of using the Canal. The alternatives vary considerably, depending upon the commodity and route involved. For instance, for the shipment of dry bulk material, such as coal from the United States to Japan, the principal alternative is to use bulk carriers of 100,000 DWT tons or so and proceed via the Cape of Good Hope. In the case of imported television sets from Japan, which are shipped in containers, the best alternative is to ship the container to Los Angeles or Seattle and then by rail to the eastern half of the country. In the case of lumber shipped from British Columbia to the east coast of the United States, the alternative is to go to an all rail movement. In the case of petroleum product shipments through the Canal, the alternative is often a product exchange in which company A, which wants to ship jet fuel from the Atlantic to the Pacific, makes an agreement with company B, which wants to ship the same product from the Pacific to the Atlantic, to exchange products and then neither company ships any jet fuel through the Canal. Finally, in the case of iron ore imports by the United States from Peru, for instance, which once upon a time were quite substantial, the alternate solution was and is for Peru to sell most of its iron ore to Japan and for the United States to rely more heavily on domestic iron ore.

It is worth noting that with respect to all of these alternatives, the buyers and sellers involved appear to be almost equally well off whether they use the Canal or choose an alternative. The fact that the shift to alternatives can occur as a consequence of small increases in Panama Canal tolls is an indication that the cost difference between going through the Canal and doing the next best thing is often very small.

The third major objective of our study was to analyze the probable effects which inflation will have on the future cost of Canal operation as compared to the ability of the future Panama Canal Commission to raise tolls. As the members of this Committee are undoubtedly aware, the proposed treaty with Panama specifies that a portion of the royalty payments to be made to Panama is to be adjusted upward in line with the expected upward movement of a price index. It must also be expected that the other costs associated with operating the Canal will continue to increase. At the same time, our projections indicate that traffic and revenues will, on average, increase only at a moderate rate, much less than the rate experienced over the last 15 years.

All of these circumstances seem to underscore the probability that toll rates may have to be increased several times during the next 23 years if the Canal is to continue on a financially self-supporting basis. The question, therefore, arises whether the present and prospective sensitivity of the traffic to toll increases is such that these increases can be absorbed; or whether at some point, soon, the Canal's ability to raise tolls will be exhausted and any further toll increases will actually result in less and less revenue.

Our findings on this question, unfortunately, are not conclusive. The future ability of the Canal to raise sufficient revenues to cover its costs depends partly on how fast the cost of Canal operation increases and partly on how well these cost increases are matched by increases in the cost of the alternatives. As my example showed, many alternatives to the Canal involve alternate transportation services which are also affected by inflation. However, there are other alternatives which do not require any measurable service. Moreover, the recent devaluation of the U.S. dollar in relation to other currencies has had the effect for many foreign ship operators of making Panama Canal transit cheaper and, thereby, lessening the impact of past or future toll rate increases.

Given the many and often conflicting trends which affect the present and future costs of transiting the Panama Canal versus its competing alternatives, it would be hazardous, if not foolhardy, to attempt a pinpoint forecast of their relative positions some 20 years hence.

Our own conclusion on this point is that for the next five to ten years a future Panama Canal Commission should have sufficient revenue resources available—actual or potential—to meet its costs. This means, in effect, that during that period the income required should either be available from toll revenues at current rates; or if necessary, those rates could safely be raised to obtain the additional amounts likely to be needed. But beyond ten years the uncertainties simply become too numerous to permit a worthwhile forecast.

So much for the principal findings. Let me now present a personal assessment of the significance of our study to the deliberations of this Committee and of the United States Senate.

Our most important finding, as far as the treaties are concerned, is that actual or potential toll revenues will be sufficient to meet the needs of the present Panama Canal Commission for the next five to ten years though our study did not concern itself with the projected expenditures of the organization during this time period—these will undoubtedly be presented by the Panama Canal Company in due time—I am familiar with the budgetary assumptions made last summer during the last phase of the negotiations. Compared to those, both our revenue and sensitivity projections indicate that the actual or potential toll revenues that will be available during this period will be larger than was estimated last summer.

A second significant conclusion of our study is that beyond the next ten years we can give no assurance about the ability of the Canal to maintain itself on a financially self-supporting basis. One very important aspect of this conclusion is that we did not come to it because we detected some insurmountable obstacles in that distant future. As I said before, our reason was simply that there are far too many uncertainties on this point to permit us to make a long-range forecast which we could consider credible.

Finally, while it is impossible to predict with any degree of certainty whether the Panama Canal can continue to function over the next 22 years on a financially self-supporting basis, I am convinced that the quality of the management of the future Panama Canal Commission will play a significant role in determining the economic life-span of the Canal. In a new organization, good top management is essential to make certain that the size and scope of that new organization matches the duties assigned to it and no more. Good management may also have an effect on the future level of revenues because Canal users often consider both the cost and the service quality of a transit before choosing between the Panama Canal and one of the alternatives.

I would therefore urge this Committee and the United States Senate to use their influence and power to assure that the appointments that will be made to the Panama Canal Commission measure up to the level of competence which these positions will so evidently require. The importance of the Panama Canal, past, present and future, is such that it deserves nothing less.

This concludes my statement.

STATEMENT BY MR. HENRY R. GEYELIN

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, on behalf of the Council of the Americas, I want to thank you for this opportunity to present our views. As you know, the Council of the Americas is composed of over 200 U.S. corporations, comprising nearly ninety percent of all U.S. private investment in Latin America and the Caribbean. The mission of the Council is to further understanding and acceptance of the role of private enterprise as a positive force for the development of the Americas.

The Council of the Americas would like to urge speedy ratification of the new treaties with Panama. We are encouraged by the constructive negotiations now underway to clarify any misunderstanding and to resolve any issues which might impede the conclusion of new Panama Canal treaties. The Council's decision to support ratification of such treaties resulted from a consensus vote of the Board of Trustees in which 95% favored the Council's taking a supportive role.

We have been aware for quite some time of the hemispheric impact of the success or failure to resolve the Panama Canal treaty issue, and our extensive experience with Latin American affairs had led us to believe that there is a compelling need to modernize our relations with Panama.

Throughout 1976 and 1977, the Council supported the continuation of the negotiating process, as well as the need for a new relationship with Panama through good faith negotiations. To achieve these goals, the Council formed a Work Group on Panama to stimulate nonpartisan debate on both sides of the issue. Our statement of support for ratification of the treaties, however, is not necessarily a consequence of our prior support for the negotiating process. The Council carefully avoided taking a position on any possible terms of the treaties themselves until 1) they had been made public, and 2) member corporations had had an opportunity to analyze the documents carefully and to discuss fully both sides of the issue. This analysis has now been completed and we have decided that ratification of the new Panama Canal treaties, with appropriate clarification, merit the support of the Council of the Americas.

We believe the treaty enables the U.S. to continue to keep the Canal open by working with Panama, a long-term ally who has never failed to keep its international obligations. We further believe that the gradual nature of the proposed change in the status of the Canal over the next quarter century is the best means by which to insure the fundamental interest of the U.S.—an open Canal that is continuously accessible to world commerce.

Furthermore, we do not feel that the United States is "surrendering" the Canal to an unstable nation. We are entering into a mature partnership of mutual responsibility with a long-term friend and strong supporter of free enterprise for the benefit of the United States, Panama, and the world.

Above all, the fundamental interest of the U.S. is an open Canal, efficiently operated and maintained, accessible to ships of all nations, and permanently neutral. We believe that the best way in which to preserve this interest is for the U.S. Senate to consent to the ratification of these new treaties, with the appropriate clarifications, and to enter into the partnership that they create.

The Council of the Americas views positively the strong emphasis on free enterprise and private investment in Panama's economic development planning. Panama's goal of becoming a major regional center for shipping and trade will depend on its ability to deal successfully with private enterprise internationally. In addition, Panama's development plans indicate a healthy reliance on private investment.

To illustrate this point, Dr. Nicolas A. Barletta, Minister of Development and Planning of the Republic of Panama, at the Annual Meeting of the Council of the Americas on December 5, 1977 pointed out that because Panama's development plans are subject to its ability to act as a service center for regional trade activities, Panama would not endanger the volume of Canal traffic by requesting that the U.S. raise toll rates to an unreasonable level.

Panama's economic development planning, in our opinion, demonstrates a cautious and pragmatic approach to their problems. It is our belief that this responsible attitude will continue if the treaties are ratified and Panama increases its participation in the Canal enterprise.

The Council of the Americas supports these treaties because they are in the best interests of the United States. They are NOT special interest treaties, and they are NOT designed to "bail out" U.S. corporations. These treaties have been under negotiation since 1964, and Panama has experienced a very healthy increase in U.S. investment during this period.

These new treaties, with the appropriate clarifications, are not perceived as a weakening of the United States or as a threat to our national security. Our willingness to modernize our relationship with Panama is testimony to our belief in the sovereignty of nations, the right to self-determination, and our sincere desire for global cooperation. The Council of the Americas recognizes, as will the rest of the world, that the ratification of these treaties will be proof of our strength as a nation and as a world leader.

STATEMENT BY PATRICK N. HUGHSON

Mr. Chairman: I am Patrick N. Hughson and I appear today in my capacity as president of the Association of American Chambers of Commerce in Latin America, which is better known by its acronym, AACCLA. It is an honor for me to have been invited to testify on the Panama Canal Treaties now before your Committee, and I am pleased to have traveled to Washington from Santo Domingo for this purpose. I am a businessman and have worked for over 25 years in Latin America for the Aluminum Company of America. Accompanying me today is Mr. Keith L. Miceli, executive secretary of the Association.

AACCLA was founded by the American chambers of commerce in Latin America in 1967 to provide a means for them to collectively address new challenges created by the region's economic growth. The American chamber movement in Latin America, however, began in 1915 with the establishment of the chamber in Rio de Janeiro. Today, AACCLA consists of 16 American chambers whose underlying memberships represent over 17,000 U.S. and host country companies and individual businessmen located throughout the Hemisphere.

These businessmen and their companies are responsible for managing the overwhelming majority of the estimated $24 billion of U.S. foreign direct investment in the region as well as a large part of the $35 billion of total U.S.-Latin American trade. Through AACCLA, our members formulate positions on issues that critically affect the economic and commercial relations between the United States and Latin America.

The Panama Canal is clearly such an issue. For many years, most U.S. business leaders working in Latin America have recognized the importance for the United States to modernize its relationship with Panama vis-a-vis the Canal. When the current round of negotiations got underway, the initiative was noted by many of us as a timely effort to bring this 70 year-old arrangement into a form more in agreement with contemporary U.S.-Latin American relations, while preserving the U.S. national interests involved.

For this reason, AACCLA was the first U.S. business association, I am proud to say, to endorse renegotiation of the Panama Canal Treaty based on the Tack-Kissinger "principles" agreed to in 1974. We support the U.S. commitment to seek a new and fairer arrangement with Panama and applaud the wisdom of four Administrations in working to protect our national interests by looking to the future and not to the past.

We believe that the "principles" provided a sound basis for safeguarding the national interests of both nations and we were convinced that the negotiations were being conducted on a basis of good faith since both nations share the primary objective of maintaining an open and efficiently operated canal. We therefore actively supported the negotiations process and have opposed Congressional initiatives which would have blocked progress.

Late last year, long and careful review was given by AACCLA to the terms of the draft treaties and to related arguments—both pro and con. On November 1, 1977, meeting in San Jose, Costa Rica, the AACCLA Board of Directors approved a policy urging Senate ratification of the Treaties. The text of our policy position is attached to my statement.

AACCLA supports ratification for two fundamental reasons:

First, the Treaties would bind the United States and Panama in a partnership committed to maintaining the Canal open, secure, and efficiently operated. We know, for example, that under the terms of the Panama Canal Treaty, the United States will continue to have primary operating responsibility for over 20 years or until the year 2000. During this time period, Panamanians, who now constitute 70 percent of the labor force, will be trained to assume the remaining administration and technical jobs.

As U.S. businessmen in Latin America, we are well aware of the competence of Latin Americans, including Panamanians, as many currently serve in high-level corporate positions, successfully managing large, complex, multi-million dollar enterprises. Therefore, we feel, and indeed have no doubt, that the Panamanians can, in such a time span, master the technical and managerial requirements for administering and operating the Canal.

Of great significance as a motivating factor for sound administration by Panama is the fact that the Treaties increase Panama's economic stake in the Canal. What Panama earns from this enterprise will be directly related to the level of traffic that moves efficiently through the Canal. It should be remembered that Panama derives approximately 12 percent of its gross domestic product, 18 percent of its foreign exchange earnings, and employs over 10,000 of its people in Canal-related activities. With the Canal being their most important economic resource, it follows that the Panamanians will be extremely motivated to keep the Canal open and efficiently operated.

Future Canal tolls are a consideration of importance to businessmen in the region. We feel the economic incentives I just mentioned, along with certain commercial factors, will have a moderating effect on the setting of tolls. The reason is that excessive increases would result in a decline of total revenues to Panama because of lessened demand. Like similar waterways elsewhere, the Canal operates in a competitive "market" where users can consider options. Such options to the Canal include: alternate routing, alternate modes of transportation, and alternate market sourcing for certain commodities. There is no doubt in my mind that the Panamanians are well aware that the levy of excessive tolls will make the Canal uncompetitive and market forces would result in the use of these "alternatives." I have no doubt that they are also aware that once such a process of using alternates is underway, the financial and organizational investment by the importers, exporters, and shippers involved is unlikely to be easily abandoned.

In this regard it is important to keep in mind that use of the Canal is relatively much larger for many Latin American countries than for the United States. For example, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Chile, Colombia, Guatemala, Peru, and Costa Rica use the Canal for transiting anywhere from 30 to 80 percent of their international trade. These countries will not hesitate to remind their Latin American "sister" nation about the vital importance of reasonable tolls for their economic well-being.

The second reason that AACCLA supports ratification of the Treaties is that their acceptance will remove a major issue used by those who espouse anti-American feelings throughout Latin America. It will demonstrate to the developing world, including Latin America, that the United States is willing to seek new relationships with smaller countries in keeping with today's world where power alone does not guarantee right.

We must understand that, just as the Canal's construction came to symbolize the resourcefulness and ingenuity of the American people, the 1903 Treaty is a symbol to the Panamanian people and Latin America as well—one which unnecessarily invokes the old image of U.S. paternalism and interventionism.

For years, Latin American governments and peoples have urged the United States to conclude a more just and equitable treaty with Panama.

That Latin America has approved the long-awaited Treaties is evidenced by the media coverage which I have collected:

A columnist in the nationalistic Mexican newspaper Excelsior wrote, "On very few occasions has there been so wide a consensus in the Hemisphere as in the case of supporting the Panamanian cause * * *"

The conservative Brazilian newspaper O Estado de Sao Paulo declared that the Treaties "represent a great success for American diplomacy. This success, however, will be complete and total only if approved by the U.S. Senate * * * The Canal represents the last residue of American colonialism."

The liberal El Tiempo of Bogota, Colombia, while noting the respect won by the United States "all over the world" declared, "It is regrettable that many of the treaty's critics rely on distortion of what the accord actually signifies in order to avoid conceding the elemental justice it calls for."

The English language Daily Journal of Caracas, Venezuela, saw it as "a great achievement that the Government of the number-one world power and the Government of one of the world's weakest nations could peaceably reach * * * an agreement on such a difficult historic issue."

The independent La Republica of San Jose, Costa Rica, declared, "The signing of the new treaty turns a dream into reality. At the same time it shows the way to a new road. It has come about because of good will on the part of the United States, responsibility from the Panamanians and solidarity of all the countries belonging to the OAS * * *

The independent Listin Diario of Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, asserted that, "The U.S. now can have the satisfaction of knowing that its child out of wedlock has been legitimized as the precious resource of Panama, to be * * * for the service of Panamanian development * * *"

The conservative La Segunda of Santiago, Chile, stated that if the Treaties fall Senate ratification, it would "be the equivalent of Woodrow Wilson's failure to obtain approval of the League of Nations treaty in 1920. But if the Senate gives its approval, it will be a great success for the U.S. * * *"

Regarding the September 7 treaty signing ceremony in Washington, the independent El Universo of Guayaquil, Ecuador, praised President Carter for courage and said the occasion "can signify, if he continues his policy, a historic change for the Hemisphere with a new sense of equality and respect prevailing in future inter-American relations * * *"

And, the El Expreso of Lima, Peru, declared that "for all the countries of America, Wednesday was a day of jubilation and renewed hope in fraternal ties within the Hemisphere"

Given views such as these, which are common throughout Latin America, ratification of the Treaties will be seen as a reaffirmation of our American values of justice and national self-determination—the principles upon which our country was founded.

With respect to the national security aspects of the Treaties, our Board members accept the assurances by President Carter, the Secretaries of State and Defense, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that the terms of the Treaties provide the necessary guarantees for the secure, peaceful, and expeditious transit of our ships in peace and war. We found that the Carter-Torrijos "Statement of Understanding" prompted, in part, by your Committee hearings, further clarified those Treaty provisions.

In the event that the Treaties are not ratified by the U.S. Senate, I believe that our relations with Panama would be shattered and our relations with Latin America damaged. More importantly, I believe that it would provide extremists on both ends of the political spectrum throughout the Hemisphere—particularly the leftists—a tailor-made issue with which to whip-up anti-American feelings. It would create a highly charged emotional environment in which the Canal itself might be jeopardized, along with other symbols of the United States—including American companies throughout Latin America.

In conclusion, the AACCLA policy position in support of ratification of the Treaties, adopted by AACCLA's Board of Directors, on behalf of the American chambers of commerce throughout the Hemisphere, is based on practical considerations. It is founded in our belief that: (1) the Treaties propose a feasible means for safeguarding future U.S. commercial interests in the Canal, and (2) ratification of the Treaties will be the most important U.S. action taken in recent years leading to improved relations with Latin America.

The policy position of AACCLA follows:

AACCLA POLICY POSITION ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES ADOPTED AT THE V MID-YEAR
MEETING IN SAN JOSE, COSTA RICA, NOVEMBER 1, 1977

The Association of American Chambers of Commerce in Latin America in 1975 endorsed the need for a renegotiated treaty which would protect the national interests of Panama and the United States and assure effective operations of the Canal as an international commercial facility.

It is the consensus of the Board of Directors of the Association of American Chambers of Commerce in Latin America that the terms of the Panama Canal treaties of 1977 are (1) consistent with its earlier support of the Statement of Principles of 1974; and (2) that the treaties provide a basis for safeguarding the national interests of both nations in the Panama Canal as a reliable and secure international commercial facility.

Goodwill between the two nations is an essential element for the effective implementation of any agreements and, in the opinion of the Board, ratification of the treaties would generate such goodwill with Panama as well as throughout the hemisphere.

Therefore, AACCLA urges ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

STATEMENT OF DONALD G. GRIFFIN

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, my name is Donald G. Griffin. I am vice president—distribution and transportation of PPG Industries, Inc., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. I am also chairman of the Policy Implementation Committee of the Transportation Association of America, known as TAA, of Washington, D.C. I appear today on behalf of TAA. With me is Colin Barrett, vice president—governmental affairs of the Association.

TAA is a national non-profit organization whose members include carriers of all modes of transportation—airlines, motor carriers, pipelines, railroads, water carriers (both domestic and international) and freight forwarders—as well as commercial users of the services of these carriers and investors in the transportation industry. The role of TAA is to provide a forum wherein the divergent views of these varied interests may be reconciled for the good of the transportation community as a whole on issues of major importance to transportation. Members include leading corporations from all sectors of the U.S. business community; as information, I am attaching to copies of my prepared statement a roster of the TAA Board of Directors, to indicate the breadth and scope of TAA's membership.

My statement will deal with the Panama Canal as an artery of commerce—including U.S. intercoastal and international—and the economic impact of the proposed treaty on the users of the Canal, both domestic and foreign. I will also make observations regarding its impact on the U.S. taxpayer and the Republic of Panama. I will not deal with any geopolitical or military aspects of the Canal.

(1) The Canal as an instrument of commerce. In fiscal 1976, 12,150 transits were made through the Canal, with a total of 127.8 million Panama Canal net tons. Approximately four percent of this tonnage was moving from U.S. ports to U.S. ports; sixty-two percent was moving from or to U.S. ports to or from foreign ports, and thirty-four percent was moving from foreign ports to foreign ports.

If not a monopoly, the Canal represents an artery which dominates the choice of its usage for those now employing it. Alternatives to the use of the Canal are "land-bridge" operations across the United States or oceanborne operations around Cape Horn. In many cases these alternatives are impractical or grossly uneconomical, leaving cargoes that must cross between the oceans with no realistic option save transit of the Canal. Studies have been conducted which indicate that tolls could at least double before most cargoes would receive even initial consideration for diversion.

In this respect, we take note that the treaty proposes to strengthen Panama's monopolistic position by committing the United States not to consider a proposed new sea-level canal, which might compete with the existing Panama Canal, through any Latin American nation other than Panama—save with Panama's consent.

(2) Security of commercial transit. It is our understanding that one of the objectives of the new treaty is to enhance the long-term security of the Canal as an artery of commerce. We highly applaud this objective.

(3) Economic impact on various parties. Attached to the written copies of my statement are appendices in which we have sought to project the economic impact of this treaty on various parties. In addition to projections of other commercial cargoes, we are presuming that 400,000 barrels per day of Alaskan crude oil will transit the Canal to U.S. Gulf and Atlantic ports.

(a) Impact on Republic of Panama. We note that direct payments to the Republic of Panama increase from a present level of $2.3 million per year to approximately $67.5 million a year, exclusive of an additional payment of up to $10 million from any revenue surplus resulting from Canal operations. There are also provisions for the future increase of two payments included in this projected $67.5 million total—the $10 million annual service payment, and the 30¢-per-ton annuity payment.

(b) Impact on users of the Canal, through tolls. We note that tolls are projected to increase by thirty percent, or $59.8 million, over present levels. Forty-three percent of the impact of this toll increase will fall on U.S. users of the Canal, and fifty-seven percent on foreign users, mostly from the free world.

(c) Impact on U.S. taxpayers. The U.S. Government, under implementing legislation now being prepared by the State Department will forego collection of interest payments from the Panama Canal Company, which in fiscal 1978 have been estimated by the Company at $19.7 million.

Thus, shippers and the U.S. taxpayers together would in our fiscal 1979 projection contribute a total of approximately $79.5 million. In addition to the $67.5 million in direct payments to the Republic of Panama, another approximate $11.8 million will find its way into the Canal operations and the Panamanian economy, we project.

TAA's basic concern is with the prospective 30% increase in tolls. Canal tolls have already been increased 19.7% in 1974 and an additional 19.5% in 1976. We also note that the projected 30% increase will apply on the approximately 17¢ per barrel it now costs to ship Alaskan crude oil through the Canal in quantities which will soon rise above 400,000 barrels per day.

TAA policy adheres to the principle that the users of transportation facilities should bear reasonable costs thereof. With respect to the Panama Canal, our policy, however, is that tolls should be increased no more than necessary to cover "direct operating costs of the Canal itself." It is our view that the magnitude of the increases in payments to the Republic of Panama under this treaty may suggest the presence of considerations in excess of what would be viewed as normal increases in these operating costs. We do not know what weight was given by the treaty negotiators to these payments reflecting the overall national interest of the United States vis-a-vis the Republic of Panama.

Our proposals to lessen the economic impact of this treaty on U.S. commerce through the toll structure embrace the following points:

(1) Interest payments to the U.S. Government. As I stated previously, it is our understanding that implementing legislation being drafted by the State Department will include provisions foregoing further U.S. collection of interest payments on the U.S. investment in the Canal, projected in fiscal 1978 to be $19.7 million. We support this approach.

(2) Costs associated with assets to be transferred to the Republic of Panama. Under this treaty, assets having a depreciated book value of $92 million, including real estate, buildings, etc., are to be transferred to the Republic of Panama immediately upon ratification of this treaty. We understand that, under the draft implementing legislation, this transfer will not be treated as a cost to the proposed Panama Canal Commission, and operating expenses associated with these assets, including depreciation, will be eliminated from the Canal's operating budget. Again, we support this approach.

(3) Transition costs. The Panama Canal Company has estimated that transition costs aggregating $9.7 million will be incurred in connection with implementation of the treaty. These are one-time costs, and as such are inappropriate, in our view, for inclusion in the rate base upon which Canal tolls are predicated. In our view, they should either be treated as capital outlays or else borne directly by the United States Government as a cost of administering the foreign policy of this nation.

(4) Depreciation and capital expenditures.

(a) Depreciation of original 1903 treaty and excavations. Commencing in 1973, a new annual cost of $8.3 million was added to Canal operating expenses, representing depreciation (over a 40-year period) of the original 1903 treaty and excavations and other related items. It is quite inappropriate, in our view, to begin "depreciating" assets more than seven decades after the original expenditures were made, and we believe this depreciation charge should be removed from the Canal's operating budget.

(b) Capital expenditures. In testimony presented late last year before the Panama Canal Subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Governor H. R. Parfitt estimated that capital requirements for the Canal in future years will exceed depreciation allowances by $7-10 million annually. This increment would, of course, be increased if our recommendation for eliminating the depreciation reserve attributed to the 1903 treaty and excavations is adopted. He suggested that such capital outlays in excess of depreciations be included in the rate base on which tolls are structured.

In our view, this comes perilously close to the error of treating capital outlays as operating costs. We believe that such outlays should be capitalized in accordance with normal business practices, and that the Panama Canal Commission should be required to meet these obligations in the same manner as commercial business enterprises—i.e., through diversion of earned surpluses, borrowings, etc. Under no circumstances should such outlays be regarded as part of the rate base, recoverable in the year they are made through the toll structure, save to the extent that their costs may be fairly attributed to that year through depreciation accounts and requirements for the servicing of indebtedness.

In this context, we feel it is inappropriate for the Canal to be permitted to earn surpluses so long as capital needs are not met through Canal revenues. To the extent earnings which might otherwise represent surpluses in excess of operating costs do not exceed accrued capital obligations, they should be treated as capital reserve funds, to be retained by the Panama Canal Commission. We note that, under provisions of this treaty, the first $10 million of any surplus revenues must be paid over to the Republic of Panama; and that liability is a cumulative one during the life of the treaty.

We believe implementing legislation accompanying this treaty should incorporate the foregoing provisions in the interests of a sound financial structure of the Canal.

(5) Public policy considerations in the treaty. Defenders of this treaty have previously testified that it is intended to meet two objectives: (1) Increased security of the Canal as an artery of commerce, and (2) accomplishment of various goals of the U.S. foreign policy, such as improvement of relations with Panama and our other Latin American neighbors, improvement of the U.S. "image" abroad, etc. It would therefore appear that costs incurred as a result of this treaty are attributable in part, at least, to administration of the public policies of the United States Government.

Policies developed by the membership of TAA urge that the Government not employ its powers over the transportation industry "as an instrument of implementing social policy." By this we mean that the cost of public-policy activities and programs whose benefit will inure to the nation as a whole should be paid for by the nation as a whole, through taxpayers' funds; their cost burden should not be thrust, by Government fiat, upon any individual part of the private sector such as the transportation industry.

It is our view that the costs associated with this treaty must be attributed in some part to the implementation of U.S. foreign policy independent of the Canal and/or its operations. In this regard, we take particular note that the current payments to the Republic of Panama, amounting to approximately $2.3 million annually, are now borne only about one-third by the Panama Canal Company; the balance of these payments are included in the State Department's budget. We believe the U.S. Government should bear a pro-rata share of the economic burden associated with this treaty, based on a fair and equitable assessment of the relative benefits of the treaty to Canal users and to the United States as a nation.

We are aware that the treaty itself now provides that these payments be made "out of Canal operating revenues." It is our understanding that this provision was incorporated in the treaty primarily for the protection of the U.S. Government, to ensure that it would incur no unforeseen financial obligations, and not at the behest of the Republic of Panama; hence, their removal from the language of the treaty should not represent a major renegotiation. Alternatively, the U.S. Government might make a direct contribution of its pro-rata share of the treaty costs to the Panama Canal Commission, with provision in domestic implementing legislation that such contribution be treated as part of the Canal operating revenues.

This treaty confronts the U.S. transportation community, to the extent it participates in movements via the Panama Canal, with the prospect of a very substantial immediate increase in tolls hard on the heels of two recent past increases, as well as the further prospect of additional future increases of unforeseeable magnitude. Under these circumstances, it is our view that the economic consequences of this treaty warrant the most careful attention by the Senate, and we urge that our proposals for alleviating its economic consequences on the commerce of the United States be given close study.

On behalf of TAA and its members, I would like to express our appreciation for this opportunity to present our views, and for your attention today.

² Source: Verbal communication between TAA and officials of the Panama Canal Company.

³ Independent research conducted by TAA indicates that, when the Alyeska Pipeline reaches its scheduled maximum flow of 1.2 million barrels per day—which is expected in late summer or early fall of 1978—at least 400,000 barrels per day (or 146,000,000 barrels per year) will have to be moved to trans-mountain eastern or midwest points for refining and distribution. There is no possibility that any projected trans-mountain pipeline can be constructed and operational before early in fiscal 1980 at the earliest, and other modes of transporting this oil (such as via Cape Horn and the Straits of Magellan) are considered economically or operationally impracticable. Hence, virtually this entire volume, at a minimum, must move to Gulf or Atlantic destinations via the Panama Canal. Officials of the Panama Canal Company advise that there are approximately 7.5 barrels of oil per Panama Canal net ton.

It should be noted that the Alyeska Pipeline did not commence operations until July, 1977, and no oil moved out of the port of Valdez, Alaska, until August of 1977. Virtually no Alaskan oil, thus, is included in the fiscal 1977 tonnage figures of the Panama Canal Company; all of it represents new, incremental traffic over and above projections based on fiscal 1977 actual tonnage.

Present toll per laden Panama Canal net ton	$1.29
Present toll per Panama Canal net ton in ballast	$1.03
Weighted average ¹ toll per Panama Canal net ton, loaded and in ballast	$1.255
Projected fiscal 1979 total net tonnage transiting Panama Canal (in Panama Canal net tons) ²	159,800,000
Projected fiscal 1979 toll revenues (based on present tolls) ³	$199,400,000

¹ Determined on the basis of fiscal 1978 projections developed by the Panama Canal Company and incorporated in testimony presented by Governor H. R. Parfitt to the Panama Canal Subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries November 30, 1977. The Company estimates that approximately 141,570,000 Panama Canal net tons will transit the Canal during fiscal 1978, generating toll revenues of $177,637,000. Inherent in these figures is the presumption that approximately 86.5% of this tonnage will be laden, and 13.5% in ballast. These percentages comport with those derived for fiscal 1976 from data included in the Panama Canal Company's annual report for that year, as well.

³ Determined by multiplying projected fiscal 1979 Panama Canal net tonnage by $1.25½, the average toll for all traffic, laden and in ballast.

[In thousands of dollars]

	1978 budget	1978 with treaty changes

Transition costs:
Severance pay		6,093
Repatriation		1,350
Plant relocations		2,236
Total transition costs		9,679
Total recoverable from tolls in 1978 dollars		228,644
Toll revenue at existing rates		177,637
Net deficiency in toll revenue		50,412

² The restated figures for governmental activities include principally cost for fire, sanitation and industrial health services, sewers and public areas maintenance and, on transitional basis, police, and courts.

³ The 1977 budget estimated repayment to the Treasury of $5,300,000 in unearned costs withheld in prior years. The actual repayment in 1978 will be made to the extent earned, and the balance, if any, repaid from earnings projected for fiscal year 1979.

⁴ It is expected that capital outlay expenditures will be constrained so as to approximate the level of depreciation charged through the transition period. However, over the long run, capital outlay expenditures will range between $7,000,000 and $10,000,000 in excess of depreciation.

Note: TAA predicts that a 28.4-percent increase in projected fiscal year 1978 toll revenues will be required to make up the projected deficit to allow for traffic diversion resulting from a toll increase of this magnitude. TAA estimates that the minimum toll increase that will be immediately required, based on these figures, will be 30 percent.

APPENDIX E.—ESTIMATE OF PANAMA CANAL TOLL BURDEN ON U.S. ECONOMY

(In thousands)

	Total	U.S. import/export		U.S. domestic
		Amount	Percent	Amount	Percent
Panama Canal traffic:
Fiscal 1977 actual	134,000	83,080	¹ 62.0	5,360	¹ 4.0
Fiscal 1979 projected tonnage (less Alaskan oil traffic) ²	139,400	86,428	62.0	5,576	4.0
Fiscal 1979 projected Alaskan oil traffic ³	19,500		0	19,500	100.0
Total	158,900	86,426	54.4	25,076	15.8

³ See app. B, footnote 3.

Note: It is presumed that 100 percent of the toll burden attributable to domestic U.S. traffic falls on the U.S. economy. It is further presumed that 50 percent of the toll burden of U.S. import/export traffic falls on the U.S. economy, with the remaining 50 percent falling on the economies of America's trading partners regarding this traffic. Based on these assumptions, the U.S. economy bears a toll burden equal to 15.8 percent plus $\frac{1}{2}$ of 54.4 percent, or 43 percent.

APPENDIX F.—IMPACT OF TAA RECOMMENDATIONS ON TOLL-INCREASE NEEDS, FISCAL 1979

	Without treaty	With treaty

I. Based on Panama Canal Company projections: ¹
Tolls (loaded/ballast)	$1.29/103	$1.68/1.34
Toll revenues based on fiscal year 1979 traffic projections (millions) ²	199.4	259.2	$59.8
II. Adjustments recommended by TAA (millions):

2. Eliminate costs associated with assets being transferred immediately to Panama ⁴		(?)	(?)
3. Eliminate 1-time transition costs, and ensuing capital expenditures of approximately equivalent annual amount ⁵		9.7	9.7
4. Eliminate depreciation cost for 1903 treaty and excavations		8.3	8.3
Subtotal		17.0	17.0
Subtract (II) from (I) above (millions)		242.2	42.8

² Based on 30-percent toll increase; see app. D.

⁴ It is understood that implementing legislation now being drafted by the State Department provides for these cost elements to be eliminated, as TAA recommends. Accordingly, these adjustments have already been made in the Panama Canal Company's projections, and are not deducted here a 2nd time. Note that TAA has been unable to ascertain the dollar amount of costs, including depreciation, associated with the assets being transferred to Panama immediately upon ratification of the treaty by both nations.

⁵ See app. D for the 1-time transition costs. In footnote 4, Governor Parfitt notes that in the future capital costs in excess of depreciation will be incurred at the rate of approximately $7,000,000 to $10,000,000 annually; accordingly, the $9,700,000 transition costs have been regarded as a reasonable approximation of these future capital costs for years following the transition year.

Note: Based on these adjustments, a toll increase of only 22–23 percent, rather than 30 percent, would be required to generate the necessary added revenues. No account is taken here of possible further adjustments through absorption by the U.S. Government of a portion of the burden of treaty payments to Panama pro-rated according to the foreign policy benefits of the treaty accruing to the United States.

STATEMENT OF JAMES J. REYNOLDS

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am James J. Reynolds, President of the American Institute of Merchant Shipping, commonly known as AIMS. AIMS is the national trade association of the American-flag oceangoing merchant fleet and includes in its membership companies which own or operate independent or proprietary American-flag tankers, chemical carriers, liquefied gas carriers and dry bulk carriers. Many of our members utilize the Canal in their operations.

The primary interest of shipowners is in the continued safe and efficient operation of the Panama Canal for reasonable toll charges by an entity which recognizes, and strives to maintain, this waterway's commercial viability. AIMS has not adopted a position on ratification of the treaties under consideration today and cannot intelligently do so until very critical matters bearing upon future toll structure and operation of the Canal are clarified. Our concern is that the Administration has failed to take into account the diversion of traffic which is likely to result from toll increases of the magnitude mentioned by Treaty Negotiators in testimony before this Committee.

It is true that the technologically advanced American-flag liner vessels which currently use the Canal realize significant savings in so doing because of their relatively high daily operating costs and the disadvantage of using much longer alternative routes. Unless tolls are handled rationally with only moderate increases, however, this situation will change and the economic commitment made to Panama in the proposed treaties may become an empty promise. Vessels carrying bulk commodities to or from the United States and the Far East via the Panama Canal are particularly toll sensitive and any increases in charges may well price these commodities out of present markets unless they are carried on very large slow-speed bulkers around the Horn or eastward over the South Atlantic and around the Cape of Good Hope. We respectfully urge this Committee to examine carefully the economic projections which have been made with regard to the Canal in light of our testimony today.

The Canal has been very useful to world commerce. In fiscal year 1977, 122.9 million tons of commercial cargo traversed its fifty-one miles between two great oceans. This cargo figures importantly in the commerce of the United States and that of our Central and South American neighbors. The long-term trend has been for Canal traffic and tolls revenue to increase continually, although the deficits experienced in fiscal years 1975 and 1976 demonstrate the relevance of world economic conditions to Canal usage. The Canal can handle considerably more traffic than it presently does and projections submitted to this Committee last year by Secretary of Transportation Brock Adams show transits increasing from 13,201 in 1976 to 21,300 in 2000, out of a theoretical Canal capacity of 26,800. We submit that if such projections are to be realized the toll structure must be characterized by reasonable stability and a rational procedure be established for their adjustment when necessary.

One very recent favorable development in Canal transits and toll revenue has arisen from the start up of crude oil from the Alaskan North Slope through the port of Valdez. From the passage of the first tanker shuttling North Slope oil through the Canal from VLCC's off Balboa to Gulf port on August 31, 1977 through the end of November, $2,327,000 in new tolls revenue already has been generated by this activity, with $36.5 million annually expected as shipments reach their projected maximum. Unfortunately, this movement through the Canal may be relatively short lived depending on the availability in a few years of alternative pipeline transportation, for which necessary State and Federal approvals are now pending.

Despite these generally optimistic statistics, we cannot emphasize too strongly, the fact that the continued commercial attractiveness of the Canal to American and foreign-flag vessels alike depends to a considerable extent on keeping tolls reasonable. If, on the other hand, tolls are permitted to escalate sharply as has been suggested by Administration witnesses, freight surcharges will become necessary and much of the cargo now moving through the Canal will either cease to move or shippers will seek alternative routes. Indeed some U.S. and foreign flag operators in reaction to a series of toll increases in recent years totaling more than fifty percent are already redirecting their vessels carrying Atlantic coast and Gulf cargoes to distant Far Eastern Ports by way of the Suez Canal or via the South Atlantic down around the Cape of Good Hope.

Our intercoastal and East-Orient trades are particularly susceptible to shipper reaction to higher costs and if tolls are unreasonably increased cargo will increasingly find its way across the continental United States by rail. The resultant decline in transits will place a burden of still higher tolls on those operators and cargoes for which there is no alternative to using the Canal. The land and mini bridges will become even more attractive to shippers of goods, to the detriment of a strong U.S. Merchant Marine and to the detriment of an economically viable Canal.

Those members of Congress and the public who appreciate the need for a strong U.S. Merchant Marine should be aware that American-flag vessels as a group would tend to lose more cargo than foreign-flag vessels if the Canal is priced out of their reach and they are forced into trades in which they are not competitive. A great many of the American-flag ships which use the Canal are containerships. The average containership presently pays about $20,000 to transit the Canal, which is roughly equivalent to an average day's operating costs. On shorter voyages such as between the West Coast of South America and North Atlantic ports, where the percentage increase in voyage time by an alternative route around the Horn is the greatest, the impact of re-routing to avoid the Canal would be particularly devastating.

Turning to the proposed treaties, we see that the Canal faces two distinct time periods—the period between now and the year 2000 and the post-2000 period. Article III of the Neutrality Treaty, our guide to the latter period, lists the following rules for purposes of “the security, efficiency and proper maintenance of the Canal”:

“(a) The Canal shall be operated efficiently in accordance with conditions of transit through the Canal, and rules and regulations that shall be just, equitable and reasonable, and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal;

“(b) Ancillary services necessary for transit through the Canal shall be provided;

“(c) Tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services shall be just, reasonable, equitable and consistent with the principles of international law. . .”

Certainly no one could take exception to this most reasonable statement of intent. However, the administration of the Canal after the year 2000 will be an irrelevant matter if its handling during the remainder of this century results in the diversion of traffic to alternative routes and the emergence of new supply patterns not requiring the Canal. For this reason, we intend to concentrate on the period prior to the second millenium and address particularly those provisions of the main treaty which provide for payments to the Republic of Panama from toll revenues during the transition period.

Article III (5) calls for the annual payment of $10 million to reimburse Panama for providing police, fire protection, street maintenance, street lighting, street cleaning, traffic management and garbage collection.

Article XIII 4(a), (b) and (c) call for payments to Panama of $.30 per Panama Canal ton transiting the Canal plus a fixed annuity of $10 million plus up to a second $10 million, if earned, with any unearned balance each year to be paid from operating surpluses in future years.

Ambassadors Bunker and Linowitz have repeatedly emphasized that none of these payments will be borne by U.S. taxpayers, a position which ignores the fact that U.S. consumers who are also taxpayers will indeed pay a very considerable portion of the payments since two-thirds of the cargo passing through the Canal and which will bear the additional cost either originates in or is destined for this country.

There are those who hold the view that since the conclusion of the Panama Canal Treaty was accomplished to attain most significant international objectives of our nation it is the entire nation which should bear the costs during the transition period. It probably does seem somewhat illogical to vessel user of the Canal whose ships fly the flags of all nations that they should be required to pay through increased toll rates the price of the United States improving its relations with our neighbors to the South, the price of improving its credibility in the family of nations and the price of removing from its posture as a great and good nation one of the last taints of colonialism remaining on earth.

On the other hand, as a very realistic matter, it is probably expecting too much of the American people through you, its trustees in the matter, to approve the United States presenting the Republic of Panama with the Canal and then to pay it some $60 million a year for 22 years for the privilege of accepting it.

The disquiet shared by all the users of the Canal, both U.S. flag and others, arises from the obvious expectation that they are about to be asked to bear very significant additional financial burdens beyond those they are required to bear today. We all have heard predictions from the State Department that the tolls may be increased by 25% to 46% at the outset to meet the payment provisions of the new treaty. Our inquiries as to the basis for this calculation have led us to believe that the U.S. Government has given insufficient attention to the Canal's financial situation. We therefore would like to present a few suggestions for mitigating what we believe could be a very detrimental if not fatal impact on the future of the Canal resulting from overburdened tolls.

The problem and our suggestions for its possible mitigation become clear if we superimpose the treaty payment obligations on the Canal financial results as though the Treaty had been in effect for the fiscal year 1977 ended last September 30.

During fiscal '77, 122.9 million long tons of commercial cargo traversed the Canal. These actual tons converted to 134.3 million Panama Canal tons upon which $164.7 million were paid in toll fees during the year. Additionally, there was other income arising from direct and indirect operating sources of $121.7 million giving us a total income of $286.4 million against which there were expenses both direct and indirect of $281.0 million leaving an apparent profit of $5.4 million.

Unfortunately, that $5.4 million profit was owed to and had to be paid to the U.S. Treasury for deferred interest of $9.3 million on the net investment of the United States. So for all practical purposes the Canal broke even in fiscal 1977.

Now let's see what the situation would have been had the Treaty been in effect during that period. You will recall that there were 134.3 million Panama Canal tons transiting the Canal and it would have been on these that the $30 per ton payment to Panama would have been computed, namely $40.3 million. An additional $10 million direct annuity would have been paid on top of the $40.3 million making the additional toll burden $50.3 million to which again must be added the $10 million payments for various social services, police, fire protection, etc., making the total $60.3 million. Obviously, that $10 million to be paid only if the Canal operated at a profit would not have been paid for we're now up to a fiscal year loss of $60.3 million!

While all this was taking place on our pro forma 1977 operating statement, we see that tolls were being required to bear a cost of $18.1 million in interest charges on the net investment of the United States. We see that tolls were charged with $22.1 million to make up for the net loss in running the Canal Zone Government and we note that tolls were debited with an annual charge of $8.3 million in depreciation of the 1903 Treaty, excavations and other items totaling $332 million, a practice inaugurated in 1973 after 70 years of silence and inaction. These three items alone add up to $48.5 million of questionable existing burdens on the toll structure.

Now admittedly this entire pro forma exercise gives us at best just a rough approximation of what will happen to toll rates and to the cost of Canal users and consumers if payments to the Republic of Panama are merely added on top of the existing list of costs the toll structure must presently bear.

It is with this background that we respectfully suggests the Congress insist that the existing financial practices and structure of the Canal operation be carefully reviewed to the end that all existing unwarranted burdens on tolls including, but not limited to, those we have mentioned be eliminated in implementing legislation before we start payments to Panama. We submit that such action coupled with the new Alaskan oil toll revenue mentioned earlier should provide the source of payments to Panama while at the same time assuring a degree of stability to toll rates and a gradual increase in Canal transits so important to the continued economic viability of the Canal.

Thank you.

TESTIMONY BY MELVIN SHORE

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before your Honorable Committee to convey the thinking of the United States port industry relative to the possible ratification by the Senate of the United States of the Panama Canal Treaty.

UNITED STATES PORTS

The American Association of Port Authorities represents practically all the major ports of the four coasts (including the Great Lakes) of the United States, as well as ports in Canada, Central and South America. Please note that I am speaking on behalf of the United States ports. There have been some informal expressions of support for our position by the foreign members, but no official position has been taken that sets forth a western hemispheric position.

The ports of the United States have grown up over a period of 200 years as a result of a unique combination of federal and local investment. The federal investment has been expended primarily for the construction of harbors and channels, i.e., creating access for the ships of the world. These investments have only been made upon adequate showing of local interest in the project. This display of interest took place in the form of cost sharing to a substantial degree with the federal government as well as construction of terminal facilities for the handling of cargoes. It is of interest that the federal investment for the construction of deep water channels and harbors to date amounts to approximately $3 billion. This sum is exceeded by the investment of the local interests of some $5 billion.

LOCAL PORT INVESTMENT

This $5 billion investment by the local interests is what is handling the ocean commerce of the United States. This ocean commerce amounts to some 860 million tons per annum, a very significant accomplishment on the part of the ports of the United States. We estimate that this same investment is responsible for the employment of more than 1,200,000 Americans, directly and indirectly.

Almost universally, this investment of $5 billion was made by the sale of general obligation and revenue bonds by states, cities and special port districts. These investments have been made as there was a demonstrated need for each of the facilities. It is these local interests and their investments that has helped to make possible the growth of the United States international trade:

FROM $35 BILLION IN 1960 TO ALMOST $200 BILLION IN 1977

It is this type of growth that has caused an estimated 75% of the local investments in ports to have been made since the end of World War II, in just over 30 years.

LOCAL COMMITMENTS

It need not be emphasized that these investments are to be paid back as are all bond issues. Uniquely, however, in the port industry the intent is, and always has been, to pay off these bonds out of income. Any activity which suddenly changes the patterns of trade could have disastrous results upon the ability of the local entity to pay off their bonded indebtedness.

This then brings us to our concern relative to the Panama Canal Treaty now before your Honorable Committee. It is our belief that the Treaty has all of the seeds of potential serious impacts upon these economic investments that have been made in good faith by the local interests to help foster the international trade of the United States. Please understand, too, that many of our members hold other concerns relative to the Treaty, but in keeping with the demands of our professional organization, we have avoided any comment upon the many emotionally based arguments that have been put forth. No doubt there is considerable merit to many of those arguments, both pro and con.

ATTENTION TO ECONOMICS

Simply stated, it is our contention that too little, if any, attention has been paid to the economics of the future operation and maintenance of the Panama Canal and the related toll structure. An economically dead Canal is no better than a closed Canal. Such an impediment to the flow of international traffic we believe, can seriously affect the business of our ports and consequently burden the local taxpayers with the need to pay off the outstanding bonds or in the alternative lead to default on bond payments.

PAYMENTS FROM TOLLS

It is our understanding of the Treaty that it calls for the following payments to be made to the Republic of Panama from Canal tolls in addition to the funding of maintenance and operation:

1. A payment of 30¢ per Panama Canal ton (100 cubic feet of cargo space). This rate is subject to escalation based upon the Wholesale Price Index. Currently, the 30¢ would yield approximately $40 million per year. The rate is subject to adjustment after five years and each two years thereafter.
2. A payment of $10 million per year which is termed a fixed annuity.
3. A payment of $10 million per year for the services of police and fire protection; street maintenance, lighting and cleaning; traffic management and garbage collecting. This payment is subject to escalation adjustment each three years.
4. An additional $10 million per year to the extent earned but if not earned then carried forward to succeeding years.

ADMINISTRATION POSITION

It appeared that the addition of these payments to the Republic of Panama out of toll revenues would serve to inflate the tolls to a level that could cause serious damage to the volume of traffic transiting the Canal, hence to our ports. We addressed ourselves on the subject to President Carter, under date of November 3, 1977. Copy of that letter is appended as Attachment "A". In particular, we sought the studies upon which the economic conclusions could be reached that the Canal would remain viable. Our letter to President Carter was replied to by Ambassador David H. Popper, under date of December 2, 1977, copy of which is appended as Attachment "B". We found Ambassador Popper's reply non-responsive to our inquiry. He hypothesizes that an increase in tolls of 30% might be adequate to cover the payments to be made to the Republic of Panama and states that they believe this would not significantly discourage the flow of traffic through the Canal. The Ambassador's letter offers no basis for his hypothetical 30% toll increase, nor does he address the subject for the long-term.

SENSITIVITY STUDY

The Ambassador's letter did forward to us a January 1975 study entitled "Panama Canal Toll Rates: Estimates of Maximum Revenues" by Ely M. Brandes and Betty R. Samuel of International Research Associates of Palo Alto, California. We are told that the study is being updated with the later data to be available early this year. The study addresses the attaining of maximum revenue for the Panama Canal Company by toll increases. It lends considerable substance to the point we wish to emphasize, i.e., beyond a certain point there will be diminishing returns when the increased toll drives business away. Further, the study concludes that various cargoes can tolerate varying percentage increases in toll rates. The study does not purport to be responsive to the question of the possible effect of the additional burden of payments to the Republic of Panama on cargo diversions and hence the long-term economic viability of the Canal under the proposed Treaty. We can only conclude that the State Department has negotiated a Treaty without proper consideration of the possible economic effects upon the Canal and certainly with no consideration to the effects upon the ports of the United States.

ADMINISTRATION TESTIMONY

We have reviewed the testimony of the Administration witnesses before your Honorable Committee last September and October as set forth in the document entitled: "Panama Canal Treaties Hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, 95th Congress, First Session."

Part I.—Administration Witnesses

We found little in the statements of these witnesses to allay our concerns. Indeed, we found a great deal of uncertainty expressed by some of the witnesses, e.g.

1. Page 43—Ambassador Linowitz. I think I talked about 25 or 30 percent or something of this kind * * * but it will be in the neighborhood of 30 percent, perhaps 35 percent. (relative to toll increases)

2. Page 271—Secretary Alexander * * * We are now conducting a detailed analysis to determine the exact toll increase which will be necessary to meet expenditures. In subsequent years, we would hold tolls to the minimum necessary to meet costs * * *

3. Page 367—Secretary Adams. It is our opinion, Senator, that an increase in tolls of up to approximately 30% would not change the present mix of traffic * * *

4. Page 445—Mr. Casey. Obviously, if tolls were to increase too greatly, many markets would be hurt severely in much the same manner, if not to the same degree, that they would be if the canal were completely closed.

But it is not certain what toll increase applied over what period of time would be too great * * *

Mr. Chairman, there are other similar types of comments throughout the testimony. We probably could have taken some comfort had a thorough study, directly on point, been presented that demonstrated that, with reasonable assumptions, toll increases could be expected that would demonstrably not adversely affect the movements of cargoes into and out of our ports. The fact that no such report was presented leads us to believe there was none and that the conclusions reached in the Treaty negotiations were based upon other unknown criterion. An attempt to come up with a study at this time seems odd to say the least, regardless of what it shows. Indeed, we must wonder what action would be proposed should the study demonstrate that excessive toll increases would be necessary?

CONTROL OF TOLL LEVELS

Of equal concern for the long-term future is the consist of the Panama Canal Commission and the Panama Canal Consultative Committee. Both bodies have a great deal to do with the setting of future toll levels. We find nothing in the Treaty requirements nor in the testimony of the Administration witnesses, to feel assured that future drastic changes in toll levels will not become the order of the day so as to meet the expected necessary maintenance and operation cost, plus the additional payments to the Republic of Panama. It has been argued that the best interests of all members of the Commission and the Committee will only be served if the Canal remains viable. We would argue that there are many other possible interests that could be served. Indeed, it seems there was little enough attention paid to the economics during the Treaty negotiations to date.

I should stress that we do not argue for no toll increases. With rising costs for maintenance and operations, increases can be expected. These increases would be expected to be in the order of magnitude that shipowners and shippers would face in normal business relations. It does seem that burdening this facility with payments designed for diplomatic purposes is probably asking too much of what is basically a commercial enterprise. If our international relations require payments be made to a foreign government, then let them be the obligation of the nation as a whole, not those of a limited segment of our economy, i.e., the ocean commerce of the United States which in turn would impinge negatively upon our ports.

Of equal concern are the comments attributed to Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt as quoted by Senator Stone on page 60. It certainly appears that the Panamanian understanding of the Treaty is that they will not be expected to keep open an unprofitable Canal. Yet the response of the Administration witnesses seems to depend upon an obscure word "open" buried in the text and the expectation that there would be additional negotiations should that eventually occur.

CANAL IS VIABLE

Finally, I would take issue with those who suggest that the Panama Canal is really not necessary for our international commerce. The customary suggestion is that it is outmoded by the advent of larger vessels. It is a growing misconception that with the news of the ever-larger tanker that the Canal is unnecessary. I am informed that over 92 percent of the world's merchant fleet of approximately 27,000 vessels can transit the Canal. New buildings will also be able to transit the Canal in the same approximate percentage. It is just not true that all vessels are going to continue to get bigger and bigger endlessly. The simple facts of economic life mitigates against such an idea. No shipper or receiver of freight can afford to handle ever larger volumes of cargo per ship without running into problems of interest on the investment in the cargo. Then too the costs associated with the need to enlarge port facilities mitigates against an excessive reliance upon the theory of economies of scale beyond reasonable limits.

There have been some suggestions, too, that the Canal has lost its viability due to the advent of mini-bridge. If anything, the growth of mini-bridge would seem to indicate that the existing toll rates are too high for these types of cargoes. It is also essential that it be recognized that the mini-bridge concept does not bear upon the type of cargoes that tend to most use the Canal, i.e., bulk cargoes. Reference to the chart on page 357 shows that almost 50 percent of the cargoes fall in the three categories of petroleum, grains and coal—all bulk cargoes. These kinds of cargoes continue to require the Panama Canal to move to market. To blithely suggest that they will find alternate routes may very well relegate them to becoming non-cargoes. Transportation costs are a vital portion of the end cost of most bulk cargoes.

Then too we must recognize that over 57 percent of the tonnage moving through the Canal is that of the United States commerce. Large volumes are involved with our exports and our balance of payments can ill-afford the introduction of additional impediments.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, we ask that the Panama Canal Treaty not be ratified by the United States Senate until the effects of the commitments made for diplomatic purposes upon the toll level can either be shown to be nondetrimental or are removed from the toll base. We ask this in recognition of the adverse impact that drastic toll increases will have upon our ocean commerce, and consequently the ports of the United States. We also ask that there be built into the Treaty, if it is to be ratified, some mechanism to control toll increases so as to preclude having a Canal that exists in fact, but is economically dead.

THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION, OF PORT AUTHORITIES,
November 3, 1977.

Reply to: World Trade Center, West Sacramento, Calif.
President J. E. CARTER,
White House, Washington, D.C.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

DEAR PRESIDENT CARTER: The United States members of the American Association of Port Authorities are deeply concerned with certain features of the future of the Panama Canal. Our prime concern centers about the future level of tolls and the economic viability of the Canal.

The American Association of Port Authorities consists of 83 United States ports as well as ports in Canada, Central America and South America. Its concern is the maintenance, operation and economy of port facilities in performing their job of serving the needs of their respective countries in handling the all-important international trade of the world. As such, the Association concerns itself with a wide variety of and concern. Although the official position matters that impinge on its area of interest of the American Association of Port Authorities, set forth below, is that of the United States membership only, informal discussion with Canadian and Latin American members indicate their like concern.

The ports of the United States have grown up over a period of years in a manner that is responsive to the demonstrated needs of cargo movement. They represent an investment of billions of dollars of local funds for wharves, piers, cranes, conveyors, storage facilities of all types, etc. In addition, the United States government has made a sizeable investment in the dredging of waterways and harbors to facilitate these developments. The prime point is that these facilities have evolved slowly over a period of time. Any event, or action, that would precipitously change the relationship between the ports is bound to have a serious dislocational consequence upon many of these investments. This would be brought about by diversion of traffic which would in turn lead to unemployment, inability to pay off local indebtedness, abandoned facilities, etc.

An important element of the traffic patterns upon which the referenced port development is based is the Panama Canal. We are aware of your commitments to see that the Panama Canal is kept open to traffic if the Treaty contemplated is implemented. However, we are unaware of adequate assurances in connection with the economic viability of the Canal, i.e. the level of the tolls. As we understand it, the Canal is to continue to be operated as a self-supporting venture. If this be the case, then the tolls must be set at a level to produce not only sufficient funds to cover its maintenance and operation but the additional funds being committed by the terms of the Treaty.

It is our understanding that the Treaty calls for the following schedule of payments to the country of Panama, all of which must be earned in addition to maintenance and operation expenses:

1. A payment based currently at 30¢ per Panama Canal ton (100 cubic feet of cargo space). The 30¢ rate is subject to future escalation. We understand that this rate will produce approximately $40 million per year at this time.
2. A flat payment of $10 million per year that might be termed "rent".
3. A flat payment of $10 million per year to cover such services as fire protection, police protection, garbage disposal, etc.
4. An additional $10 million per year to the extent that it is earned. Failure to earn the amount in any one year, carries the deficit forward to the following years until paid.

Further, it is our understanding that currently, approximately $18 million per year is paid to the United States Treasury as an interest payment. Since this payment would cease, it would be available to help offset the above $70 million. It would therefore appear that the $52 million deficit would have to be raised by increasing the level of tolls.

Since the Canal is to be an operating business, we have to anticipate that as tolls increase they will reach a point that will serve to discourage the flow of traffic. As the flow decreases, further increases in toll levels are dictated. The cycle continues until the Canal may exist in fact but would be economically dead. Should this occur, we see the significant dislocations I referred to above.

To this time, we are unaware of any studies that have been made by the federal government as to the economic future of the Canal. Hence, my specific request. Finding it infeasible that an undertaking of this dimension has not addressed this subject, I ask that I be supplied with a copy of the studies that address this question.

I believe you can understand our concerns. Presumably they are based upon our lack of information, but we have no assurance of this. Your reassurance, at an early date, in the form of factual studies, addressing the problem will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

MELVIN SHORE,
Chairman, U.S. National Transportation Policy Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., December 2, 1977.

MELVIN SHORE,
Chairman, U.S. National Transportation, Policy Committee, World Trade Center, West Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR MR. SHORE: President Carter has asked me to reply to your letter of November 3 concerning the Panama Canal.

We understand and agree with your concern that, under the new Panama Treaties, tolls should be set at levels which will meet maintenance and operation costs for the Canal, including payments to be made to Panama. We believe that an increase in tolls of the order of 30 percent, which might be adequate for these purposes, would not significantly discourage the flow of traffic in general or impose an appreciable burden on Canal users. In fact, an increase of this size may not be necessary, if Alaskan oil movements through the Canal increase Canal traffic significantly, and if there is a general growth in world commerce.

I should point out that your enumeration of payments to Panama required under the new Panama Canal Treaties should, in some respects, be clarified. Point 3 of that enumeration, regarding payment for public services to be assumed by Panama, does not represent an additional net cost of Canal operations, and it is subject to readjustment to reflect actual costs. The services in question are currently provided by the Canal Zone Government and the Panama Canal Company, at a cost well in excess of $10 million annually. Moreover, while the contingent $10 million annual payment listed in your point 4 is cumulative, any cumulative balance remaining when the Canal is turned over to Panama in the year 2000 would cease to be an obligation or liability.

You ask to be provided studies that might have been made concerning the economic effect of toll increases. A study prepared for the Panama Canal Company in January 1976 "Panama Canal Toll Rates: Estimates of Maximum Revenue" by International Research Associates addresses this subject. I have enclosed a copy of it. The study is now being updated; we expect a new version early next year.

If we can be of further assistance, please do not hesitate to let us know.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID H. POPPER,
Ambassador, Deputy for Panama Canal Treaty Affairs.

TESTIMONY BY SEYMOUR MILSTEIN

I am Seymour Milstein, President and Chief Executive Officer of United Brands Company and I very much appreciate this opportunity to express to you our reasons for urging ratification of the Panama Canal treaties which are before this committee for consideration.

United Brands Company is the largest single user of the Panama Canal. During 1977 our vessels transited the Canal nearly 400 times, an average of 33 trips per month and we paid approximately $3 million in canal tolls and transit related charges. The company also acted as agents for vessels that made an additional 513 transits last year. In addition, we maintain offices and have operations in the Canal Zone itself.

We are convinced that ratification of the Panama Canal treaties is the only fair conclusion to the good faith negotiations conducted by our two countries over the last several years. In our judgment, these treaties represent the best evidence yet of this Nation's commitment to fair treatment for Panama and the other developing nations. Fulfilling this commitment, in our view, is particularly important if our Nation is to continue good and mutually beneficial relations in Latin America.

We are equally certain that the Panamanian government and the Panamanian people are fully capable of assuming the responsibility for managing the canal over the period of time set forth in the treaty documents. Our position reflects our confidence in General Torrijos and the present government of Panama, based on our first-hand experience with that government over the past several years.

Our company has a long history in Panama. Our United Fruit Company division, which is engaged in the production and distribution of tropical agricultural products, principally bananas, has operated in Panama for nearly 90 years. United Brands' overall contribution to the Panamanian economy is substantial and we employ more than 10,000 people in Panama, 98 percent of whom are Panamanian. During this period we have made repeated and large commitments of personnel, capital and other resources in that nation, and we have seen our business grow and prosper there.

Our continuing investment in Panama represents more than just a business venture for United Brands. It constitutes a significant contribution by the Americans and others who are our shareholders in the continued growth and development of the Panamanian economy.

With this background, our interest in the Panama Canal treaties is obvious. It should be equally clear, however, that efficient management and operation of the canal are also vital concerns.

One of the most essential elements in United Brands' success in Latin America has been the existence of the Panama Canal. We have been involved with the Canal since its beginning. Our ships carried material and labor for its construction and our medical personnel helped make the area safe for canal workers. From 1914 to the present, this link between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans has been the key to our worldwide distribution system. Any closure or curtailment would adversely affect our customers and distributors all over the world.

With more direct long term experience in Panama than any other U.S. corporation, we have dealt extensively and for many years with the leaders of the government of Panama. We can tell you that when the government of Panama took over the schools and hospitals which United Brands had previously operated, there was no deterioration in the quality of education and health care services provided to the Panamanian people. We have always been treated fairly by the administration and the courts and, as an example, during a recent labor dispute involving our company, the Panamanian judicial system ruled fairly and equitably in the matter. We have been given the kind of treatment in Panama that accords with our expectations as free Americans.

Mr. Chairman and Senators, I am sure you can appreciate that we have given the most serious consideration to these treaties, especially since once the treaties are ratified, the results to us will not be inconsequential. As the principal user of the Canal, some might wonder why, with the prospect of paying increased toll charges, we would support the treaties. Nevertheless, we do support these treaties and we are convinced that the best interests of our company and our country will be served by ratification of the treaties.

Our most important reason for urging ratification of the treaties can be stated simply and succinctly: we believe it is the right thing to do. As a company actively involved with Panamanian affairs throughout this century, we are convinced that the time has come for a reassessment of the Panama Canal arrangement. Our sense of fairness and justice persuades us that the Panamanian peoples' interest in achieving control of the Canal is a legitimate claim. We can say forthrightly that as a company Panama has been good to us and we believe it has been a good neighbor to our country as well. Today, these treaties present the best opportunity to reciprocate this goodwill.

Ratification of the treaties will be a sign to Panama and all of Latin America that the United States recognizes the growth and maturity of its neighbors to the South. In an interdependent world, how we treat our smaller and less developed friends in this hemisphere is a measure of our commitment to the goal of mutual respect. It will be a sign that we have come to appreciate the need for cooperation and accommodation in dealing with our neighbors and that the day has passed when smaller, less developed countries will tolerate anything less than the controlling voice in their own destinies.

As users of the canal—its largest single user as I mentioned before—no one can have a greater interest in its efficient and safe operation. Were we to believe that the government of Panama would provide anything less than the highest standards in the way of maintenance and efficient and safe operation of the canal we could not endorse these treaties as warmly and completely as we do.

Of the many interested parties who will appear before this committee, we are probably unique in the depth and length of our experience with the people of Panama. Based upon this kind of experience, we have no reservations concerning the efficiency of operation of the Canal under the Panamanians or of their adherence to their treaty or other contractual terms.

We now operate in Panama under the specific terms and provisions of a written contract, which spells out the obligations of both parties. The Panamanians have lived up to every element of that contract. In other words, they have demonstrated to us their honor and dependability and we have no reason to believe that they will not approach the operation of the Panama Canal in the same fair and pragmatic manner.

In addition, there should be no better motivation for the efficient and responsible operations of the Canal than the concept of self-interest embodied in these treaties. Twenty years ago, United Fruit paid $4.6 million in taxes and payments for use of 30,000 acres, or approximately 47 square miles of land in Panama. In comparison, the U.S. Government paid $2 million for the use of 500 square miles of land in the Canal Zone. Today, we pay in excess of $15 million while the U.S. pays only $2.5 million. The new arrangements called for in the treaties should remedy such an imbalance in the share of taxation, and are all the more reason for Panama to operate the Canal on a sound and economically viable basis.

In urging upon you ratification of the Panama Canal treaties I do not minimize for a moment the strategic importance of the canal for the United States. Certainly the U.S. has a vital stake in the future security of the waterway. However, we are persuaded by the arguments set forth by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and others in the Departments of Defense and State that the treaties now under consideration provide adequate protection to us in this regard. In our own dealings with the Panamanians over many years, we have found that while bargaining is hard, an agreement, once reached, is meticulously observed and this, I think, is an important point for the members of the Senate to bear in mind.

Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to share with this committee our support for prompt ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

Thank you for your kind attention.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Jan. 23, 1978]

IS THERE REALLY SUPPORT FOR THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, many administration officials, including the President himself, have maintained that there is growing widespread public support for the new Panama Canal Treaty. The basis of their claim is the fact that several groups and organizations have come out in defense of the agreement. There is no doubt this is true.

But, Mr. President, I question the legitimacy of this so-called support. I sincerely believe that the leaders of these influential organizations helping the President in his campaign for ratification of the treaty may have gone out of bounds in speaking for the entire membership of their groups. For example, each Member of this body may find in his mail a letter from Leslie H. Doty, a South Bend, Ind., businessman and a 30-year member of the Epworth United Methodist Church in South Bend. Mr. Doty learned that the National Council of Bishops of the United Methodist Church had, on behalf of the nationwide membership of the church, endorsed the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties. Being skeptical that this was the actual opinion of the whole church, Mr. Doty polled the members of his own congregation. The results were 214 against ratification, 23 for ratification, and 48 undecided or not wishing to take a position.

I understand that this poll is a mere straw vote, so I hasten to add that all of the professionally conducted, scientific surveys conclude the very same thing—that a vast majority of Americans are opposed to this treaty.

Individual citizens oppose this treaty. The heads of the various organizations in many instances have been aloof from their rank and file and have lost sight of their representative responsibilities. I hope that we do not take the same path and become so unresponsive that we reverse the progress toward restoring trust in Congress. If the U.S. Senate believes it can proceed without regard to the outpouring of public opinion, then it will deserve all the negative consequences that are the people's prerogative to bestow.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the Georgia House of Representatives, now in session in Atlanta, has adopted a resolution which, for myself and my colleague, Senator Nunn, I bring to the attention of the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

A RESOLUTION

Urging our two distinguished United States Senators to study carefully and to give the highest priority to American interests in considering the Panama Canal Treaty; and for other purposes.

Whereas, for 74 years, millions of Americans have been taught to view the Panama Canal as a symbol of United States engineering skill and ingenuity; and

Whereas, for more than half a century the Isthmus of Panama has been referred to internationally as "The Bridge of the World" because of the canal linking the Atlantic and Pacific; and

Whereas, Panama has prospered economically largely as a result of the industry, trade and tourism that have been drawn to the region by the canal and the country has become a financial center; and

Whereas, there remains much confusion regarding the proposed treaty and the absence of a reconciliation of Panama's national aspirations with the United States' strategic and economic interests despite years of negotiation.

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives that this body does hereby urge each of our two distinguished United States Senators to study thoroughly the matter of the Panama Canal Treaty and after said study to exercise his best wisdom and judgment in casting his individual vote in the best interests of the American people.

Be it further resolved that the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to forward an appropriate copy of this Resolution to each of the two distinguished United States Senators from Georgia.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A TOP PRIORITY

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, a few days ago the President outlined for us what the goals and objectives of his administration would be in the forthcoming year. I think that it is important to note that the President counted among his top priorities the passage of the Panama Canal treaties. As President Carter stated:

The world is watching to see how we act on one of our most important items of business: approval of the Panama Canal treaties.

The treaties now before the Senate are the result of the work of four administrations—two Democratic and two Republican.

They guarantee that the canal will be open always for unrestricted use by the ships of the world.

Our ships have the right to go to the head of the line for priority of passage in times of need or emergency.

We retain the right to defend the canal with our own military forces if necessary to guarantee its openness and neutrality.

The treaties are to the clear advantage of ourselves, the Panamanians, and the other users of the canal.

Ratifying the Panama Canal treaties will demonstrate our good faith to the world, discourage the spread of hostile ideologies in this hemisphere, and directly contribute to the economic well being and security of the United States.

Shortly, the full Senate will begin consideration of the treaties. I look forward to the debate on these agreements as an opportunity for us to explore all of the treaties' facets to insure that they are in our Nation's best interest.

SUPPORT FOR PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I believe that the proposed treaties serve our national interests and, with certain changes, I will vote for them.

I have carefully studied and considered the Panama Canal treaties since they were submitted to the Senate last September. As a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I actively participated in 13 days of committee hearings on the treaties and heard testimony from over 85 witnesses. I went to Panama to have a firsthand look at the situation and to discuss the treaties with those who would be most directly affected by them.

During all this time, I kept uppermost in my mind some very important questions which critics of the treaties in Illinois had asked me; "Why do we need a replacement for the 1903 treaty? Can the canal be operated at the same high level of efficiency by Panama as it has been by the United States? What is the justification for financial payments to Panama? Could we not best protect our rights to defend the canal by preserving the arrangements we have now? By approving these treaties, would we not be playing right into the hands of the communists? Would we not be giving a helping hand to Fidel Castro?"

The Panama Canal issue is not simply one between the United States and Panama. How the United States deals with it will be significant for our future relations with all the countries of our own hemisphere.

I have always been impressed by what a magnificent technological achievement the building of the canal was for our country. But on my recent trip I also got a vivid picture of how the Canal Zone cuts a deep gash right through and divides the sovereign territory of Panama, and how a Panamanian traveling through the Zone from north to south is treated like a stranger in his own country. He is under the jurisdiction of the laws of another country. If he is involved in a traffic accident, he is tried in a foreign court, under a code of laws which is foreign to him. I tried to imagine what it would be like to have a similar situation in Illinois, with a foreign country encamped in a prime piece of territory, cutting a 10-mile wide strip from the western limits of Springfield to the eastern limits of Decatur, thus including both cities and all the land in between. I believe it is as natural for the Panamanians to want to exercise sovereignty over all of their country as it was for colonial Americans to want to exercise sovereignty in all of this country.

If we can come to a new arrangement which would take this factor into account and at the same time absolutely preserve our ability to defend the canal and protect our interest in keeping it running efficiently, it would seem a sound and wise thing to do. We will surely enhance our position internationally by demonstrating that we have the strength and flexibility to adapt to change, while making clear that we have no intention of abandoning our right to intervene against any aggression against the canal.

Not even the treaty opponents I questioned during the hearings believed it is possible to hold on to the old 1903 treaty without making substantial changes. I am convinced that the best interests of the two nations can be served by adopting new treaties now with terms that are clear and beneficial to both. Presidents Eisenhower, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter all believed that a new treaty with Panama was needed.

The first treaty—the one which is in effect until the year 2000—stipulates that the United States has the right and primary responsibility to defend the canal. The United States retains the right to maintain troops and use all land and water areas and installations necessary for the operation, maintenance, and defense of the canal. The United States will also set the tolls and establish and enforce the rules of operation.

The second treaty, the so-called Neutrality Treaty, goes into effect in the year 2000. It is intended to guarantee the canal's permanent neutrality, and to assure each country's right to defend the canal. In this treaty also, Panama agrees not to allow the stationing of any foreign troops on its territory.

During the course of the hearings I stated my strong concern that some parts of this treaty were so vague that they could be interpreted differently by the United States and Panama and could lead to misunderstandings in the future that might be disastrous. These provisions concerned our unilateral right to move troops in to defend the canal, and the right of U.S. warships to go to the head of the line in case of emergency. These provisions were clarified in a statement subsequently issued by President Carter and General Torrijos. However, the statement was not signed, and its legal effect is in question. I believe that to be really meaningful, the statement must be made a formal and binding part of the treaties. I am cosponsoring two Dole amendments which would do exactly this. I could not support the treaties otherwise. With these changes, however, I believe our interests would be well protected.

There still remains the question of whether we would not avoid all this concern about defense rights if we just stayed with the present treaty. I have concluded that we will be better off under the new treaties properly amended. With regard to an external threat, there is no doubt that the United States can and will do what is necessary to meet it, and we are fully authorized to do so under the treaties. However, internal threats are another thing, given how strongly Panamanians feel about exercising full sovereignty. And in this desire they are supported by nations all over the world.

I have seen the dense jungle surrounding most of the 51 miles of the Canal Zone from which a saboteur, perhaps aided by a canal employee willing to look the other way, could emerge and put the canal out of commission with one small weapon. This is only one form that a hostile action could take. I have questioned treaty opponents about the likely consequences in Panama if these treaties are rejected, and have asked whether they were ready and willing to deal with the resulting situation. I found that not one of them had fully addressed this problem.

Several years ago we had a similar situation with Okinawa. I visited there and concluded that it would be extremely difficult to maintain a secure base in a hostile surrounding environment. We negotiated a transition with Japan and thereby greatly enhanced our ability to protect our long-term interests. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, Commander in Chief of the U.S. Southern Command, with whom I visited in Panama, has stated:

My judgment of our capability to keep the Canal open and in use for our country and for the countries of the free world will be enhanced, by the provisions of the Treaty . . . It really goes to the heart of having a friendly environment around the Canal in which to operate, and we can do all of our defense tasks better in a friendly rather than hostile environment.

Under the present treaty, Panama has no real stake in the canal. The annuity she now gets is compensation for giving us property and base rights, and is not contingent on whether canal operations are disrupted. Under the new treaties, Panama will have a real interest in keeping the canal open and running properly. The benefits that Panama gets will depend on the canal traffic. Her source of revenues will dry up if the canal is closed. Therefore, the new arrangements encourage the kind of environment which is our best insurance against internal threats.

With regard to payments to Panama, the treaty provides that this money will come from tolls paid by the many countries which use the canal, and will not come from the U.S. Treasury. This means that from now until the end of the century, while we will continue to have bases in Panama, the users of the canal will be footing the bill through tolls.

The financial benefits accruing to Panama will depend on the volume of canal traffic. The more efficiently the canal is run, the more traffic it will attract and the more toll revenues it will bring in.

How efficiently can we expect the Panamanians to operate the canal? Right now almost 80 percent of the canal work force is non-United States, with Americans generally holding the most technologically complex jobs. Under the new treaty, Panama will have 22 years in which to learn from the Americans how to continue the high level of efficiency which has characterized canal operations from the beginning. In Panama I was told by American oil company executives that within a period of just 5 years Panamanians had been able to take over the complete operation of refineries with highly sophisticated and complex technology.

Finally, much has been made of the Communist threat in Panama, and whether by ratifying the treaties we will be playing into the hands of Fidel Castro and the Soviet Union. When I asked Secretary of Defense Harold Brown about this, his response was that,

If I were Castro and I wanted to expand my influence and decrease that of the United States, I would certainly do all I could to prevent ratification of these treaties.

It should also be noted that Panama does not even have diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union or the People's Republic of China, and that it declared war on Japan the afternoon of Sunday, December 7, 1941, even before the United States did. In all the years under the 1903 treaty, Panama has never breached a single provision despite its patent unfairness.

It is significant that some of the most vocal support for the treaties has come from democratic regimes in Latin America such as Colombia, Costa Rica, and Venezuela. Surely, if the treaties were a means of furthering Communist intentions in the world, it would not be in the interest of these countries to support them.

After considering all these issues carefully, I have come to the conclusion that the new treaties will serve our interests better than attempting to cling to the old treaty. Certain changes which I have outlined must be made, but assuming that they are, I believe the new treaties will offer arrangements which are fair and beneficial to both our nations.

The Panama Canal is a glorious monument to American know-how and determination. After all these years the canal has not outgrown its usefulness. But the treaty with the country whose territory is bisected by the waterway has become outmoded. We owe it to ourselves to adopt new treaties which will satisfy the interests of our two nations and assure that the Panama Canal will continue to serve all the countries which have come to depend on it.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES GAIN SUPPORT IN CALIFORNIA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Tuesday's Los Angeles Times published a poll—conducted by the California poll—which indicates a notable shift in Californians' opinion on the Panama Canal treaties.

Last October, the California poll's survey to determine people's views on the Panama Canal treaties showed that 49 percent of the people interviewed were opposed to the treaties while 35 percent were in favor. However, when people were questioned earlier this month on whether they favored ratification, 46 percent were opposed compared to 41 percent in favor. I think that this 6-percent increase in support for the treaties is very significant. As the Gallup poll taken last fall indicated, the more people know about the treaties, the more likely they were inclined to favor them. The recent California poll reaffirms this statement. As the American people gain a fuller understanding of these treaties, more and more come to believe that the agreements are in our Nation's best interest and support for them continues to grow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report on the poll be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CANAL TREATIES GAIN SUPPORT IN STATE POLL

(By Mervin D. Field)

Public opposition in California to the proposed Panama Canal treaties is eroding. Last October The California Poll found that public disapproval of the treaties outweighed approval by a margin of 49 percent to 35 percent. This month, the gap has narrowed to just five percentage points, 46 percent against to 41 percent approval.

Republicans as a group are much stronger in their opposition than are Democrats. Telephone interviews of 1,003 Californians were conducted during the period Jan. 7—18. The sample included 399 persons who said they were registered Democrats, 261 who said they were Republicans and 343 who gave other political affiliations.

This is the question asked: "As you may have heard, the Panama Canal treaties call for the gradual transfer of control over the canal to the country of Panama by the year 2000 with the United States retaining military defense rights. From what you have seen or heard, do you personally approve or disapprove of these treaties?"

SENATOR ALLEN PINPOINTS MAJOR FLAWS IN THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on January 18, 1978, our distinguished colleague from Alabama (Mr. Allen) appeared before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to explain why the Panama Canal treaties are hostile to our national interests. As Senator Allen amply demonstrates, the treaties contain major flaws that jeopardize not only our national security, but also our established constitutional processes. The Senate should be on guard against cosmetic changes which purport to correct these inherent defects in the agreement but actually serve to conceal them.

Mr. President, Senator Allen's testimony is a tribute to his leadership in the Panama Canal controversy. It is perceptive and informative. I urge Members of the Senate to study it carefully, and, Mr. President, ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT BY JAMES B. ALLEN

Mr. Chairman, thank you very much for affording to me an opportunity to state to you and to the distinguished members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries my reasons for opposing ratification of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty and the proposed so-called neutrality treaty. Although the defects in both documents are legion, in my judgment there are five major flaws, each of which on its own ground would warrant complete rejection of the arrangements negotiated, inasmuch as each would independently damage the national interest of the United States to such extent as to render it improper for the Senate or the Congress to give its consent.

The five major defects, at least as I see it, are (1) the failure of the Canal treaties to require Congressional authorization for the proposed cession to Panama of United States territory and property, (2) the decision embodied in the Canal treaties and related loan agreements to pay to Panama some $2.262 billion by means of various devices designed to circumvent the role of the House of Representatives or the Congress in appropriating funds from the Treasury of the United States, (3) the failure of the Canal Treaty to provide for an adequate defense of the Canal during its proposed 22-year term, (4) the failure of the neutrality treaty to provide for an adequate defense of the Canal thereafter, and finally (5) the astonishing provision of the Canal treaties which forbids the United States even to negotiate with another nation for the construction of any interoceanic canal in the Western hemisphere without the express consent of the Panama dictatorship.

THE CONSTITUTION IGNORED

The first major defect in the treaties is perhaps the most significant since it represents a direct assault by the executive branch on the prerogatives of the House of Representatives and since it would set a new precedent extending the authority of the executive branch far beyond the bounds contemplated by the authors of the Constitution of the United States.

As this distinguished Committee well knows, Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution provides quite clearly that Congress, that is, the Senate and the House of Representatives acting together, "shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General has advised that the proposed treaties do not in any respect violate this clause, but with all due deference to him as a very able lawyer, in this instance he is serving a client, and I cannot share his rationalization of the clear, unambiguous language of the Constitution on this subject, nor can I agree with his faulty characterization of consistent past practice in our dealings with Panama in matters of property transfer.

In 1936 and again in 1955, cessions of United States territory or property to Panama were made expressly contingent on Congressional authorization. Yet now that a truly major cession of virtually all United States territory in the Isthmus of Panama is contemplated, the executive branch has seen fit to assert a novel theory by which the Administration would circumvent the Congress. The reason for development of this novel theory of Constitutional law is, I believe, a matter of practical politics rather than legal scholarship since public opposition to giving up the Canal is so overwhelming that any Congressional authorization of a cession of territory would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain.

But beyond this immediate issue, if we in the Senate and in the Congress permit this circumvention of the role of the whole Congress in any cession of United States territory, we will be setting a very dangerous precedent which will surely be used again by this or future administrations to assert power in an area heretofore preserved exclusively to the Congress. My own guess is that we would next see this precedent applied to the Guantanamo Naval Base in Cuba, but perhaps other cessions of territory or property are also in the works. This new precedent would haunt us down through the years, and we cannot allow it to be established.

So, Mr. Chairman, the Congress should not lightly endorse this proposed departure from sound Constitutional principles simply for the perceived political expediency of the moment. The Senate particularly should, instead, guard the prerogatives of the whole Congress by amending the proposed treaties at all appropriate points to make cessions of territory or property to Panama subject to the prior enactment of authorizing legislation by the Congress—in other words, no authorizing statute, then no transfer and a void treaty.

This distinguished Committee may be assured that I and other Senators will seek adoption of an amendment to the Canal treaty to preserve the Constitutional role of the Congress, particularly the role of the House of Representatives, in disposing of United States territory or property. Such an amendment could appropriately appear in Article I of the treaty by amending the language of that article to make the abrogation of the Treaty of 1903 subject to authorizing legislation of the Congress inasmuch as that abrogation is itself the primary means by which the property and territory of the United States is alienated and transferred to Panama. Additionally, any resolution of the Senate advising and consenting to ratification by the President should contain a specific reservation forbidding the President to exchange instruments of ratification with Panama until a statute is passed by the Congress authorizing the contemplated disposition of our territory and property in the Isthmus of Panama.

My own hope, of course, would be that such a statute would never pass, and I would certainly work to see its defeat. But notwithstanding a member's position on the Canal giveaway, we are all sworn to uphold the Constitution, and in this instance the issue is clear and there can be no room for doubt but that the whole Congress must act before any transfer can legally occur.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize that I have not reached this conclusion without study. As Chairman of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, I have heard the testimony of 34 witnesses over 7 days of hearings dealing almost exclusively with this very question, and the overwhelming evidence is that the Administration position is devoid of any substantive legal support and ought to be rejected out of hand.

$2.262 BILLION TO PANAMA FOR THE RIGHT TO CEDE THE CANAL ZONE TO PANAMA

I regret to say to this distinguished Committee that the Constitution is ignored elsewhere in these treaties and related documents. Most citizens learn in eighth grade civics that bills for appropriation must originate in the House of Representatives and that the people's representatives in the House are charged with primary responsibility in matters regarding the nation's pursestrings. Yet, Mr. Chairman, our negotiators have somehow figured out a means for bilking the users of the Canal and the American taxpayers of at least $2.262 billion without any need to seek an appropriation from the Congress.

We are presented, gentlemen, with treaties which do not give the United States the right to guarantee its interests in the Canal, which do not provide for an adequate defense of the Canal, which do not allow the United States to initiate new Canal projects except with Panama's consent, but which do, on the other hand, give the Canal Zone entirely to Panama, which do also eventually give the Panama Canal Company to Panama, which do immediately give the most lucrative operations of the Panama Canal Company to Panama, which do give immediately 10 United States military bases to Panama, which do give Panama immediately political jurisdiction over 37,000 United States citizens living in the Canal Zone, and which do, finally, give to Panama $2.262 billion in 1977 dollars. And this last I find the most incredible part of all.

You know, Mr. Chairman, ordinarily the grantee pays the grantor, but our clever negotiators have figured out a way for us to give away the Canal Zone and pay the recipient at the same time. They have also figured out a way to make these payments without Congressional approval. I will not insist on going into great detail on how this $2.262 billion in 1977 dollars is to be paid to Panama because I know this Committee is fully familiar with the financial ramifications of this proposed arrangement. However, I would recommend to the Committee a careful reading of a speech given on August 19, 1977, before the Panamanian National Assembly by Panamanian Planning and Economic Policy Minister, Nicolas Ardito Barletta. Minister Barletta's analysis of the cash flow to Panama proposed by these arrangements is, in my judgment, highly accurate, and it is from his work rather than from the misleading Department of State estimates that I have drawn the figure $2.262 billion.

Why are we proposing to pay these tremendous sums to Panama? Why would we permit these proposed toll increases which will surely burden commerce and inflate consumer prices in the United States? The only reason I can ascertain is a desire to provide Panama with funds to repay outstanding loans from the large international banks.

The Library of Congress did a study at my request which indicates that the external public debt of Panama is some $1.7 billion. Interest on that sum is a tremendous burden on this small country of only 1.5 million inhabitants, and already 40% of current revenues in Panama go to carrying present indebtedness. Stating the matter bluntly, Panama is on the verge of bankruptcy and many of our large banks hold loans which may soon be bad debts, that is, of course, unless the United States taxpayer rescues the banks by providing the funds to Panama for repayment.

Mr. Chairman, sooner or later the Congress must draw the line and stop robbing American taxpayers to extend funds to bankrupt Third World countries so that international banks can collect principal and interest on shaky loans. In my judgment, the international banks should be required to write off their bad debts, to write off at least some portion of the loans they made in error, and the international banks should be put on notice that the American taxpayer will not always guarantee a profit in any loan transaction with unstable governments. Perhaps, rejection of the Panama Canal treaties would be a good method to send that message.

And another message ought to be sent. That message ought to be sent to the executive branch, and it ought to be that Congress will not permit its prerogatives to be trampled by clever devices designed to circumvent the power of Congress over appropriations. The plain fact is that we plan to give to Panama $2.262 billion. That being the case, Congress needs to say either "yea" or "nay", as the people may wish. I know how my constituents feel on this subject, and I am sure the distinguished members of this Committee know their own constituencies. But the executive branch has structured these arrangements in a manner to prevent Congressional authorization or appropriation.

The executive branch proposes to establish a Panama Canal Commission which would be a United States government corporation structured much as is the present Panama Canal Company. This new proposed Panama Canal Commission would replace the Panama Canal Company and would acquire back from Panama for a term of years, until year 2000, use of the principal assets now owned by the Panama Canal Company, save certain lucrative assets immediately transferred to Panama but not returned. This new Commission would then operate the Canal, serving up off the top, so to speak, Panama's slice of the pie. And that slice is a pretty big slice which all admit would require immediate toll increases and no doubt later new borrowings from the United States Treasury to enable the Commission to pony up this proposed average $100 million annual payment to Panama.

But under this plan what happens to the existing Panama Canal Company? This question is one of the many not yet answered satisfactorily by the Administration. Also unanswered and more importantly, what happens to the existing $319 million debt of the Panama Canal Company to the Treasury—a sum which apparently would not be transferred to the proposed new Commission? What happens to the approximately $16 million in annual interest payments the United States receives on this debt? The answer is the same answer we've been giving the people down through the years here in the Congress—the American taxpayer, as usual, will pick up the tab. That's right, Mr. Chairman, this section setting up this proposed Panama Canal Commission is a shell game fit for any carnival huckster, and it is going to cost our Treasury $319 million right off the bat and is going to deprive our taxpayers of some $16–$17 million in annual interest payments that have amounted so far to over $600 million in payments into the Treasury.

But there is an ever greater surprise waiting for the American taxpayer of year 2000, because in year 2000 the Panama Canal Commission folds up and is out of business, much as the Panama Canal Company is now slated for collapse. And once again, Mr. Chairman, the Department of State would have us promise to Panama under these treaties that the Panama Canal Commission would leave Panama in year 2000 and turn over all of the operating assets of the Canal to Panama clear of any liens or encumbrances. In other words, American taxpayers in year 2000 are going to be forced to swallow one more defunct government corporation with massive liabilities and no assets. Mr. Chairman, we have no way of predicting what it will cost in year 2000 when the business of the Panama Canal Commission is wound up, but certainly if the experience of the last few years is any guide, that expense will be well above $319 million the taxpayers are being asked to write off today.

Then there is the small matter of $345 million in various so-called soft loans which the State Department has seen fit to promise to Dictator Torrijos. I use the term "small matter" not because I consider it a small matter but because the big thinkers and planners down there at the Department of State figure $345 million is a mere drop in the bucket against the backdrop of $7 billion annually in foreign aid porkbarrel. Bear in mind, in assessing the magnitude of this figure, that we are talking about a country of only some 1.5 million people. I daresay there are few Congressional districts in the United States which would not return to office many times over a member who could produce that kind of money in development loans. So Panama has got some pretty powerful friends here in Washington when 1.5 million people can get their hand in the till for $345 million in development aid.

But, Mr. Chairman, the really annoying part about this $345 million is not so much the fact that it is an exorbitant sum but that, in blandly promising this $345 million, the Department of State has ignored entirely the Congress and, with the exception of certain appropriated monies in the military portion of the $345 million, the Department of State plans to get this money for Panama out of existing authority without any action by the Congress and without any action by the Senate in consenting to these loans as part of the proposed treaties. Again, the prerogatives of the Congress are being ignored by appointed bureaucrats answerable apparently to no one.

DEFENSE OF THE CANAL

I suppose that the United States could absorb this financial rip-off. Certainly, we have paid needlessly vast sums in the past down a variety of ratholes and yet continued as a great and strong nation. But other aspects of these proposed treaties are far more dangerous in the long term to our national well-being than are the massive proposed cash payments to Panama. Chief among these considerations is the dangerous and obviously adverse strategic effect of abandoning—after a decent interval—the Canal and the Canal Zone to a pro-Marxist dictator who receives direction from Cuba and the Soviet Union. What folly.

But in order to understand completely the immediate dangers of the defense provisions of the proposed treaties, to appreciate fully the sophistry of the media arguments on defense rights, and to understand the true extent of our proposed surrender, care must be taken to examine in detail the Executive Agreement in

Implementation of Article IV of the Canal treaty, the article which deals with defense. Moreover, further study must be given to the annexes to the executive agreement, to the annexes to the annexes, and to the various notes, minutes and protocols—all of which form the fabric of the so-called joint military defense we would undertake with Panama.

I am particularly concerned, Mr. Chairman, that the drafters of the Canal treaty saw fit to set forth the major substantive defense provisions not in the Canal treaty in its Article IV, which is entitled "Protection and Defense", but instead in this Executive Agreement in Implementation of Article IV—an agreement which is several times as large as the entire Canal treaty itself. Article IV of the Canal treaty does not cover a complete printed page, yet the Agreement in Implementation of Article IV is some 53 pages long, excluding annexes and excluding an additional 22 pages of agreed minutes, the minutes themselves having their own annexes. So, Mr. Chairman, we have critical defense provisions not in the text of the treaty but rather in this lengthy executive agreement and in other extrinsic documents which could be modified from time to time by the executive branch with no requirement whatsoever to obtain the assent of the Senate.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, the defense provisions already set forth in this first executive agreement are, on their face, unworkable and portend a complete withdrawal of the U.S. forces from the Canal Zone well in advance of the projected date of 2000 AD. The Administration proposes in this first executive agreement to surrender 10 out of 14 bases. Thus, we are asked at the outset to permit the surrender of 10 out of 14 military bases and to permit our forces defending the Canal to be hemmed in from day one in four relatively small enclaves. These bases would indeed be enclaves because our freedom of action outside of the four bases would be severely limited by the treaty requirement for approval of operations by a joint military board in which the United States and Panama will have equal authority. Apparently, the doctrine of unity of command is imperfectly understood at the Department of State, but the Panamanians no doubt recognize fully that this provision of the executive agreement would give a de facto veto of United States operations outside of the four retained bases.

So our forces would be restricted to four relatively small enclaves, and only the naive would doubt that we would very soon see pressure on our forces to withdraw from the four sites retained. That process of withdrawal would be facilitated by the fact that the executive department could close down any one or all of the remaining bases by amendment of the executive agreement with the stroke of a pen without the consent of the Senate or the consent of the Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, the members of this distinguished Committee may not think that this process of accelerated withdrawal is contemplated, but I would call attention to the provision of the executive agreement implementing Article IV which provides explicitly that the agreement will be renegotiated every two years or upon the request of either government and thus tacitly acknowledges what is coming.

This treaty is for a proposed term of 22 years. Yes, we are going to need tough-minded negotiators if we plan to hang on to these four defense sites for a term of 22 years with the Panamanians hounding us daily for complete withdrawal and with our own government already proposing to negotiate the matter on a biennial basis or upon request. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, these four defense sites would rest on a foundation of sand if, by Senate ratification of the Canal treaty, the Department of State were to be given the right to agree—and they seem pretty agreeable with this dictator down there in Panama—if the Department of State were to be given the right to agree with Panama more or less at any time that the time was propitious to shut down another base.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Committee to consider carefully the feasibility of successful joint military operations with Panamanian forces. Over the long term, we can expect problems. How can we expect full cooperation from an army whose recruits are taught to chant in unison at their recruit training base at Fort Cimmaron, "Down with the Yankees, death to the Yankees, to the wall with the Yankees". No, Mr. Chairman, over the long term we would be naive in the extreme to expect full cooperation from Panama in any joint defense of the Canal.

CANAL NEUTRALITY

Closely related to the issue of defense is the failure of the executive branch to negotiate for the United States a right to defend the neutrality of the Canal after 2000 AD. Much has been said in the media to the effect that the United States could unilaterally preserve Canal neutrality after a full withdrawal of U.S. forces from the Isthmus of Panama, but, Mr. Chairman, a careful reading of the neutrality treaty makes it evident that, in fact, the United States would have no such right whatsoever.

The neutrality treaty simply declares that the Canal Zone is neutral and sets forth an agreement by the United States and Panama that both parties recognize the Canal's neutrality. Nowhere is the United States granted permission to determine that the neutrality of the Canal is endangered or has been violated and nowhere is the United States granted the right to intervene to insure that the Canal is not made available to an enemy nation while being denied to our Navy and merchant ships.

Additionally, Mr. Chairman, the so-called right of expeditious transit given to United States warships is totally meaningless. The failure of our negotiators to insist on privileged passage for United States war vessels could permit Panama in an emergency to delay the movement of United States warships by simply requiring those vessels to transit the Isthmus on the same "expeditious" basis as merchant ships of all nations.

As Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chief negotiator for Panama, put the matter, "If the gringos with their warships say, 'I want to go through first,' then that is their problem with the other ships there." Regrettably, Mr. Chairman, Dr. Escobar's analysis of the practical meaning of our right to expeditious passage, although stated undiplomatically, is nevertheless precisely correct. His complete rejection of any claim that the United States is given the right to send troops to preserve Canal neutrality also accords accurately with the language in the text. In fact, the truth is, Mr. Chairman, that Dr. Escobar's construction of the neutrality treaty, unlike the construction placed on it by our own executive department, is a construction based on the language of the treaty itself rather than on wishful thinking or on the assertions of the mass media.

But, although much has been said of late about correcting by amendment the problems of priority transit and right of intervention, no amount of band-aid amendments can correct the basic faults embodied in any plan which gives control of the Canal to Panama at any time. No amount of words in no amount of amendments can ever provide to us the same needed guarantees as are provided by actual possession. Regardless of what these treaties might eventually say on keeping the Canal open or on maintaining a regime of neutrality—whatever that might mean—if we give up physical control, this country will still, sooner or later, find itself at the mercy of some petty dictator who decides, probably with the backing of the Soviet Union, to cause difficulties for the United States in using this vital strategic waterway. Our actions in Panama are sadly reminiscent of the mistaken British policies in surrendering the Suez Canal. Ironically, only two months ago, a British nuclear submarine was diverted from the Suez Canal on some pretense or other regarding safety regulations and was diverted around Africa on a journey of months which would otherwise have been only of days. How long will it be before the Panama Canal is closed to our ships in a time of emergency, if these treaties are ratified? When that occurs—and it surely will under these treaties—we will have no option but to attack Panama and recover possession, or to eat crow and begin the long voyage around South America. Some choice.

The unsigned Memorandum between the President and Dictator Torrijos has no legal standing, and, if it did, it would do little to clarify our rights under the treaties.

No, band-aid amendments based on this unsigned memorandum will not do either. Attempts at clarification are not enough. These treaties must be amended to retain physical control of the Canal or they must be rejected entirely.

A NEW CANAL

From the language of the Canal Treaty, rather than from press reports describing peripheral issues, we have also learned a final fatal defect. According to the terms of the Canal Treaty—and unlike other provisions, the treaty is quite unambiguous on this point—the United States agrees not to negotiate without express Panamanian consent with any country except Panama for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, knowing you as I do, I feel certain that you share my astonishment that the negotiators for the United States saw fit to preclude any possibility of construction of a new interoceanic canal, perhaps at sea level, without our country first obtaining the express consent of a pro-Marxist and highly unstable military dictatorship. Why was this concession necessary? What did the United States gain from the concession?

I notice with some amusement, Mr. Chairman, that the Republic of Panama purports to grant to the United States of America the right to add a third lane of locks to the existing canal. Inasmuch as the United States already has the right to add a third lane of locks to the existing canal, surely our negotiators did not think that a meaningless concession of that variety was sufficient consideration for giving the Panamanians a veto over any other project we may wish to undertake to connect the two oceans. Certainly, the negotiators for the United States could not have felt that the Panamanian agreement to commit Panama "to study jointly the feasibility of a sea level canal" warranted a countervailing commitment from the United States not to do anything whatsoever without Panamanian permission—but perhaps so. The bizarre behavior of our negotiators has produced other results equally as startling.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, one thing is sure and that is that the Panamanians know they got the best of this bargain. Discussing the sea level canal issue, chief Panamanian negotiator, Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, on August 19, 1977, with pride explained to the Panamanian National Assembly the unilateral benefits of the so-called sea level canal options. Dr. Escobar's remarks on the subject, like his remarks on neutrality, are illuminating and are worth studying in full. As Dr. Escobar explains, instead of the United States obtaining an option to build a sea level canal, the United States negotiators gave to the Panamanians the option to veto construction of any type of interoceanic canal, sea level or locks, proposed to be built by the United States anywhere in the Western hemisphere.

Now, Mr. Chairman, committing the United States to deal only with Panama about building another canal is a serious mistake. As the distinguished Chairman knows, the best route for a new canal is in Nicaragua, that being the route that Senator John Tyler Morgan favored during consideration of Isthmian routes in the early part of this century. Senator Morgan of Alabama, who was Chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, felt strongly that Nicaragua provided a more favorable political and geographical solution to the immense problems involved in constructing a canal between the two oceans. Retrospectively, he may well have been correct, yet our present treaty negotiators propose to foreclose entirely the option Senator Morgan and many others favored, an option which should at least be kept open. Certainly, with the great volume of Alaskan oil which is only now beginning to come on stream and which must move to Gulf and East Coast refineries, any relinquishment of the right to negotiate for a route in Nicaragua is a very grave mistake indeed.

RESERVATION, AMENDMENT, AND FILIBUSTER

In summary, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Senate and the House of Representatives should play a significant role in the formulation and revision of these proposed treaties—and I might say in the rejection of these proposed treaties—so that the terms of any new arrangement with Panama can be made fully acceptable to the American public and so that the commercial and national security interests of the United States can be fully protected.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure you know of the early practice of including Senators in delegations sent to foreign countries for the purpose of negotiating treaties. That practice has unhappily in large measure ceased, and the Senate has been more and more asked for consent rather than advice. These treaties provide an excellent opportunity for the Senate to reaffirm its Constitutional prerogative and, indeed, duty to advise the executive—to advise the President—in matters of foreign policy, particularly with respect to treaty negotiation. The Senate can give its advice through the amending process. These treaties should be amended to cure their obvious defects, and since any substantive amendment—as opposed to these band-aid amendments we are hearing about—and since any substantive amendment will require a renegotiation of the amended treaty, the Administration will be advised by these Senate amendments of what is acceptable to the Senate and to the people of the United States and what might later receive Senate consent and the authorization of Congress.

Reservations to these treaties alone would be of little or no value. Any reservations must be coupled with substantive amendments explaining to the President what is acceptable to the Senate and to the people of the United States. Reservations can only affect the obligations of the United States and, even with Panamanian assent, they can do little to bind Panama to a course of action consistent with the best interests of our country. Reservations can be used, as I pointed out earlier, to forbid the President to take any action to exchange instruments of ratification until certain pre-conditions are met. I believe very strongly that a reservation should be adopted forbidding ratification except if the Congress should see fit to authorize these transfers of United States territory and property. I hope that even proponents of these treaties would vote for that reservation since, above all, the Senate has an obligation to prevent a usurpation of the prerogatives and powers of the whole Congress.

Reservations, however, cannot be offered, under Senate procedure, until the treaty has been considered in detail, first, in the Senate sitting as the Committee of the Whole and, second, in the Senate itself. In other words, the rules of the Senate provide for a double-barreled approach in consideration of treaties. These rules are designed to insure that treaties receive the utmost scrutiny and are considered with all appropriate deliberation. There will be, therefore, ample opportunity for amendment of these treaties in the Committee of the Whole and later on the floor of the Senate. Substantive amendments must be adopted to guide the President in renewed negotiation with Panama. Then, in my judgment, these particular treaties, being incredibly defective, should be defeated outright so that there is no question but that the Senate and the Congress intend to insist on the will of the people being put into effect by the executive branch.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would comment that I do not foresee a filibuster of these proposed treaties. I do foresee a full discussion, legitimate debate, and consideration of substantive and serious amendments. These proposed band-aid amendments can be dispensed with in short order, and I have no doubt they will be promptly adopted. The real deliberations will occur over the amendments of substance which are not cosmetic and which would provide some true safeguards to our vital interests.

But a filibuster would be pointless, both because a filibuster could be stopped by 60 Senators whereas the treaties could be stopped by 34 Senators, and because both treaties present questions which should be disposed of without undue delay so that the country can turn its attention to other dangerous developments which threaten our security—I refer chiefly to the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks which portend disaster for our country and which have in large measure been eclipsed by the Panama debate. But inasmuch as the concerns of the citizens of the United States regarding Panama are now abundantly evident, the Senate should with deliberation, but nevertheless promptly, discharge its duty in considering ratification. No good purpose can be served by having these proposed treaties more or less hang around for years. They should be put to the test of ratification without further delay and without further media posturing in Panama or elsewhere. My own sincere hope is that the wisdom and clear desires of the people of the United States will be respected for a change and that, accordingly, these treaties will be resoundingly defeated.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear before this distinguished Committee and before its distinguished Chairman.

VARIATIONS IN MEANING BETWEEN ENGLISH AND SPANISH TEXTS OF PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have frequently expressed the view that the proposed Panama Canal treaties lack clarity of expression, and are so replete with ambiguity that defective draftsmanship alone would warrant Senate rejection. I have also stated my apprehension that the Spanish text might not track the English language text and that future disputes might arise as a result of differences in the two versions of the proposed agreements.

For the past several days, I have been studying an analysis of differences which exist between the Spanish language text and the English language text of the two proposed treaties. This analysis confirms my earlier fear that the Spanish text does not accurately translate the English text. The analysis I have studied was prepared by Sylvia Costellanos, Research Director for the Senate Steering Committee. Miss Costellanos is bilingual and speaks Spanish fluently. The analysis she has prepared is a very scholarly document and reflects a great deal of work and study. I am advised that she was aided by several experts in Latin American law and legal terminology and that she has included in her analysis only those discrepancies which all agreed give rise to ambiguity and confusion. In other words, only clear errors in translating English legal terminology to Spanish legal terminology are included.

Finally, having read her analysis, I conclude that the errors in translation were very likely—at least in many instances—deliberate in that they are errors which would permit the Panamanian negotiators to assert that they had obtained the best of the bargain while the negotiators for the United States could assert that the documents have the meaning best suited for garnering votes for ratification.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the analysis be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

OVERVIEW

Done at Washington, this 7th day of September, 1977, in duplicate, in the English and Spanish languages, both texts being equally authentic.

Signed in Washington, this 7th day of September, 1977, in the Spanish and English languages, both texts being equally authentic.

The quotations above are provisos found at the end of each of the Panama Canal Treaty documents. The first is the English text of the proviso; the second, a translation of the text as it appears in Spanish. Note that the Spanish text omits the phrase "in duplicate" found in the English.* This serves as an introduction to an important issue in the Canal Treaty controversy: the degree to which the language in the English and Spanish texts of the Panama Canal agreements correlate with each other.

On September 7, 1977, the United States and Panama agreed to a series of documents providing for the elimination of an American Canal Zone and the transfer of authority over the Canal to Panama. Among these documents are two treaties—the Canal Treaty and the Neutrality Treaty—several Agreements in Implementation, and exchanges of notes. The ensuing public controversy has related in some measure to the interpretation of key clauses in the Panama Canal documents. The U.S. government maintains the Neutrality Treaty gives the U.S. the right to defend the Canal after the year 2000. Panamanian Chief Negotiator Romulo Escobar Bethancourt denies this emphatically:¹ and his deputy negotiator Carlos Lopez Guevara further adds the treaty gives the U.S. "the right to hope that Panama and all other nations of the world will respect the right of American ships to transit the Canal,"² and nothing more. Similarly, there have been varying interpretations of the term "expeditious transit," with some authoritative sources describing it as the equivalent of "right of way," and others, equally authoritative, refuting this claim.

These conflicting interpretations, although serious, nevertheless arise in connection with words that are mutually accepted. There is a second question as yet unconsidered; the possibility of discrepancies between the very words used in the English and Spanish texts. This issue constitutes a separate and distinct layer of problems. Yet it is evident that to identify all possible ramifications of the documents President Carter has assigned, one must not only analyse the English texts for ambiguous language, but also the Spanish texts for potentially imprecise translations of the language.

According to the State Department, approximately 400 man-hours were spent by its official translators and the negotiating team comparing the substantive contents of the two versions of the agreements. While the resulting documents broadly correlate, their relationship is more that of highly similar documents than of identical texts. Because of differing syntactical requirements and limitations in vocabulary, some modifications are always required in translation work. The differences in these two texts, however go far beyond those needed for a smooth translation. In the Spanish documents the syntax is repeatedly changed for no apparent reason, words are included which do not exist in the English text, and terms are used which are not totally accurate translations of the words in English.

Of these many differences, some clearly will have no effect on interpretation. Others could potentially alter the meaning of the provisions in which they appear.

*The use of "done at" in English and "signed in" in Spanish does not have the same significance. Each nation is simply using the phrase that has been established by custom.

² Miami Herald, October 3, 1977.

Had an understanding been reached that the parties would abide by the interpretation of the English text in case of a dispute, these discrepancies would raise little problem for the U.S. Instead, Article XIV of the Canal Treaty provides for the settlement of such disputes through consultation or mediation, tacitly acknowledging at the same time that both texts are equally valid. Thus, in the reconciliation of differences the Panamanian version would legally carry as much weight as the English.

Although disputes of this nature have not often occurred in connection with previous agreements with Panama, a few have taken place. In January, 1904, the Panamanian government sent Secretary of State John Hay a list of discrepancies between the two texts of the 1903 treaty.³ These discrepancies, which it felt justified correction, were all minor. That is in itself an interesting point, given that just such minor inconsistencies permeate the 1977 agreements.

The principal reason for the traditional acceptance of the 1903 Treaty language, however, is not the absence of discrepancies per se, but rather a related agreement cited in the letter. "[T]he necessity of making further changes therein," Panama states, "will be oviated by your official statement that the English text shall prevail in case of such difference of interpretation."⁴ Because of this understanding, the choice of language in the Spanish text was immaterial, as it had been determined the English text would predominate.

If the ability of the U.S. to impose its understanding of the texts is limited by the very language of the documents, appeals to Panama's "cooperative spirit" will not necessarily result in U.S. interpretations predominating. Mutual good will is a spirit to be hoped for, but hardly to be inferred a priori, in international relations. Unspoken understandings as ephemeral in substance as the spirit they arise from, are no substitute for precise descriptions of the commitments being undertaken. When less than an unwritten understanding exists—only, as appears to be the case with possible disputes over the Spanish text, a general conviction that all will be well at the end—the risk is correspondingly greater. There are no grounds, in fact, to assume Panama would fail to insist on interpretations it regards as in its national interest, irrespective of their effect on the U.S. posture.

In general terms, the United States may face a problem with regard to the "grant" of certain functions it receives from Panama. The exact nature of America's role as Canal "manager" may be open to interpretation, as may be the exact degree of control America is empowered to exercise in regulating Canal traffic. The exact role of the Panama Canal Commission Board is also open to question. Disputes could arise about the scope of reimbursement to Panama for the public services it assumes in the former Canal Zone, and the effort Panama is under obligation to make in employing displaced Canal Company employees. Finally, as the U.S. text calls for a "feasibility" study of a sea-level canal, and the Panamanian text requires an analysis of the canal's "viability" questions may arise.

While it is impossible to predict the exact nature and intensity of potential differences over the Treaty language, one fact clearly emerges: the natural assumption on the part of most Americans that the Spanish texts faithfully follow the English documents is incorrect. Inconsistencies abound in the documents. And before a complete understanding of our agreements with Panama can be attained, these inconsistencies will have to be fully analysed and their ramifications understood.

I. "MANAGEMENT" OF THE CANAL

Throughout the treaties, the word "manage" is used repeatedly, both about functions to be performed by the U.S. in the operation of the Canal and about those to be performed by Panama. The English-language text, however, gives no inkling of the subtle word play that takes place in the Panamanian documents on this subject.

In the Panamanian text, three words are used as translations of "to manage." "Administrar" and "dirigir" are both correct translations, with the former being perhaps the most precise. The third word used, "manejar," falls into a different category. Although similar in appearance to the English term, it is not the Spanish equivalent of "to manage." Its meaning is "to operate" or "to handle".

There is a definite pattern, moreover, to the use of the three terms. In almost every case that "manage" is used in reference to the U.S. role, the Spanish term employed is "manejar." With few exceptions it is "administrar" or "dirigir" that is found in the context of responsibilities being assumed by Panama.

³ "Diplomatic History of the Panama Canal: Correspondence Relating to the Negotiation and Application of Certain Treaties on the Subject of the Construction of an Inter-oceanic Canal, and Accompanying Papers." Senate Document No. 474, 1914, p. 304.

Below is an example from Article 1 of the pattern:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States * * * the rights necessary * * * to manage (manejar) * * * the Canal."⁵ and:

"The Republic of Panama shall participate increasingly in the management (administration) * * * of the Canal * * *"⁶

The distinction between "managing", with its connotation of administrative responsibility, and "operating" becomes increasingly blurred in subsequent sections, as one finds "manejar" used as the translation for "to operate." In the Treaty Annex, to cite just one example, one of the rights America may exercise is listed as the "operation-(manejo) of the locks."⁷ Finally, "manejar" is also used as the translation for "handling," another of the American functions included in the Annex is the "handling (manejo) of cargo * * *"⁸

The Panamanians' choice of words in translating "to manage" obviously cannot prevent Americans, be their official role that of "managers" or "operators," from exercising the functions they retain under the treaty. But that is not to say the word play is without impact. The constant use of "manejar" helps create a perception of America's role as that of a "hired hand" rather than owner with legitimate administrative authority and control. This in turn supports the position that the Canal belongs to Panama, and the U.S. role is merely to operate it until Panamanian nationals achieve the expertise necessary to exercise full control over their property.

II. CONTROL OF TRAFFIC

In the Canal Treaty documents there are several references to the regulation of traffic in the Canal. Under Article I, section 4, "the United States and the Republic of Panama shall, cooperate to assure the uninterrupted and efficient operation of the canal."⁹ In article III, Section 1, the "Republic of Panama grants to the United States of America the right * * * to provide for the orderly transit of vessels through the Canal."¹⁰ Article III, Section 2(c) grants the United States the right to "make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal,"¹¹ and the Annex to the document repeats that "control of vessel movement" is one of the functions which the Panama Canal Commission "may perform."¹²

The importance of well-regulated, and above all, uninterrupted transit of ships in the Canal is paramount to the United States. The reason is obvious; the waterway is of military importance to America, and with 70% of the cargo transported through the Canal originating from or destined for the U.S., of economic significance as well.

The most revealing statement on the Panamanian attitude toward uninterrupted operations is contained in an August, 1977, speech by Panamanian Chief Negotiator Romulo Escobar Bethancourt to the Panamanian Assembly. In connection with the Neutrality Treaty, which deals with Canal operations after the year 2000, he explains his negotiating team had balked at U.S. insistence that Panama guarantee the Canal would remain permanently open. As his stated reason he explained that natural disasters or loss of revenue may someday cause Panama to close the Canal, thereby putting it in a position, if it signs the accord, of violating a treaty for reasons beyond its control.¹³

Some opponents of the treaty feel a second factor may have influenced Panama. Retaining flexibility over the flow of traffic through the Canal, including the right to shut down the waterway, provides Panama with a trump card over the United States. Significantly, the only guarantee ultimately incorporated in the Neutrality Treaty is that "the Canal shall be operated efficiently in accordance with conditions of transit through the Canal."¹⁴ The qualifier included at Panama's behest makes the guarantee virtually meaningless.

To what extent can the United States draw upon the provisions cited earlier for undisputed authority to regulate Canal traffic until the year 2000, when control is transferred to Panama?

The language in Article I ("The United States and the Republic of Panama shall cooperate to assure the uninterrupted and efficient operation of the Canal"), when analyzed closely, does not emerge as absolutely final. The mandate in the sentence relates to cooperation; "uninterrupted and efficient operation" occupies a secondary position as the purpose of the cooperation. The obligation being undertaken by the two nations is thus primarily to attempt to work together for the purpose of achieving efficient and uninterrupted operation. The language does not commit them to the achievement of this per se.

Under Article III, Section 1, the "Republic of Panama . . . grants to the United States of America the right . . . to provide for the orderly transit of ships through the Panama Canal." In the Spanish text this function is expressed as the right to provide for the "fluid transit" of vessels.¹⁵ This discrepancy did not arise out of linguistic exigencies. Not only does Spanish contain a word equivalent to "orderly" ("ordenado"), but this term is in fact used in other sections of the documents.

Interpreted literally, the Spanish version of the sentence merely gives the United States the right to ensure that the ships going through the Canal will have water (or some liquid) to sail on. From the context, of course, it is evident that the word is being employed figuratively. Yet the very use of figurative expressions in a legal document is to be questioned. Subjective imagery, open to dozens of more or less different personal interpretations, is normally avoided in international treaties in favor of highly precise terms with established legal meanings. This is regarded as the best assurance that inaccurate interpretations will not arise in the future. In this instance, however, the right given to the United States in this section can be interpreted in as many different ways as there are opinions on the meaning of "fluid."

The references in Article III, Section 2(c) and the Annex, like those in other sections, are not as final as they appear to be. Neither explicitly gives the United States the authority to ensure, unilaterally, if necessary, smooth, uninterrupted Canal traffic. It can be argued that the grant to the U.S. to regulate traffic makes this unimportant, with the latter constituting sufficient authority. But an additional factor must be considered. Although it is not explicitly stated, it is evident that the grant of authority is qualified. The organ charged with implementing this and other functions is the Panama Canal Commission and, as shall be discussed later, differences between the English and Spanish texts raise the possibility that substantial influence may be exerted by Panama on its decisions.

In summary, the Canal Treaty documents do not give the United States the clear-cut right to control the Canal traffic. They refer to cooperation with Panama on the issue, the American right to guarantee the "fluid" transit of vessels, and the authority the U.S. is to exercise through the Panama Canal Commission, over which it will not have complete control. That which the treaties make no mention of is the U.S. having explicit, unilateral authority to regulate the transit of vessels through the Canal.

III. PANAMA CANAL COMMISSION AND BOARD

Article III of the Panama Canal Treaty establishes a Panama Canal Commission through which the United States will carry out its Canal management functions. In connection with this Commission, a Board is also established.¹⁶

The Commission is described as a "United States Government agency which shall be constituted by and in conformity with" the laws of the United States of America.¹⁶ In connection with its duties, the U.S. may, among other things, "issue and enforce regulations for the effective exercise of [its] rights and responsibilities."

These points are significant in light of the role of the Board cited earlier. The English text describes the role of the Board and its relation to the Commission in this manner: "The Panama Canal Commission shall be supervised by a Board." This seems to imply the panel is one with oversight responsibility; that it shall serve as a watchdog ensuring the Commission is properly carrying out its established responsibilities.

The Spanish version does not present a literal translation of the sentence, stating, "The Panama Canal Commission shall be directed by a Board of Directors . . ." Under the Panamanian text a rather different panel seems to be created. "To direct" is not synonymous with "to supervise," the former implying the existence of policy-making authority. The combination of "to direct" and "Board of Directors" (in contrast to a simple "Board") seems to indicate that Panama expects the body being created to have far more authority than the U.S. presumably intends it to have.

¹⁷ In the Spanish text the words "by and" are omitted. The resulting sentence makes no reference to the Commission being constituted by the United States.

¹⁸ U.S. Department of State, Treaties, p. 2.

The policy making power of the Board implied in the Panamanian text raises at least two problems. One is the degree to which a foreign country would have control over an agency of the U.S. government.

The make-up of the Board is significant in this context. The treaty stipulates it shall consist of five Americans and four Panamanians.¹⁹ With Panamanian participation coming one vote short of control of the board, this panel would almost certainly emerge as a vehicle for strong Panamanian influence on matters relating to the Canal's operation.

The 5-4 make-up, moreover, is no guarantee the U.S. will always have a majority. With full attendance, one American voting with the Panamanian bloc would be sufficient for the latter's position to prevail. Unavoidable absences from meetings and temporary vacancies in the American positions could similarly give Panama a temporary majority on the Board. The composition of the Board, in short, dilutes—and in some instances may vitiate—the rights granted to the United States in connection with the Canal.

The second problem relates to the question of responsibility. What entity is liable for possible improper Canal operation, or accidents? The U.S. is charged with managing the Canal, and the Panamanian Canal Commission is officially a U.S. government agency. On this basis, responsibility should fall on the United States. Yet if the Board is to have a policymaking role, the U.S. has less than full control over the actions of the Commission. Would the U.S. nevertheless be made liable for problems relating to the Canal?

IV. "GRANTS" OF RIGHTS TO THE UNITED STATES

The verb "to grant" appears eight times in the course of the documents. In Spanish it is translated in three different ways, using the word which is most precisely its equivalent ("otorgar"), but also the words meaning "to confer" ("conferir") and "to concede" ("conceder").

The verb "to concede" is used almost exclusively as the translation of "to grant" in the Spanish text of the 1903 treaty with Panama. It is employed, for example, in the crucial first clause in Article III:

"The Republic of Panama grants (in Spanish, "concedes") to the United States all the rights, power and authority * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory * * *"²⁰

The principal controversy surrounding this clause relates to the interpretation of "if it were the sovereign." A second source of debate has been the use of the word "concedes," with some Panamanians contending that in "conceding" these and other rights, their nation did not quite "grant" them.

This illustrates a problem that can occur when a word used is not the precise equivalent of the term agreed upon in the other language: its meaning is susceptible to questions. Had "otorgar" been used instead of "conceder," it is likely no question would have been raised. But with "conceder" employed, an argument can be made for the attribution of a different meaning on the not illogical grounds that if Panama had meant to make a "grant," it would have used the word "grant."

This particular dispute could have become far more complex than it did. As it was, it revolved around only one translation of "to grant." Upon ratification of the 1977 documents, by contrast, the governments involved will have not one, but three terms for which to sort out the nuances.

Given that grounds for distinguishing between the three terms may exist (in the opinion of present or future Panamanian officials, if nothing else), it is useful to examine what is "granted," what is "conferred," and what is conceded to the U.S. under the Canal Treaty.

Under Article I,

Panama * * * grants (confers) to the United States of America, for the duration of this Treaty, the rights necessary to regulate the transit of ships through the Panama Canal, and to manage, operate, maintain, improve, protect and defend the Canal.²¹

Under Article III,

Panama * * * grants (confers) to the United States of America the right to manage, operate, and maintain the Panama Canal, its complementary works, installations and equipment, and to provide for the orderly transit of vessels through the Panama Canal.²²

¹⁹ U.S. Department of State, Treaties, p. 2.

²⁰ U.S. Department of State, Construction of a Ship Canal to Connect the Waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, TIAS No. 431, p. 2.

The text then notes that the U.S. "accepts the grant (concession) of such rights * * *"²³

The rights provided for in the two sections overlap, but are not identical. The rights to improve and protect the Canal are only "granted," while the right to manage, operate, and maintain the Canal's complementary works, installations and equipment is only conferred upon the U.S.

Under Article XI, certain rights are "conferred" on the United States in connection with jurisdiction over civil and criminal matters.²⁴ The text adds this authority "shall supplement, and is not intended to limit, the full application and effect of the rights and authority granted (conferred) to the United States of America elsewhere in this treaty and in related agreements."²⁵

If a difference exists between "to grant" and "to confer," how is the above to be interpreted? In a literal sense, it could be argued that this section applies only to those rights which were, strictly speaking, "conferred," and not to those which were "granted."

V. PAYMENT TO PANAMA FOR SERVICES

Article III stipulates that Panama will assume certain public services in what was formerly the Canal Zone, and is to be reimbursed for these services by the Panama Canal Commission.²⁶ The English text clearly calls for reimbursement for costs incurred "in" providing those services, but the Spanish text, by contrast, uses a preposition most accurately translated as "while."²⁷

A strict interpretation of the sentence in the Spanish text thus commits the Commission to reimburse Panama for costs incurred at the same time as, but not necessarily in connection with, those services. This is indicated not necessarily to argue that Panama will insist on this position, but rather to point out that the language of the Spanish text allows it to do so if it wishes.

During the first three years the treaty is in force, this discrepancy would not have an impact, as the payment to Panama for public services is set at $10 million per annum. But at the end of three years, and every three years thereafter, the treaty calls for payment to Panama to be reviewed. The U.S. text calls for "the costs involved in furnishing said services to be reexamined."²⁸ and the Spanish text again uses the preposition equivalent to "while." The U.S. text adds "inflation and other relevant factors" are to be taken into account,²⁹ and the Panamanian text, compounding the ambiguity calls for the consideration of "inflation and other important factors." Obviously, "relevance" and "importance" are wholly different concepts.

Realistically, it is doubtful Panama would argue for the most literal interpretation of "while" and "important." Nevertheless, these terms give the government a degree of leeway it would not otherwise have. In a borderline situation, when the appropriateness of taking certain costs into account is being debated, these ambiguous terms provide Panama with an advantage it would lack under more precise language.

VI. FATE OF DISPLACED EMPLOYEES

A discrepancy appears in Article X of the Canal Treaty with regard to the future of former employees of the Panama Canal Company. Both texts agree that the two nations shall attempt to find positions for employees displaced because of the terms of the agreement. Then the documents differ. In every reference to this matter, the American version states reemployment goals will be carried out "to the maximum extent feasible,"^{30a} while the Panamanian version employs the more lukewarm "to the extent possible." Whether "feasible" and "possible" imply differing degrees of commitment is a debatable point; but the inclusion of "maximum" in the English text does convey a heightened sense of commitment not found in the Spanish text. A situation consequently could arise in which the U.S., taking its mandate from the American text, would make efforts to retain displaced employees "to the maximum extent feasible," while the Panamanian government's efforts would be limited to "the extent possible," as called for in the Spanish text.

VII. DISCREPANCIES IN LEGAL TERMINOLOGY

Of the legal terms used throughout the agreements, there are instances in which the expressions used do not totally correlate. This absence of uniformity may or may not affect the execution of the treaties in a substantive manner; in most cases they probably will not. At the same time, however, their very existence seems to indicate a certain lack of careful study on the part of the officials responsible for analysing the correlation between the Spanish and English texts of the documents. That discrepancies should exist even in legal terminology is a telling point, as the choice of legal expressions, given their frequently highly technical definitions, is one normally made only after a study conducted with the utmost care.

In the Preamble and Article I there are three references to previous treaties being ended by virtue of these agreements. While the term used in English is "terminate" in both textual references (the third reference, in which "abrogation" is employed, occurs in the title to Article I), the Spanish text uses "abrogate" throughout. The words are not interchangeable. "Termination" relates to an agreement coming to an end,^{30b} while "abrogation", according to the authoritative Black's Law Dictionary, implies its repeal, annulment, or destruction.³¹ Undoubtedly, "abrogate" is the more forceful of the two terms. Its selection by the Panamanian negotiators, be this the result of accident of design, will likely appeal to Panamanians opposed to existing treaties.

Because the Spanish language contains a word equivalent to "terminate" as well as one having the meaning of "abrogate," no linguistic impediment existed for a common term being selected by the two parties in the negotiations. Such consistent use of one term would have totally precluded any questions arising in the future about the exact circumstances under which previous treaties were made inactive.

Under Article III, the English language text gives the U.S. the right to "make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules with respect to navigation and maritime matters."³² The word used in the Spanish text as the equivalent of "to make" is "promulgar," meaning "to promulgate."

The authoritative A New Pronouncing Dictionary of the Spanish and English Languages by Mariano Velazquez de la Cadena (normally known, and hereinafter referred to, as the Velazquez Dictionary) translates and defines "promulgar" as "to promulgate, to publish."³³ The supremely authoritative Spanish-language Diccionario de la Lengua Espanola gives the following definition of "promulgar" as a legal term: "to formally publish a law of other measure by an authority."³⁴

Clearly, while the "making" of a law or rule embraces all the steps involved in the process, its promulgation relates to only one small aspect of that process. A purist would question if the right granted in the Spanish text to "promulgate" carries with it the authority to carry through the other steps involved. While Panama is scarcely likely to make this point, if a uniform term had been selected (and the Spanish language does contain words equivalent to "make"), the question would have been totally moot.

Finally, the word used in the Spanish texts as the equivalent of "to issue," "expedir," is to same degree open to question. The Velazquez Dictionary defines "expedir" as "to issue from a public office."³⁵ Thus in certain parts of the texts, such as in those dealing with the issuance of licenses for various activities, the use of "expedir" is correct. In connection with the issuance of government regulations (as, for example, under Article III, which gives the U.S. the right to "issue and enforce regulations for the effective exercise of the rights and responsibilities of the United States of America * * *"³⁶, legal experts regard the use of a separate term, "dictar," as more correct.

CONCLUSION

All multilingual documents contain, perhaps inevitably, some discrepancies with regard to the exact choice of words. To say it is a frequent occurrence however, is not to say it is one without consequences. Disputes, sometimes serious ones, can and do occur. Obviously, the very existence of a discrepancy will not automatically lead to a problem; at the same time, its presence opens the door to disputes. In the case of the Panama Canal Treaties, the differences in the two versions can easily result in problems of some degree of seriousness, particularly because there is no reason to believe Panama will automatically accept specific U.S. interpretations over its own.

The eventual acceptance or rejection of the treaties is a matter which will be decided in the coming months by the American people and the U.S. Senate. Many factors will be weighed in the course of the decision-making process. A number of these, such as the effect of the treaties on U.S. access to the canal and on its authority to defend the waterway, are of supreme importance. At the same time, an equally significant element in the decision-making process is understanding what the treaty language actually says and what its word can be interpreted to mean. A thorough understanding of this aspect of the issue will be integral to an intelligent decision on the fate of the treaties.

TESTIMONY ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations continued hearings today on the Panama Canal treaties and received testimony from the following:

The Honorable Eldon Rudd of Arizona.

The Honorable William D. Rogers, member, Committee of Americans for the Canal Treaties, Washington, D.C.

Peter V. Baugher, chairman, National Governing Board, the Ripon Society, Chicago, Ill.

The Reverend Jesse L. Jackson, national president, Operation PUSH, Chicago, Ill.

The Honorable Robert E. Bauman of Maryland.

Col. John P. Sheffey, executive vice president, National Association for Uniformed Services, Arlington, Va.

Egon Richard Tausch, on behalf of U.S. Industrial Council, Washington, D.C.

George Fox Mott, chairman, the Mott Research Group, Washington, D.C.

I ask unanimous consent that the prepared text of the statements given before the committee be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HONORABLE ELDON RUDD

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee, I greatly appreciate this opportunity to appear today during this final session of hearings on the proposed new Panama Canal treaties.

Let me note by way of background that I am very familiar with the countries and people of Latin America, having spent several years on diplomatic assignment in many countries throughout Latin America.

My analysis and views of the proposed treaties are based upon my understanding of the history and aspirations of Latin American peoples, as well as considerable discussion about the treaties with academic and legal scholars, business and government leaders, and people in Arizona and other parts of our country and the world.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that Senate action on these treaties may well be the most important foreign policy decision confronting the United States in 1978.

While the full text of the two treaties and their accompanying implementing agreements are available from a number of sources, regrettably most Americans will not read the full texts. Their opinions will be shaped and their judgments formed by what the opponents and proponents say about the treaties.

The President of the United States has signed the treaties. The White House has for many months been embarked on a full-scale, heavily financed propaganda effort to persuade the public and Members of Congress to ratify the President's questionable decision.

We are being told by the President and his emissaries that the treaties should be ratified for a number of reasons—among them that—

1. The U.S. presence in Panama is illegitimate.
2. Control of the Canal is no longer vital to our national defense.
3. The commercial importance of the Canal to U.S. and to world trade has diminished.
4. The Canal cannot be defended against enemy attack.
5. Failure to ratify the treaties will provoke the Panamanians to guerrilla warfare and create a second Vietnam.
6. All Latin and South American countries support the new treaties, and will be offended if they are not ratified.
7. Ratification will guarantee uninterrupted operation of the Canal.
8. Ratification will not impair or limit our present ability to defend the Canal.
9. Because it is in the self interests of Panama to keep the Canal open and operating, we should not be concerned over any aspects of the new treaties.

Mr. Chairman, if historical fact and current wisdom supports all these contentions—or even most of them—then indeed the people and the Congress should look favorably upon ratification of the treaties.

On the other hand, however, if historical fact and wisdom strongly contradict these claims in behalf of the treaties, then Congress and the people should refuse ratification. Our task is to determine the truth.

I would like to look at each one of these claims to see whether they stand up or fall under factual scrutiny.

1. Is the U.S. presence in Panama illegitimate? Does equity require the United States to revise the present treaty and make restitution to the Republic of Panama for past wrongdoing?

Vasco Nunez de Balboa crossed the Isthmus of Panama to discover the Pacific Ocean in 1513. The strategic importance of this narrow piece of ground was immediately recognized. It became the base for Spanish colonization and conquest of the New World.

Discontent in the Spanish colonies matured more slowly than it did in the English of North America. But there were numerous revolts. In 1821, the residents of the Isthmus of Panama signed a formal agreement declaring independence from Spain, and unification with Colombia.

It was a bad choice. Colombia suffered civil war and revolution. Between 1850 and 1902, the residents of Panama made 53 major efforts to achieve independence.

During this period, the United States, in support of Colombian sovereignty, landed troops on the Isthmus of Panama six times.

The discovery of gold in California heightened American interest in a proposed canal across the isthmus. In 1850, the Panamanian Railway was built by a consortium of U.S. companies and financiers. Anxious to protect the integrity of this commercial artery, the U.S. supported Colombian authority, while at the same time recognizing the legitimate claims of the Panamanians.

Between 1856 and 1870, the United States tried to negotiate a treaty with Colombia for the construction of a canal across the isthmus. Colombia rejected the American proposals and made an agreement with a French company for construction of a canal. The French failed.

In 1902, Congress passed the Spooner Act, providing President Theodore Roosevelt with authority and $40 million to purchase the rights to an isthmian canal that had been obtained by France from Colombia.

After passage of that Act, several months of arduous negotiations between U.S. Secretary of State John Hay and Colombian Charge d'Affaires Tomas Herran resulted in a treaty, which the U.S. Senate duly ratified on March 17, 1903.

The Hay-Herran Treaty would have given the United States the right to build and operate a canal through a 10-kilometer-wide strip of land across the isthmus, for an initial payment of $10 million and an annuity of $250,000.

But after the treaty had been signed by the two ministers, and ratified by the U.S. Senate, Colombia saw an opportunity to increase its U.S. payment to $50 million. The French company's rights to construct the canal were due to expire in a few months. And so the Colombia Senate refused to ratify the Hay-Herran Treaty in an attempt to also obtain the $40 million authorized by the Spooner Act for the purchase of those canal construction rights.

Colombia's gamble, motivated in part by greed, that rejection of the Hay-Herran Treaty would result in a more lucrative deal within several months did not work. The disappointed Panamanians revolted against Colombia, the United States recognized Panama's independence and negotiated a treaty with the new nation.

This treaty, signed and ratified by both countries on November 18, 1903, has been the the operating document ever since.

The treaty says, and I quote—

"The Republic of Panama grants the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of the Canal Zone." (Emphasis added.)

Article III of the treaty states that—

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights and power and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II, which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority." (Emphasis added.)

Did the United States take advantage of the new, fledgling Panamanian government?

We recognized the integrity of the new government and thereby protected the new republic from its old master, Colombia, or any other aggressor.

We paid the government $10 million for a strip of land about 10 miles wide and 50 miles long. We paid every individual landowner or squatter on this parcel of land—a total of $150 million—and by this payment acquired title in fee simple—total ownership of all land within the Canal Zone. These deed instruments were all recorded and are a part of the official U.S. Court record.

In addition, we paid the defunct French company $40 million for whatever rights they had to the ditch. We also paid the government of Colombia $25 million for whatever claims they still might have pressed, in return for which Colombia ratified the Thomson-Urrutia Treaty officially recognizing the legitimacy of Panama's independence and U.S. sovereignty over the Canal Zone.

On top of all that, the United States spent $366 million to construct the Panama Canal.

Is our presence in Panama legitimate? Indeed it is. We did not foment a revolution. We recognized a new government.

Under the terms of the 1903 treaty, Panama granted the Canal Zone to the United States. They did not rent it to us or lease it to us. The term "grant" is used 14 times in that treaty.

What we got for our money was the right to build the Canal, to own and occupy a strip of land about 10 miles wide and 50 miles long.

The land at that time was pest-ridden, mosquito-infested, and uninhabitable—and there was no guarantee that we could succeed where the French had failed.

We agreed to build the Canal at Panama instead of Nicaragua. We cleaned up Panama, and made a total investment of about $2 billion.

As a result, the people of Panama today enjoy the highest standard of living in Central America, and the fourth highest in all of the Americas.

2. Is control of the Panama Canal vital to our national defense?

Indeed it is. In fact, Lieutenant General Welborn Dolvin, one of the President's spokesmen who appeared in Phoenix on December 15th urging ratification of the new treaties, declared that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the military in general consider the Canal to be of strategic military importance.

Four former Chiefs of Naval Operations—Admirals Thomas Moorer, Arleigh Burke, Robert Carney, and George Anderson—are all on record with the statement that—

"the loss of the Canal, which would be a serious set-back in war, would contribute to encirclement of the United States by hostile naval forces and threaten our ability to survive."

General V. H. Kulac, United States Marine Corps retired, has said—

"The Panama Canal is an essential link between the naval forces of the United States, both in the Atlantic and the Pacific. It is only because of the waterway that we are able to risk having what amounts to a bare-bones, one-ocean Navy."

The U.S. Commander-in-Chief Pacific Fleet recently stated that in the event of hostilities, the Panama Canal would be absolute essential for the defense of American commitments.

He stated that if he were granted carte blanche use of every boxcar on every east-west railway line in the United States, without the use of the Canal he could not say with any degree of certainty that he could successfully carry out a defensive war.

Proponents of ratification have attempted to emphasize the fact that 13 of our aircraft carriers are too large to transit the Canal. This is true. But of the 176 combat surface ships, 41 nuclear-powered ballistic-missile submarines, and 75 attack submarines currently on active duty, these aircraft carriers are the only vessels which cannot transit the Canal.

I believe it is true that the overwhelming majority of high-ranking professional military men and women in the United States strongly believe that U.S. control of the Panama Canal is vital to our national defense.

More than 350 prominent generals and admirals have so stated by declaring their opposition to the proposed new treaties, in response to a survey by the Reserve Officers Association.

They include Admiral John S. McCain, former Commander-in-Chief of U.S. Pacific Forces; General Lyman Lemnitzer, former Supreme Allied Commander, NATO; General Charles L. Bolte, former Army Vice Chief of Staff; General Lewis W. Walt, former Commandant of the United States Marine Corps; Major General Ernest (Mike) Massad, former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense; and Brigadier General John S. Eisenhower, son of the late former President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

3. Has the commercial importance of the Canal to the U.S. and to world trade diminished?

Indeed it has not. In fiscal year 1975 there were 13,786 transits—an average of 40 vessels a day. Thirteen major trade routes funnel through the Caribbean Sea, Gulf of Mexico, Panama Canal region. Ninety-seven percent of the world's trade vessels use the Panama Canal, and 70 percent of all commerce using the Canal is bound to or from a U.S. port.

4. Can the Canal be defended against enemy attack?

Lieutenant General Dennis P. McAuliffe, Commander-in-Chief of the U.S. Southern Command headquartered in the Canal Zone, has testified that his troops are adequate to defend the Canal from any threat. He elaborated upon this statement when I visited with him personally in Panama early last year.

Because the Zone itself stretches five miles on either side of the actual ditch, guerrilla encroachments into the Canal Zone could be easily detected and stopped. Our troops are established at defensive strong points. This was the purpose in the plans of our forefathers.

The Canal is not a delicate, complicated installation. It is an engineering marvel in its simplicity. The locks are simple mechanisms, controls are manual. There are alternate power sources available. The maintenance crews on station could rapidly replace any damaged gate or lock.

An atomic bomb could destroy the Canal, but experts have testified that saboteurs would have great difficulty disabling any of the operating machinery. The so-called "suitcase bomb" theory is hardly imaginable, and I only view it as a scare tactic by those whose other arguments in favor of U.S. abandonment of the Canal are equally weak.

5. Will failure to ratify the treaties provoke the Panamanians to guerrilla warfare and create a second Vietnam?

That is highly unlikely, and this argument is typical of the "scare talk" that is being used to intimidate the American public which opposes U.S. abandonment of the Canal into accepting the proposed new treaties.

There are about 1,700,000 citizens of Panama. Many of these are violently opposed to the Torrijos military dictatorship. Panama's 8,000-man National Guard is essential to the maintenance of civil order—to perform customs and immigration duties. Only about 1,600 are trained as a military readiness force.

Student revolutionaries in Panama have caused riots in the past, and have done damage, but they are not a military force. Should they seriously attack the Canal installation, our troops would be established at defensive strong points, easily able to counter any threat to the Canal.

Vietnam was a war of mobility and position. Such is not the case in Panama. The substantial advantage would be with the U.S. defenders.

6. Do all Latin and South American countries support the new treaties? Will they be offended if the treaties are not ratified?

It is highly unlikely that many of them support the treaties. It is even more unlikely that any of them would be offended if the Congress refused to ratify them.

In fact, a number of Latin American governments are most apprehensive about the proposed new treaties. They do not believe that the Torrijos government can maintain a stable position in the Canal Zone. They are suspicious of the close ties between Torrijos and Castro Cuba, and recent agreements with the Soviet Union that have established a stronger Soviet political and economic presence in Panama.

It is an act of faith for Latin American spokesmen to attack the Gringos, to shout "Yankee go home," but uninterrupted operation of the Canal and reasonable tolls are vital to the economies of all South America.

The American presence guarantees not only the availability of transit. It also insures relative tranquility in the Caribbean-Gulf of Mexico sea space.

Addressing this question, the highly respected military writer Hanson W. Baldwin has stated—

"Even more compelling than the military and economic importance of the Canal are the political and psychological considerations. Since the failure at the Bay of Pigs, the U.S. foreign policy has suffered a series of severe defeats. We have been in retreat in many places around the world. An accepted part of the Latin mystique is to condemn the damned Yankees, but weakness, conciliation and appeasement do not earn love and respect."

I have spent a career in Latin America. Every Latin American country and citizen wants a strong United States, both militarily and economically, to lead and protect this hemisphere.

7. Will ratification of the proposed new treaties guarantee uninterrupted operation of the Canal?

8. Will ratification not impair or limit our present ability to defend the Canal?

It is at this moment our uncontested, unilateral right to defend and operate the Canal. We do not need a new treaty to do that. This claim that we need a new treaty rests upon the implicit threat that Dictator Torrijos or Panamanian guerrillas will interrupt the operation of the Canal if we do not surrender the Canal to Panama.

But defense and control of the Canal without sovereignty is doublespeak.

Without sovereignty, we would have no rights in the Canal Zone, except any specifically granted by these new treaties. The Torrijos regime or a successor government could repudiate any U.S. role to guarantee uninterrupted operation and use of the Canal, and to defend it, and then any attempts that we might make along these lines would be as an invader of foreign territory.

Let me call your attention to the opening language of the proposed new Panama Canal treaty. After two paragraphs of recital, it says—

"Acknowledging the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory. . . ."

This clause repudiates 75 years of legal understanding, and all the court decisions during that period. It abrogates all prior pacts and agreements—all U.S. rights and territories are immediately ceded to Panama. It amounts to a confession of wrongful taking on the part of American governments from the time of Theodore Roosevelt.

This is the whole treaty. All the rest is window-dressing.

It is this stark and foreboding reality of ceding U.S. sovereignty over the Canal Zone to Panama that explains the ambiguous language of any other key treaty provisions, which have been the subject of so much sharp questioning and concern.

First, once U.S. sovereignty is abandoned, the United States would no longer retain a "permanent" right to use military force to defend the Canal in an emergency. American military defense of the Canal could only come at the invitation and sufferance of the Panamanian government.

Second, while the treaty gives lip-service to "expeditious transit" for U.S. military vessels in time of emergency, they would not have any priority over other ships unless such priority was specifically granted by Panama any time it was needed.

Under terms of the current treaty, there is no question that the United States has and retains rights both to permanently defend the Canal and for priority passage for our vessels.

But despite Administration claims to the contrary, the new proposed treaty language on these points is subject to Panama's interpretation and whim, with no chance of redress for the United States short of military force if Panama refuses to allow U.S. defense or priority use of the Canal once the new treaties are ratified and U.S. sovereignty is given to Panama.

On the subject of the Canal's neutrality and defense, Article IV of the proposed neutrality treaty simply states that—

"The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties."

Article V states—

"After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the Canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory."

On the subject of priority passage of U.S. military vessels through the Canal. Article VI of the proposed neutrality treaty states only that—

"U.S. vessels of war and auxiliary vessels will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously."

It is the position of the Administration and proponents of the new treaties that this language will allow the United States to intervene to protect the neutrality of the Canal, if it is ever subject to threatened obstruction, attack, or closure by a hostile force. But Panamanian officials have already sharply disagreed with this interpretation—and did so even before the proposed new treaties were signed by President Carter and Dictator Torrijos.

Panamanian chief negotiator Romulo Escobar Bethancourt has flatly repudiated the insistence of Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and U.S. negotiator Sol Linowitz that we would have the right unilaterally to intervene militarily to ensure that the Canal remains open and is not closed off to any country if these new treaties are ratified.

Escobar stated to the press on August 22nd last year, and I quote—

"The neutrality pact does not provide that the United States will say when neutrality is violated."

Escobar has likewise repudiated Administration claims concerning interpretation of the proposed neutrality treaty's provision for so-called "expeditious passage" of U.S. military vessels. Escobar stated that "expeditious passage" would not necessarily mean "privileged passage" or "priority passage."

Escobar stated—

"As a matter of fact, the concept of privileged passage was rejected."

Emphasizing Panama's position that U.S. military ships would not be allowed to go to the head of the line to go through the Canal first under any circumstances. Escobar also stated—

"We cannot go that far."

Another Panamanian negotiator, Carlos Lopez Guevara, has also flatly contradicted the Administration's assertion on the right of U.S. intervention to guarantee the Canal's neutrality and the right of priority U.S. passage through the Canal.

Lopez recently stated that the U.S. would never have the right to intervene—after the new treaties had gone into effect.

With regard to passage of U.S. ships through the Canal Lopez stated—

"This neutrality treaty gives the United States the right to hope that Panama and all the countries in the world will respect the right of American ships to transit the Canal—but that is the only right it has received."

"After proper questions were raised about these statements by Panamanian officials—following the treaty signing ceremony by President Carter and Dictator Torrijos on September 17th in Washington—a so-called "Statement of Understanding" was drafted for the two leaders by U.S. negotiator Linowitz and Panamanian negotiator Escobar.

This statement supposedly clarifies the U.S. right to defend the Canal, but reiterates even more strongly that the U.S. may not intervene in the "internal affairs" of Panama.

This confirms Escobar's earlier statement that only Panama will determine when the Canal's neutrality has been violated, thus precluding unilateral U.S. action in its defense. The statement would also preclude American defense of the Canal if the threat or aggression resulted from Panamanian action.

This "Statement of Understanding" was not signed by either President Carter or Dictator Torrijos. In fact, Torrijos boasted upon his return to Panama that he had not so much as "signed an autograph" while he was in Washington on that second mission.

The statement thus appears as another diversion for treaty proponents in this country, to placate legitimate concerns about the defense of the Canal, while Dictator Torrijos is able to continue assuring his own people that the terms of the proposed new treaty will mean total expulsion of the U.S. from the Canal Zone forever.

Mr. Chairman, Panama's strident, almost hysterical anti-U.S. campaign to secure approval of the proposed new treaties by the Panamanian people last October should warn us that Panama's negotiators have pressed hard on purpose for ambiguity and impreciseness in the treaty language, in order to secure U.S. ratification as well as to permit their own action to prevent future U.S. military defense and priority use of the Canal.

I have here a copy of the Torrijos regime's official campaign literature, with English subtitles inserted by an educational group in Texas, which shows the fever pitch of anti-American sentiment that was used by Dictator Torrijos to promote approval of the proposed new treaties by the Panamanian people. I would like this literature to be reproduced as part of the official hearing record at the end of my prepared statement.

This propaganda material is full of historical distortion concerning the U.S. role in Panama. And its Marxist overtones that the proposed new treaties represent a popular revolution against an oppressive U.S. presence in Panama illustrates perhaps another major flaw of these agreements with the Torrijos regime.

We are dealing here with a military dictatorship. Dictator Torrijos wields enormous personal power, and is responsible to no one. His regime is arbitrary and corrupt, and many of its top officials have been in and out of the Communist Party.

These new treaties make the United States a full partner—a guarantor—of the Torrijos regime. This is a regime that has—

Continued to express admiration and support for Fidel Castro and his revolutionary Communist objectives in Latin America, Africa, and around the world;

Signed a revolutionary anti-Zionist pact with Libya's pro-militant Arab Marxist dictator Moammar Khadaffi;

Formally aligned itself with the so-called Third World group, which is often guided and supported by the Soviet Union in its drive for world Communist expansionism;

Supported and promoted the illegal world drug trade, including the traffic of heroine and cocaine into the United States by Dictator Torrijos' brother, Moise Torrijos, who is under indictment in New York;

Continuously been cited as an oppressive violator of human rights by the nonpartisan Freedom House, which rates Panama under Dictator Torrijos in the "not free" category.

Such treaties giving Panama total sovereignty over the Canal Zone, which offer so many possibilities and opportunities for misunderstanding in their provisions over administration and defense of the Canal, provide a fruitful ground for infiltration, subversion, and control of Panama and the Canal by outside forces, such as Cuba and the Soviet Union.

At the very moment we were negotiating with the Torrijos regime, the Soviets were concluding new commercial relations with the Republic of Panama that included several multi-million dollar construction projects by the Soviets in Panama, use by the Soviets of facilities at old France Field airbase and the free port of Colon, and the opening of a branch of the Narodny Bank of Moscow in Panama to help orchestrate Soviet financial and commercial activities throughout the region.

Harold K. Milks, longtime expert on Latin America and currently managing editor of The Arizona Republic, recently stated that—

"These Soviet commercial agreements with Panama are exactly the same as the Soviet Union's opening gambit to gain a foothold in Cuba during the early 1960s."

Mr. Chairman, numerous courts have clearly held that the United States has full sovereignty in the Canal Zone. What near-term or long-term benefits will accrue to the American people by turning over this investment amounting to almost $10 billion to a military dictatorship?

Construction of the Canal by the United States made the Republic of Panama a viable nation. The commercial activities generated provide one-third of the gross national product of Panama. It is important to note that the first American of any authority to suggest the Panama Canal give away was convicted perjurer Alger Hiss.

In 1946, Hiss was head of the Office of Political Affairs at the State Department. He sent to the new United Nations a list of so-called U.S. occupied territories, which included the Panama Canal Zone.

Proponents of the new treaties argue that there is a moral requirement to give the Canal to Panama. In truth, we have a greater moral commitment to keep the Canal, to protect it, and to make it available for world commerce.

The first time that most of the American people learned that certain government officials in Washington were planning to give away the Canal was during the 1976 Presidential campaign. Candidate Carter said during the nationally televised debates with then President Ford—

"I would never give up complete control or practical control of the Panama Canal Zone."

One of his first official acts as President was to send Ellsworth Bunker and Sol Linowitz to Panama to negotiate these new treaties.

Sol Linowitz was sent to Panama on temporary appointment, good for only six months, so that he would not have to undergo Senate confirmation. A number of knowledgeable journalists have declared that President Carter did not ask for Senate confirmation of Linowitz because he knew that an airing of Linowitz' views in favor of giving away the Canal and the Canal Zone, later written into the terms of these new treaties, would have stopped the giveaway and Linowitz' appointment before they ever got off the ground.

President Carter campaigned against former President Ford with the complaint that foreign policy negotiations of the Ford Administration were conducted in secret. But then he kept details of the new treaties secret until about 24 hours before he signed them.

He did not seek the opinions of Members of Congress. He did not take the American people into his confidence. He ordered the treaties written on his own.

Now we are told by political pundits and news commentators that the Carter Administration has another taxpayer-paid advantage in "selling" his treaties.

The State Department is distributing pamphlets which endorse the new treaties, explaining that they are "statesmanlike . . . and achieve a fair solution consistent with . . . our national interests." Torrijos Communist ties are denied.

That the American people must pay for the Administration's propaganda program is a travesty.

President Carter himself demonstrated that his campaign is one of propaganda, not of facts, when he addressed the Panama Canal issue during his nationally televised Conversation With the President with four network journalists last December 28th.

About the proposed new treaty, he stated—

"What we wanted was one that treated us and Panama fairly, and we got it."

What is fair about giving away sovereign U.S. territory without compensation? What is fair about trying to deny the people's elected officials in the U.S. House of Representatives the right to exercise their Constitutional duty, as stated in Article IV, Section 3, "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," with respect to the provisions of the proposed treaty?

What is fair about denying to the people of the United States the right to build another sea-level canal in another country, such as Nicaragua, for at least 23 years, if this treaty is approved?

The President stated—

"We wanted a treaty that did not put a financial burden on the American people, and we got it."

Not true. This treaty will not only give away to Panama the Canal and Canal Zone worth about $10 billion. We will also be paying Panama to take it—$60 million to $80 million a year for the next 22 years through increased tolls, which will eventually fall on the consumers.

Furthermore, the Carter Administration has promised in the side agreements that go along with the treaties to loan the Torrijos regime another $200 million from the U.S.-financed Export-Import Bank, $75 million from the Agency for International Development, $20 million from the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, and $50 million in military sales and credits—a total of $345 million guaranteed out of the U.S. Treasury, to be paid by the American taxpayers.

The President stated—

"We wanted treaties that would guarantee proper operation of the Panama Canal itself, for us and for foreign shipping, and we got it."

How so? The Panama Canal Company, which has operated the Canal in an extraordinarily safe, efficient, and fair manner over these many years, is to be abolished. The American workforce which is the key factor in this excellent operation of the Canal is to be arbitrarily cut by at least 20 percent within the first five years of the new treaty, and no non-Panamanian will be able to work as part of the Canal workforce for more than five years.

Panama does not now have—and cannot have within the short period required—the skilled workers to efficiently and safely operate the Canal. It takes 20 years of training to perform jobs such as ships' captain-pilot, to navigate vessels through the Canal. Panama does not have people qualified to do these jobs, and at present only 1 percent of the Canal's 200 ships' captains are Panamanians.

Panama has no navy to draw from to fill these positions that the new treaty would require to be filled by Panamanians when American workers are forcibly discharged.

The President stated—

"We wanted treaties that would also guarantee us permanently the right to take what action we think necessary to keep the Canal safe, to defend it, and to keep it open for us to use, and we got it."

Despite the unsigned "Statement of Understanding" to the contrary, the proposed treaty terms do not guarantee this, and the position of Panama on these points refutes the President's claim that the United States will have any such rights or guarantees.

The President stated—

"We wanted treaties—two treaties there are—that would give us the right for expeditious passage in time of need or emergency, for our ships to go to the head of the line and go through the Canal without delay, and we got it."

Again, this statement is not backed up by the actual proposed treaty language or by interpretations of that language by key Panamanian officials. If it is the intent of both the United States and Panama that U.S. vessels should have priority passage in time of emergency, and that the U.S. should have the permanent right to defend the Canal against interruption of its operation or attack, the treaty language should say so in clear, unequivocal terms.

Failure of the treaty language to clearly state these rights on the part of the United States, leaving room for considerable misunderstanding and controversy, will only play into the hands of those who seek to generate instability and tension in key locations around the world.

And, finally, the President stated—

"We wanted treaties also that would be acceptable in the eyes of the international community, particularly in Latin America, and we got them."

It is difficult to believe that any complete, fair-minded evaluation of these treaties could result in favorable reaction around the world.

The ominous impact of the treaties on Canal tolls alone, which according to conservative Administration estimates will have to be increased by at least 25-30 percent, will be considerable to the economies of all nations who use the Canal.

Who except the Torrijos regime could possibly benefit from such huge toll increases? Who is to benefit from the lower-skilled Canal workforce, which will mean problems for vessels that use the Canal? Who can possibly be pleased by the hundreds of other unanswered questions and problems posed by these proposed new treaties and the radical restructuring of Canal operations that they will bring?

If the treaties are ratified, we will have earned the disdain and lost the respect of every nation in the world.

Why, indeed, is the United States Senate being asked to ratify these questionable treaties? Who is to benefit?

Why should the people of the United States, who now own the Canal, give this $10 billion asset to Dictator Torrijos, and then pay him an additional $2.2 billion over the next 22 years?

Murray Rothbard, one of the nation's more prominent libertarian thinkers, tells us why in the December, 1977, issue of a new magazine called Inquiry. The title of the Rothbard article is, "The Treaty that Wall Street Wrote."

The international money men who control the great banking institutions of Wall Street want the treaties adopted. Why?

There are two obvious reasons—

The first one is that they want to get their money back. They want to recover the approximately $2.9 billion that they have loaned to the Torrijos regime since 1970. The Torrijos government is, for all practical purposes, broke. About 40 percent of its national budget must go to pay the debt service on these loans.

Why did these great banks loan this money to Torrijos? Was it just a friendly American gesture of goodwill? Perhaps not.

In 1970, Torrijos rewrote the banking laws of Panama—free of taxes, free of onerous regulations. Panama became a haven for foreign banks. Now there are about 75 banks in Panama, with total assets of more than $8.6 billion, conducting transactions throughout the world.

Panama's shipping laws are equally accommodating to foreign owners, and a great fleet of merchant vessels flies the Panamanian flag.

Incidentally, ships of Panamanian and Colombian registry transit the Canal without paying tolls. It would be difficult to calculate the total value of this subsidy over the years of Canal operation.

If Wall Street wanted to write a new Canal treaty, to propitiate Torrijos, how did they go about it?

They arranged to send Sol Linowitz, who at the time of his appointment and during most of his service was a director of Marine Midland Bank, together with the aging Ellsworth Bunker, to write the treaties.

According to Arizona press accounts, when the Administration's Lieutenant General Wellborn Dolvin was in Phoenix last December 15th, attempting to enlist support for ratification, the General made quite a point of stating that Panama has never violated the 1903 treaty.

Of course little Panama hasn't violated the 1903 treaty. But in 1913, Panama did ask for additional payments, and during World War II we paid Panama substantial sums of money to enlarge our defense installations.

In June, 1972, the Torrijos government expropriated the power and light company in Panama that was owned by the Boise Cascade Company of Boise, Idaho. The takeover was made with troops of the Panama National Guard, and Panama finally agreed to pay Boise Cascade $22 million for property that was worth $87 million.

Then Panama borrowed some of the money from the United States Government to make the payment.

One month later, the Torrijos regime nationalized the Canal Zone bus service, a company incorporated in the State of Delaware and owned by U.S. citizens in the Canal Zone. Seventeen buses were hijacked. Our U.S. State Department forced the company to sell out to Panama.

Dictator Torrijos has held power in Panama for eight years—longer than any other ruler of Panama. Since 1902, Panama has had 32 presidents in more than 50 governments. The average life of the ruling regime has been 2.25 years.

These proposed Panama Canal treaties were written in secret. They serve the special interests of the New York bankers. They will transfer a capital asset worth $10 billion to an unstable dictator.

The American taxpayer, if the treaties are ratified, will give the Republic of Panama $2.2 billion over the life of the treaties.

Panama simply does not have the military strength to defend the Canal. If it is to be defended and kept open, the United States must do it. Ours is the only country on earth able to defend the Canal, but if we ratify the treaties our ability to defend this vital waterway will be dangerously weakened.

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee, the treaties that Wall Street wrote must be rejected. We cannot gamble with an installation so vital to the economic well-being and to the peace of the Western hemisphere.

Thank you, again, for this opportunity to appear to present these concerns. I will be pleased to answer your questions.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM D. ROGERS

I am honored that the Committee of Americans for the Canal Treaties, Inc. should ask me to appear on its behalf before the Committee in this closing session of your hearings.

I speak from a variety of perspectives—as a Deputy U.S. Coordinator of the Alliance for Progress during the Kennedy Administration, President of the Center for Inter-American Relations during the late sixties, and as Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs and member of the Canal Company Board from 1974 to 1977.

You have already heard from a number of witnesses on all manner of aspects of the new agreements. I will not attempt to recite the full litany of arguments in favor of the treaties now. Let me try instead to touch on a few of the issues which have lately emerged as the more significant, as your consideration of the treaties comes to a close, and then try to place the treaties in a broader context of world affairs, at least as I see those affairs from the perspective of my own experience.

First, as to the specific issues which seemed to have come to the fore in the last several weeks. The debate on the treaties has served the very purposes which a debate in a democracy should serve. It has, I think, narrowed the issues, eliminated some substantial early doubt and confusion and focused the attention of the country on a few specific and precise points.

The essential structure of the treaties is now clear, I believe, to the American people.

Our interest in the Canal, it has been emphasized, is in its use, not its ownership. The debate has served to highlight how the treaties serve that purpose.

Under the treaties, the United States will continue to manage, operate and control the Canal, its maintenance policies, its employment practices and its toll rates, through the end of this Century.

We will have the lands and waters necessary for the Canal, and the base facilities around the Canal from which to defend it.

The formalism of the Canal Zone will disappear but otherwise the new treaties will cause virtually no alteration to the present mode of operation, management and control of the Canal.

Considerable attention during the debate has focused on the nature and character of Panama, its people, its leaders and its government. In my judgment, much that has been said comes close to nonsense but, nonsense or not, it is also irrelevant. Panama will take control of the Canal in the year 2000, not before. Until then, Panama will be called upon to play an increasingly participatory role in the management and security of the facilities, and to train and equip itself for the mandate it will assume in the 21st century, but it will not have the decisive vote for another generation.

Some of the opponents have suggested, however, that the new regime will attempt to force an immediate takeover by somehow expropriating the new Canal Commission and the Canal property the moment the new treaty becomes effective. This is fanciful. Would it have the legal right to? No. The internationally recognized power of nationalization has never been thought to extend to the property and operations of a foreign government. The Canal Commission will be an entity of the United States. It will not be subject to nationalization.

Who is to stop Panama? The Army, the Navy and the Marines, who will remain where they are for another 22 years.

Is Panama likely to try? Not very. Panama, though fretful and impatient under the 1903 Treaty, which it regards as vastly more unjust than the new arrangements, has never tried to abrogate it. It seems unlikely that Panama would breach the new pacts when it honored the old.

In the year 2000, Panama will assume management responsibility, but it will do so as a trustee, bound by its own obligation, and our endorsement, to a regime of neutrality and efficiency.

There have been those who have been concerned about the reliability of that neutrality commitment in the 21st Century. The answer is that the United States will have the right to take such action as it deems necessary to enforce that regime of neutrality.

The Carter-Torrijos Statement of October 14, 1977 confirms this common interpretation of Panama and the United States. It was made public by both parties prior to the Panamanian plebiscite on the treaties.

The Neutrality Treaty furthermore proscribes foreign military presence in Panama now and after termination of our operations. No such prohibitions are included in the existing arrangement. These also serve to support and insure the continued nondiscriminatory access to the Canal in the next century.

Article VI, paragraph (1) of the Neutrality Treaty, also as confirmed by the Carter-Torrijos Statement, provides that United States vessels are entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This means that such vessels receive passage as "quickly as possible" and in cases of emergency, go to the head of the line.

The Agreement carries over the same basic principle of neutralization elaborated in the 1901 Hay-Pauncefote Treaty and is consistent with the terms of that Treaty which would remain in effect.

Some opponents have nevertheless objected that, however responsible the treaties may be in substance, we should not ratify them because ratification would violate the principle that one should never negotiate under threat. They seem to imply that any request by another nation to alter an arrangement which has become so outdated as to cause difficulty and resentment, even if the request for the change is made through negotiation and conciliation, is a threat. It follows from this that one can never negotiate.

A somewhat related point is the Principle of the Misunderstood Motive. This Principle says that in foreign relations you should not now do an admittedly right action for fear that you will be understood to have done that action, not for reasons of simple justice but because you are afraid. It follows from this that if in these treaties the Senate consents to revision of the 1903 arrangement which is in our own interest, we will be seen by others to be saying that we will accept any proposal, no matter how indefensible, put to us with respect to SALT, Taiwan or human rights in the Soviet Union.

I now turn to arguments which have been put forward on the other side.

It has been said by those who support the treaties that the original 1903 Agreement was unjust, that we cleverly manipulated a local rebellion for our own larger purposes, participated in the division of another nation in flagrant violation of our own treaty obligations and then signed a treaty written by a representative of the new nation who had a personal financial interest in the arrangement and which represented a form of blackmail. All true. And yet this is not, in my view, the decisive reason for the new treaties. We should not support the treaties out of guilt.

It has also been said by those who support the new treaties that if we fail to ratify, and continue to insist on the 1903 pact, there will be violence. Also true, but this also is not a decisive reason for the new treaties, as I see them. We should not support the treaties out of fear.

We should support the treaties because they are right. In searching for the decisive reason for the new treaties we should, I think, look to the future, not to the past.

I think I comprehend the real reason for the reluctance and concern of opponents of the treaties. They are apprehensive, not only about the specific case of the Canal but in a broader way because they are tired of what they conceive to have been the American withdrawals and retreats elsewhere around the world in recent years. But Panama is scarcely the time or place for a demonstration of resolve and strength. It is the classic mistake from which international conflicts have emerged in the past, to become persuaded that it is either us or them, and that if we conceded on this particular issue, our ability to defend our interests elsewhere will be forever in jeopardy.

Such us-them conflicts over land are relatively rare on the agenda of issues which trouble international relations in the late 20th century. There are not now a large number of conventional clashes of nationhood over specific pieces of territory in the world today. However, those that do come to mind such as the West Bank of the Jordan bear an ominous similarity to Panama. Each could deteriorate into useless but serious violence.

I am convinced that the world in which we live is in a process of rapid change. The challenges to our diplomacy today are less and less the zero-sum conflicts of separate, national interests. The great issues facing mankind now are issues which call for cooperative solutions.

The real challenges of our age are the challenges of global poverty, of the threat of thermonuclear devastation, of the probability of recurring regional conflicts, of the prevalence of political torture and, of the nature and strength of democracy.

A new treaty relationship with Panama will not solve any of these problems. What the new treaty relationship with Panama will do, however, is to open the way for us to exercise the responsibilities of leadership which are thrust upon us by our own power, prestige and resources and which no other nation in the world is equipped to discharge. Panama, in this sense, is a symbolic issue, testing in a way which other nations cannot fail to notice the sort of nation we are in this last quarter of the twentieth century.

For those who fear change, there are reasons enough to oppose the new treaties; for the timid and the uncertain, the arguments are close at hand why we should stand on our ancient privileges. I hope, and sometimes I even trust, however, that this is not the dominant mood of this country today, that we are, now at least, prepared to look to the future and not to the past, that we can welcome change and embrace it and that our policy in the world is built of strength, essential morality, and confidence in ourselves and our future.

In a material sense, these treaties do much for Panama, and little that is tangible for the United States. What we do gain, however, is an enhancement of our stature in the world. This is an action which will say to others that we can be sensitive to their needs, that we are prepared to promote our vision of a world order of nations with respect for the rights and interests of others, that our policy is cooperation and not domination or confrontation, and that we have the self-confidence and inner strength to apply these principles to our future conduct throughout the world.

STATEMENT OF PETER VINCENT BAUGHER

Mr. Chairman, and Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations: I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you to urge that the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the proposed Panama Canal treaties.

INTRODUCTION

My name is Peter V. Baugher. I am a Chicago attorney and a member of that city's Council on Foreign Relations. I also serve on the Republican National Committee's Advisory Council on National Security and International Affairs and am Chairman of the National Governing Board of the Ripon Society, on whose behalf I am testifying this morning.

Founded in 1962, the Ripon Society is a national Republican research and policy organization which takes its name from Ripon, Wisconsin, the birthplace of the GOP. It has sixteen chapters across the country and members in all 50 states. The Society encourages young men and women to participate actively in public affairs. The Society also works to formulate the kind of sound programs that will enable our Party to better fulfill its potential for constructive political leadership. We believe that we can help the GOP to identify and claim the issues of the future, to raise the questions others will not ask, to grasp ideas whose times are yet to come. Above all, the Ripon Society seeks to serve as a spokesman for the progressive Republican tradition whose integrity and vision have inspired the GOP throughout its history.

Over the past fifteen years the Ripon Society has studied and taken positions on many issues of major public importance. Few matters have commanded as much attention, or aroused as much controversy, however, as has the debate over these treaties. And perhaps this widespread interest and concern is a good thing; for the agreements now before this Committee bear not only upon our military security and commercial well-being, but also on our future relations with Latin America, and on our capacity to deal fairly and wisely with a nation which, though far smaller and less powerful than we are, is motivated in this instance by the same legitimate aspirations that moved our forebears to action just 200 years ago.

UNITED STATES INTERESTS IN THE PANAMA CANAL

Since September you have heard from a broad range of witnesses whose opinions about the treaties and general political outlooks have spanned the spectrum. Each has had his own point of view, his special message to convey. As these lengthy hearings draw to a close, it may therefore be useful to return to the beginning—to a practical assessment of how in the decades ahead we can best protect our interest in the free, neutral, and efficient operation of the Panama Canal.

As the members of this Committee are aware, the Canal is in many respects a declining asset. Constructed at the beginning of this century, it faces increasing competition from alternative modes of transportation (such as railroads, trucking, airplanes, pipelines) and is too small to accommodate the oversized ships now being built. Neither the supertankers upon which America depends for its petroleum supply, nor the giant aircraft carriers on which we rely in part for our military security can move through the Canal. Moreover, as a product of the technology of 1914, and because of its enormous fixed investment in that technology, the Panama Canal suffers the economic disadvantage of having few opportunities to effect savings based on the introduction of new equipment and engineering discoveries.

Nonetheless, it is obvious that our stake in this waterway is substantial and will remain so in the future. Its strategic importance was demonstrated at the time of the Cuban missile crisis when U.S. Pacific fleet warships entered the Caribbean on short notice by means of the Canal, and throughout the Vietnam War during which (at its peak in 1968) nearly 70 percent of all American cargo support for Vietnam traveled across the isthmus. We do it further should be stressed, have a two-ocean Navy. In recent years the number of commissioned naval ships has decreased significantly, and the ability quickly to deploy Pacific Ocean vessels in the Atlantic and move Atlantic ships to the Pacific is essential if we are to meet our international responsibilities and defense objectives.

As for our commercial interest in the Canal, the percentage of total U.S. foreign trade that passes through Panama is relatively small. It is, nevertheless, a sizable amount in absolute terms and has a disproportionate impact upon our balance of trade since two-thirds of the Canal's American tonnage are exports. Despite the fact, finally, that the nations of Central America and the western coast of South America ship an especially large proportion of their foreign trade through the Canal, this country is the origin or destination point of well over half of all of the Panama traffic (traffic which is now being heavily augmented by shipments of surplus crude oil from Alaska to Gulf and East Coast ports).

The United States thus has a vital interest in ensuring that the operation of the Canal remains open, reliable, and secure. It is this interest which cannot be compromised—and which we believe the new treaties will advance.

For a variety of geopolitical and economic reasons we also have a special interest in strengthening our ties with the nations of Latin America and the Caribbean. Our hemispheric neighbors have expressed their support for the Panamanian's efforts to gain control over the Canal in the United Nations and Organization of American States, as well as in numerous bilateral statements and private communications. Rightly or wrongly, many Latin Americans regard America's continued presence in Panama as a vestige of colonialism and the Canal as the fruit of gunboat diplomacy. Whether we like it or not, the ratification contest now under way has become a test case for our inter-American relations: to reach a mutually satisfactory and sustainable new accord with Panama will not assure success elsewhere, but to adopt what is, at least in Latin American eyes, an intransigent posture here will certainly impede any progress that might be hoped for in other arenas.

THE NEED FOR A NEW RELATIONSHIP WITH PANAMA

Many Americans have come to associate our interest in guaranteeing the continued efficient operation and defense of the Panama Canal with the specific arrangements established by the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 (as modified in 1936 and 1955). In our view, though, and in the view of four successive Presidents—two Republicans and two Democrats—a treaty relationship with Panama of the sort now under consideration will better serve the long-term security and foreign policy of the United States.

The existing treaty arrangements between this country and Panama are out of step with contemporary realities. However we in the United States may look upon the 1903 Treaty, the rest of the world and especially the nations of this hemisphere do not acknowledge it as an equitable and freely negotiated agreement. Fervent, internationally-supported opposition to the present arrangements could readily threaten the peaceful operations of the Canal and jeopardize its reliability. The Canal will always be highly vulnerable to acts of sabotage, terrorism, and popular disturbances occurring within Panama, and our refusal to accept an altered role in its management could well result in a stream of incidents seriously harmful to the United States. Absent a restructuring of U.S.-Panamanian relations, this country could be faced with a sabotaged Canal, a repeat of the bloody 1964 riots, and perhaps a new and hostile Panamanian government. Under such circumstances negotiating a new treaty might prove impossible, and employing our armed forces to secure the Canal, even if militarily successful, could entail unacceptable costs to our foreign policy generally.

This is the practical problem. To insist on the perpetuation of the current treaty arrangements would mean that over time we would almost surely be compelled to fall back on the use of force as the ultimate basis for our presence. As Henry Kissinger commented earlier in these hearings: "This we should be prepared to do when our vital interest can be defended in no other way. But this is not the case here because the [pending] treaties give us a clear, and on balance a better, alternative."

ADVANTAGES OF THE NEW TREATIES

Aside from concern for Latin American and world opinion, why are the proposed treaties, as Dr. Kissinger says, a better alternative? To begin with, under the draft agreements the United States will remain in possession of the Canal and in full charge of its management and defense for the remainder of this century. We will continue to direct operation of the Canal, and our military forces will continue to provide for its defense from within Panamanian territory. At the same time, the new treaties contemplate a cooperative working relationship with Panama that will enhance our ability to protect and operate the Canal, permit an orderly transition from foreign to local control, and increase Panama's stake in the long-term prosperity and neutrality of its greatest national resource.

As the year 2000, when custodianship of the Canal is transferred to Panama, Article IV of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal becomes controlling. The Neutrality Treaty reaffirms the legitimacy of America's interest in the security of the Canal and sets forth the legal obligation of both Panama and the United States to maintain a permanently neutral waterway. The Treaty, moreover, describes neutrality (Articles II and III) in terms of concrete standards for the governance of the Canal which both parties are pledged to uphold.

Article IV makes the United States a guarantor of that permanent neutrality. It thus gives us a continuing right, which may be exercised unilaterally if necessary, to defend the Canal against any threats to its neutrality. And this same "regime of neutrality," and our rights and responsibility to support it, will (according to Article I) apply equally to any other interocean waterway that might subsequently be built across the isthmus. Furthermore, under Article V of the Neutrality Treaty, Panama relinquishes the right to invite or permit foreign military forces or installations anywhere in the Republic. This provision would forever prohibit Panama from allowing any other power to station military personnel on its soil. Panama's breach of that commitment would entitle and oblige the United States to take appropriate action to preserve the Canal's neutrality.

Finally, Article VI of the Neutrality Treaty provides that U.S. warships will be entitled to transit the Canal "irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination, armament or cargo carried," and that such vessels will have the right to go to the front of the line and receive priority passage in times of need or emergency.

We would not, in short, have a general right to "intervene" in Panama's internal or domestic affairs. Nor would we want such a right. But we would have under the new treaties the right and obligation to take such steps as may be required to guarantee that the Canal remains permanently neutral—free of the threat of foreign military presence and open always to the ocean-borne commerce of the world on a nondiscriminatory basis.

The new treaties will thus establish a far stronger legal underpinning and political environment for the protection of our most important interests in the Canal than could otherwise be achieved. We have retained all of the essential powers necessary to assure its security. Yet the pending treaties have the additional advantage of enlisting Panama, and (by means of the Protocol to the Neutrality Treaty) all of the nations of the world acceding to the Treaty's regime of neutrality, as our allies in pursuing this vital objective.

Most important, the new agreements provide the basis for an improved relationship between the United States and Panama founded upon cooperation, mutual respect, and our joint interest in the open and efficient operation of the Panama Canal. Were we redrafting these documents to suit our preferences, there are changes that we would make. The treaties—which were the subject of long negotiations over a period of thirteen years, and in which the United States was only one of the parties—are not, in our opinion, perfect. They do, nevertheless, embody a fundamental realignment in relations which we believe can satisfactorily serve as the framework for a mature and long-lasting settlement of our differences with Panama.

THE NECESSITY FOR CLARIFICATIONS

In supporting the ratification of these treaties we are relying on what seems now to be the unanimous interpretation of the provisions concerning (1) the extent of our right to "maintain the regime of neutrality" under Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, and (2) the effect of our right to "expeditious transit" under Article VI of that Treaty. Ambiguities in these sections have led to considerable public confusion and have given rise to dangerously divergent opinions as to the true meaning of the pending agreements.

While the specific wording of the critical portions of Articles IV and VI is admittedly—and, in our view, undesirably—imprecise, a fair reading of these provisions supports the explanations offered by the Administration: (1) that we have the right to act unilaterally to defend the Canal's neutrality, and (2) that expeditious passage means priority passage in wartime and the speediest possible transit at all other times. These interpretations are contained in the Statement of Understanding approved by President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14, 1977, a statement that was well-publicized in Panama before October 23 plebiscite and with which the Panamanian electorate can be presumed to be in substantial accord.

The American people, however, are entitled to expect that any international agreements as important as the ones now before this Committee will, as far as possible, be free from uncertainty about their meaning or intention. Accordingly, the Ripon Society recommends that the Senate attach an understanding to its resolution of ratification endorsing the Carter-Torrijos communique and explicitly adopting its formulation as the correct, authoritative, and legally binding interpretation of the provisions in question.

Such an understanding would not require renegotiation of the pacts or the holding of a second Panamanian referendum, as a matter of law, an understanding does not substantively affect the relevant contractual relationship but seeks merely to clarify it. Such an understanding, though, would have the full force of international law by virtue of Panama's necessary acceptance of the understanding as an integral part of the formal exchange of instruments of ratification. Conditioning the Senate's advice and consent on inclusion of this language in the official text should in no way delay or disrupt final enactment of the proposed agreements and will provide the citizens of this country with the straightforward confirmation of American rights without which the treaties could not, at this point, responsibly be approved.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE TREATIES

Treaty opponents have raised numerous objections to ratification of the new agreements. Some of these arguments have merit; all changes in policy have their potential perils, and in that regard this issue is no different from any other. Although the charges that Omar Torrijos is an incipient communist or a brutal dictator are seemingly unfounded, for example, there is no question but that his rule is authoritarian and likely to remain so. Similarly, while Panama's apparent progress lately in the area of human rights is encouraging, much remains to be done.

With help from the United States there is little doubt that Panama will be capable of marshalling sufficient technical expertise successfully to operate the Canal after the turn of the century. But it is also a fact that Panama is a small country whose economy has not yet recovered from the 1974 recession, whose economic programs have frequently had to be abandoned, and whose financial future is heavily mortgaged to foreign (principally U.S.) lenders. Integration of the Canal Zone into the mainstream of Panamanian life may also present real difficulties.

These circumstances, together with the concerns expressed by current employees of the Canal Company, make us apprehensive about the Panamanians' ability to manage the Canal efficiently and reliably and their willingness to work with the United States in furthering the best interests of this collaborative enterprise. The treaties are premised upon the kind of reciprocal relationship that should facilitate close cooperation, but the desire to cooperate must come from both sides if the transfer of authority is to be carried out smoothly. The prospective problems alluded to above are not insuperable. They will, however, warrant careful monitoring, and we should enter into our new relationship with Panama mindful of this reality.

Other objections to the Canal pacts are plainly spurious. Because of our obligation to maintain the regime of neutrality, it is sometimes claimed that even during a declared war we would be powerless to prevent our enemies' warships from sailing through the Panama Canal. But this misses the point. As several of the military officers appearing before you have explained, the critical strategic factor would not be our legal right to bar hostile passage, but our military capacity to prevent the enemy ships from reaching the Canal in the first place.

Doubts have also been expressed about the acceptability of the economic features of the agreements—specifically, the reference in Article XIII of the basic treaty to Panama's right until the year 2000 to receive (a) a royalty of 30 cents per ton of cargo transiting the Canal, (b) an annuity of $10 million per year, and (c) a cumulative additional amount of up to $10 million annually if revenues permit. These doubts can easily be satisfied. Payments to Panama during the entire time that we retain jurisdiction over the waterway will come from tolls paid by countries using the Canal rather than from the U.S. Treasury. No appropriations will be required, and no American tax dollars need ever be expended.

Finally, criticism has been made of the provision whereby the United States agrees not to construct a new canal in any country other than Panama. Why, it is asked, should we forego the right to negotiate the Nicaragua or Colombia, or any other nation, for the building of a new sea level canal? There are several answers. Under Article XII(2) of the initial treaty Panama has in exchange for our promise given up the right to permit any power other than the United States (such as the Soviet Union) to dig a canal crossing its territory. More important, engineering studies comparing the various alternatives (most notably the 1970 report of the Atlantic-Pacific Interoccean Canal Study Commission headed by former Treasury Secretary Robert B. Anderson) have all concluded that the most suitable routes lie in Panama. What is more, the cost of the conceded favorite of these routes was recently estimated by the Canal Company's accountants at $5-6 billion. At an interest rate of 7 percent the carrying costs alone for construction of this canal would be at least $350 million annually, double the current yearly income of the existing canal. No foreseeable increase in traffic or tolls could justify such an outlay.

The most pervasive and deeply felt objections to the treaties, however, stem from another source. Many Americans view the Panama issue against the backdrop of a succession of U.S. foreign policy setbacks in recent years. Still attempting to comprehend the Vietnam tragedy, these Americans wish to see an end to yielding and retreat by the United States. Many Americans who could not locate Panama on a map know beyond argument that U.S. enterprise and industry built the Canal against frightful odds, and that the U.S. has since maintained that waterway for the benefit of all nations. Why then, they wonder, should we now relinquish control?

We are sympathetic to these concerns. But the question of Panama is peripheral to our disillusioning post-war experience. It is the wrong issue to choose to demonstrate that we remain strong and resolute. Panama is the smallest and weakest of nations. We are not "giving" the Canal to Panama. We are, rather, assuring our ability to protect it. By acting positively now to modify our relationship with Panama—in an atmosphere free from crisis, and while we are still able objectively to assess the long-term risks and benefits—we will be demonstrating strength, not weakness. It is just this ability to distinguish between symbol and reality, to plan for future needs, and to take timely action to advance our basic interests that is the essence of a strong and effective global policy. As Secretary of Defense Brown has remarked: "The Canal is for shipping, not slogans."

In taking this position, we are unimpressed by the assertion that the U.S. owes anything to Panama by way of reparations for past injustices. The treaties should be judged purely on the basis of their projected impact on the interests of the United States and Panama. In the opinion of the Ripon Society the treaties mark a step forward, an improvement over what currently exists. They present us with an opportunity to modernize an outdated arrangement that has come to threaten the very purposes it was designed to promote. We believe that the agreements should be ratified.

CONCLUSION

The 1903 Treaty was the product of its era, a period of territorial expansion during which the U.S. emerged as a world power and American hegemony in the Caribbean became an indisputable fact. Panama's sweeping concessions to the United States were not unusual at the time. Britain, Germany, France, Belgium, and other countries were obtaining comparable rights in other parts of the world. But while most such colonial enclaves have disappeared in recent years—submerged in a tide of nationalism in large measure encouraged by us—the U.S. continues to enjoy its original status in the Canal Zone.

What is at issue in Panama, more than anything else, is our country's conception of its international role. Some Americans would pick Panama as the right place to "draw the line," to show the world that the United States cannot be pushed around. But this is to substitute pride, soured by the bitterness of past defeats, for reason. Building the Panama Canal early in the twentieth century was a great American accomplishment, requiring ingenuity and audacity. It was, as Senator Baker noted at the outset of these hearings, one of mankind's most memorable achievements, the moon shot of its day. Keeping it open and secure in the future, however, will constitute another impressive feat, one demanding both intelligence and tact.

Last fall the New Yorker published a cartoon in which one of the patrons of a local drinking establishment exclaimed to his bartender: "For thirty years I never thought about the Panama Canal. Now I can't live without it!" We have had an opportunity over the past year to think long and hard about the Panama Canal. In light of the many other foreign policy problems presently confronting the United States the time has come to resolve this matter and to turn our energies back to wider concerns of international affairs.

Mr. Chairman, based on examination of the agreements before you, we are satisfied that they are fundamentally sound and in the best interests of both this country and Panama. The Ripon Society therefore recommends approval of the treaties at the earliest possible date.

APPENDIX A

THE RIPON SOCIETY,
Washington, D.C., October 21, 1977.

To Republican Members of the United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: The Ripon Society urges you to vote for ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

We think it is important that any fruitful public discussion of the proposed treaties initially recognize that the Canal is becoming less intimately intertwined with our vital national interests, as it is of declining military and economic strategic importance. Neither the supertankers upon which America depends for its petroleum supply nor the 13 large aircraft carriers upon which we depend for our security, can fit through the Canal; our nuclear submarines do not use the Canal, and indeed, according to press reports, only 12 U.S. Navy ships transited the Canal in the four year period of 1971-75, and less than 7 percent of all foreign trade coming in or out of U.S. seaports passes through the Canal.

However, to the extent that our national interests are involved, we believe that the most significant factor compelling support of the proposed treaties is that ratification will maintain—if not enhance—our national security. The proposed Panama Canal Treaty reaffirms America's legitimate interest in the security of the Canal, for it expressly grants to the United States the right and obligation to be the primary defender of the Canal's security until the end of this century and to maintain the fourteen U.S. military bases in the Canal Zone.

On the other hand, we believe the arguments of treaty opponents to be without substantial merit. Their prime objection concerns the vague wording of Article IV of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (Neutrality Treaty), in which after December 31, 1999 and in perpetuity, the U.S. and Panama "agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established . . ." by the treaty. Contrary to the claims of treaty opponents, surely this phrase would suffice to provide the legal basis for any American military action on behalf of the Canal's neutrality, were that ever necessary. That the Neutrality Treaty would establish this adequate legal basis was clearly underscored in the October 14, 1977 Statement of Understanding between President Carter and General Torrijos. Indeed, as a practical matter, the United States has often relied on treaty language far less specific than that of the Neutrality Treaty to justify the use of U.S. military force around the globe in the post-World War II years.

Actually, the danger is not that ratification of the treaties will diminish our national security—but rather that failure to ratify would have just such an effect. Virtually every informed observer agrees that a U.S. rejection of the treaties would substantially increase the likelihood that left-wing Panamanian guerrillas would move quickly to sabotage the Canal or that internal political pressures would force the Panamanian Government to renounce the current treaty. And that the Canal is eminently susceptible to sabotage and is essentially indefensible has been admitted by the Chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff.

America's refusal to adopt the treaties could foment an international crisis. The United States could be faced with a sabotaged Canal, a repeat of the bloody 1964 Panamanian riots, and perhaps a new and hostile Panamanian Government. Under such circumstances, negotiating a new treaty could prove impossible; employing force to secure the Canal could prove disastrous to our image in the eyes of the world.

Ratifying the treaties and averting this specter would not, however, mean that the U.S. was being blackmailed by Panama. The treaties should be ratified because of their intrinsic merit. They will, as noted, contribute to the security of the Canal, but in addition their ratification will signal to all of Latin America that the United States is willing to implement its stated policy of regarding Central and South American nations as sovereign partners. Ratification will not erase overnight the lingering, effects of the Monroe Doctrine and Theodore Roosevelt upon American policy toward these nations. It will however represent a significant step toward achieving an enlightened relationship with those nations who have long regarded America's continued presence in Panama as a vestige of colonialism and the Canal as the fruit of gunboat diplomacy.

We are deeply concerned that the imperatives of ratification will be obscured by a jingoistic campaign. While there obviously are those who oppose the treaties for sincere but, in our opinion, misguided reasons, we are distressed by those who shortsightedly seek political advantage in protesting what is speciously termed an American "giveaway." A reasoned public debate about the merits of the new treaties would, we feel, convince a majority of Americans that ratification would be in the public interest. The impending emotional campaign could preclude this kind of debate and, we fear, cause an uninformed American citizenry to resist ratification of the treaties.

Republican Senators can take the lead in attempting to educate the public about the treaties and in advocating their ratification. This would surely enhance and broaden the appeal of the Republican Party as a whole. If instead Republican Senators become the critical and successful obstructionists to ratification, and if the Canal were sabotaged or some other crisis occurred as a result of American rejection of the treaties—a plausible turn of events—Republicans would doubtless bear the public blame. By voting to ratify the Panama Canal treaties, Republican Senators can avail themselves of a special opportunity to act in a responsible and enlightened manner—an action, we believe, that is in their and the country's best interests.

Respectfully,

GLENN S. GERSTELL,
President.

JANUARY 1978.

STATEMENT BY REV. JESSEE L. JACKSON

To The Foreign Relations Committee, U.S. Senate, Wednesday—January 25, 1978

MR. CHAIRMAN: The conclusion of a treaty between Panama and the United States which redefines the colonial relationship between our two countries and affirms sovereignty of the Panamanian government and people over the "Canal Zone" is an act that is long overdue.

The old relationship, which has been in existence for three quarters of a century, is an anachronism left over from the era of "gun-boat diplomacy." Along with U.S. domination of the Panama Canal Zone, the racist practice of segregation was imposed upon the Panamanian people. "White-Only" restaurants, gasoline stations and other public accommodations, segregated public schools, discrimination in employment and pay scales became part of everyday practice in the Panama Canal Zone under the protective arm of the United States military. Beyond the insult to the Panamanian people of having a foreign colonial enclave of special privilege inside the Panamanian Republic was added the insult of a humiliating system of Apartheid patterned in every detail after the Southern states of our country. Here is a classic example of racism and colonialism wedded under American military occupation.

The American flag flew over this zone inside the sovereign territory of the Panamanian Republic, and today a Panamanian living in this zone, when tried in a court of law, is tried in an American court. If found guilty, he has to appeal his case, not to the courts of the Republic of which he is a citizen, but to the Federal Court of the United States in Louisiana.

Those who are insisting that the present Panamanian government "honor" the old treaty of 1903 are to be reminded that the United States has a poor record of honoring treaties, especially as it regards the native American Indian population. We might add to this the Social Contract which the government had with the Black population of the United States as represented by the 14th and 15th Amendments, which were brutally and consistently violated in every Southern state from the period of the overthrow of Reconstruction, beginning in 1876, until the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This is undoubtedly one of the worst records of treaty violations to be found anywhere in the modern world.

It is a matter of historical fact that the Panama Canal Treaty of 1903 (The Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty), authorizing the United States to construct an interoceanic canal through Panama, was a treaty signed by the Secretary of State and the representative of a French Canal Construction Company. The Panama Canal is a magnificent achievement of engineering technology; however, the diplomatic history and political maneuvers associated with the building of the canal, which resulted in establishing United States colonialism in the Republic of Panama, are as sordid and disgraceful as the canal is magnificent.

Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe that we as a nation should never become so sinful as to commit the ultimate sin—the desire to own another nation. Even President Woodrow Wilson in 1915 called the nation's attention to the fact that the United States "had engineered a fake revolution in Panama as the pretense for securing the right to build the canal * * * and has alienated all of Latin America in the process." A responsible Congress, carrying out its oath of office of responsibilities to the people of the United States, should have responded to President Wilson's comments at that time by restoring the Canal Zone to the sovereign Republic to which it belongs. But nearly 50 years later, in 1964, United States troops, stationed in Panama as part of the Southern Command, were shooting down Panamanian high school students in the riots that resulted from their trying to raise the Panamanian flag on a flag pole in front of Balboa High School.

When we visited and spoke to the student body at Balboa High School last November, we saw a vivid example of the chauvinist attitudes that have poisoned the minds of our American students in the Canal Zone. Before the student assembly program began, the school band played the "Star Spangled Banner" but did not play the Panamanian national anthem. In this school English is the only language of instruction and there are only a token number of Panamanian students. A couple of miles away, but still in the Zone, is Paraiso High School for Panamanian students. All of them are bilingual, speaking Spanish and English. This year Paraiso High School is being closed. Its students will be transferred to Balboa High School, where instruction will continue to be only in English. The tragedy is that our American students are being taught attitudes of superiority that blind them to the great opportunity they have to learn another culture and grow in the process. In an age of growing internationalism, these students are being encouraged to be closed-minded and provincial. They undoubtedly get these attitudes from parents, and the public school officials have been impotent to correct them.

The demands coming from the Panamanian people and the government of Panama for a new treaty covering the Panama Canal Zone and the Canal itself leave the United States three options:

- (1) The United States can militarily occupy the Panama Canal Zone as a way of asserting its determination to reject the demands of the Panamanian people, or
- (2) The United States can follow, as it has followed, a "hard line" that is short of military confrontation but frustrates and alienates the people of Panama in their effort to reclaim sovereignty over an important part of their country, or
- (3) The United States can participate with representatives of the Panamanian Government in working out a new and just arrangement respecting the mutual self-interest of our two countries.

The first two options will not work toward any good end. A small nation determined to exercise its sovereign independent rights as a nation will eventually win in a military confrontation with an oppressor because world public opinion is on its side. It would be a wasteful misadventure to try the military option. Nor is anything to be gained by following the policy designed to frustrate and alienate the people of Panama. This would eventually alienate the whole of Latin America. So many countries—Costa Rica, Venezuela, Colombia, to name but a few—have their foreign trade tied into the operation of the Panama Canal that they regard the canal as a "natural resource" of the Latin American Continent and fully support their sister Republic. The third option, a new treaty of mutual respect and justice, is the United States' only viable course.

Mr. Chairman, in our visit to Panama we saw evidence of a developing nation of just 1½ million people supporting the effort of the Government to improve the general economic well-being. Reforms in health care over the past several years have expanded facilities into the rural areas for the first time; and the beginning of the development of the Cerro Colorado Copper Works will improve Panama's balance of payments condition and reduce unemployment. We were told about the considerable increase of students in higher education during this decade, especially in engineering, whose enrollment went from 300 students in 1970 to 5,000 today. New housing is being constructed for low-income families as this developing society comes to grips with acute housing shortages in the urban centers, a general characteristic of countries emerging from colonialism. The new governmental structure eliminates the old unicameral legislative body of 43 representatives, most of whom lived in Panama City. This has been replaced by redistricting the whole country into 502 districts; each legislator must live in the district from which he or she is elected. This certainly broadens the base of what we would call "representative government" and is an important reform.

There are also problems associated with the transfer of the Canal Zone to Panamanian sovereignty. There is reason to be concerned about the several thousand people who, it is estimated, will lose their jobs as the work force currently employed in the operation of this Zone is reduced in size. Many of these are black Panamanians, whose families first came to Panama from the English-speaking West Indies at the turn of the century, when the Canal was being built. They have historically formed a kind of middle stratum among the work force, in that they did not enjoy equal pay with white Americans working in the Zone but generally had a higher income than the average Panamanian family in this semi-colonial country. These Black Panamanians are also apprehensive about the possibility that racist attitudes will be revived in this situation. General Torrijos discussed very frankly with our delegation certain judicial procedures that are viewed as repressive by some, in that certain capital crimes are handled in military courts rather than in the civilian judicial system. He was proposing to the executive council changes in the procedure that would remove such cases from the military to the civilian courts.

So there are problems, but they are problems that only a sovereign government, fully in charge of its national territory, can fully address. They are not problems that need to preoccupy the U.S. Senate as it deliberates ratification of the treaty. After all, we have 10 million unemployed in the United States, and the estimated 400 thousand people in jail in our country (of which about 80 percent are Black youth) represent one of the largest prison populations in the Western world. I want to take this occasion to appeal to President Carter, in the interest of human rights, to use the power of his high office to open up a full investigation of prison conditions in the United States and the causes which have resulted in such a high percentage of Black youth among the population in jail.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure we all realize that the Panamanian people, like all people, have a history. The body of national experience which has been theirs includes experience with the arrogance of colonialism and exploitation by foreign multinational corporations. The Panamanian national experience provides them with a set of definitions that may differ substantially from some of our own. For example, the term "dictator" carries a connotation that is sinister to the people of our country. It is unfortunate but true that the foreign policy of the United States is frequently found in support of dictatorships in Iran, Chile, and Nicaragua, and a racial dictatorship of "white minority rule" in Southern Africa, to name only a few examples.

To the Panamanian people, on the other hand, given their national experience, a dictator may simply be a leader of sufficient strength, power, and character not to be overthrown or bought off. Given this operational definition, it is obvious they would prefer a Panamanian "dictator" to a CIA "democracy." For them the single overriding concern is the restoration of sovereignty over the Canal Zone and the removal of this insult to their national dignity.

Mr. Chairman, in the recent visit of our PUSH delegation to Panama, we met with religious leaders, like Monsignor Marcos McGrath, the Catholic Archbishop of Panama (Panama is a predominately Catholic country); Rabbi Kepfisz; Baptist clergy; student leaders; trade union leaders; as well as leaders of the Panamanian Government, including President Demetrious Lakas, Chief Justice Juan Materno Vasquez of the Supreme Court of Panama, and General Omar Torrijos Herrera, the Panamanian Chief of State. The determination of the Panamanian People at all levels of society to restore Panamanian sovereignty over the Canal Zone, as well as over the operation of the Canal itself, should not be underestimated.

The people of the United States, if provided with the facts, will also support the ratification of the treaty in overwhelming numbers. The Senate should act in this matter with integrity and with confidence that the people of our country will support the correcting of this injustice done to the Panamanian people.

What of the United States citizens who have been living and working in the Canal Zone? Their future is in the exercise of one of two choices—to return to the United States, the country of their citizenship, or apply to the Panamanian government for permission to continue to live in Panama.

The new Panama Canal Treaty should be ratified by the United States Senate, and without a lot of crippling amendments designed to embarrass not only President Carter and General Torrijos, but also the Panamanian people who have ratified the treaty in a national referendum. Indeed it represents both a morally and a politically sound effort at correcting an historic injustice. The assumption that the United States can own property in another sovereign country "as if in perpetuity," as the old treaty provides, is so inconsistent with the realities of today's world that it is ridiculous. So is the idea of the United States' holding the unilateral right to militarily intervene in Panama's affairs whenever it feels the "neutrality" of the Canal is endangered. That is another example of North American chauvinism and an inclination to assume the costly and presumptuous role of world policeman.

It is in the national interest of our country that just and civilized relations with the people and government of Panama be established. The United States-Panama Treaty of 1977, signed by President Jimmy Carter and General Omar Torrijos Herrera and providing for changes in the operation of the Canal and in the status of the Canal Zone, is a positive and welcome step in that direction.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE ROBERT E. BAUMAN

Mr. Chairman: Thank you for permitting me to appear before you today. I returned on January 11th from a week long trip to the Republic of Panama and the Panama Canal Zone which I visited in my capacity as a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives. My purpose in testifying before your committee today is to add to the considerable store of information which I am sure you have already received from previous witnesses regarding the Panama Canal Treaties.

I will not belabor the several major and more sensational points which have been debated thoroughly in public. However, I am convinced after an extensive trip through the Republic of Panama and the Canal Zone and after discussions with more than 150 officials and employees of the Canal Zone Company, U.S. Military, the government of the Republic of Panama as well as everyday citizens in Panama and the Zone that the whole story of the adverse impact of these treaties is not being told in the United States.

Let me concentrate first on the economic aspects of the Treaties. As you know, article XIII of the Treaties requires that the United States pay approximately $40 to $60 million annually to the Republic of Panama for the use of the Canal. I am sure that by now you are familiar with the equation which the Treaties provide including 30 cents per Panama Canal net ton for each toll-paying vessel going through the Canal. This 30 cents per ton will be indexed to the U.S. wholesale price index for manufactured goods and adjusted bi-annually. A fair estimate is that Panama will receive $40 million a year from this payment.

In addition, Panama will receive a $10 million annuity each year as compared to the current $2.2 million under existing agreements. In addition, an annual amount of up to $10 million per year will be paid to the Republic of Panama if the Canal operating revenues permit this. This contingent payment is a point that needs greater elaboration.

It was made clear to me in extensive discussions with Governor Harold Parfait of the Canal Zone and with a number of other officials of the Panama Canal Company that the single most important function aside from management of the traffic through the Canal is the maintenance of the existing equipment and structures. We are dealing with a 70 year old facility which requires not only regular maintenance, but preventative maintenance as well. This point was brought home to me during my travels through the Canal by boat, by helicopter and in my inspections of the locks and operating facilities.

Whether or not Panama receives the second $10 million payment is apparently open to question so far as American officials are concerned. The fact is, in my extensive discussions with the Panamanian Planning and Economic Policy Minister, Nicholas Ardito Barletta, it was made clear to me that the Panamanian government expects to receive the full $20 million payment which article XIII suggests each year beginning immediately upon the effective date of the Treaties.

Mr. Barletta also made it clear that he believes the tolls policy followed by the United States since the construction of the Canal and which consisted of charging only those tolls which constitute sufficient annual funding to operate the Canal and pay off indebtedness, was mistaken. He pointed out to me that in the Panamanian view, if tolls had been increased to meet inflation that had incurred since 1914 when the Canal began operating, the tolls would be 200 to 300% higher. He also said that if the tolls had to be increased the Panamanian government saw nothing wrong with requiring those increases.

In discussions with Canal Company officials, it was repeatedly emphasized that the cost requirements of Canal maintenance would not permit the payment of this second $10 million annually. Governor Parfait has estimated in previous testimony and repeated to me that last year alone, $65 million of the total Canal Zone operating budget of $163 million was devoted to maintenance alone. If a mutual agreement cannot be reached as to whether money shall be used for maintenance or diverted to finance payments under article XIII this will be a source of constant aggravation between the parties. In the Panamanian view, they are due the full payment and when they obtain sovereignty over the Canal Zone it will be difficult to dispute them. Maintenance could undoubtedly take a backseat to payments. If indeed Panama does receive the full amount of the proposed payments it will mean an annual income to Panama of $75 billion over a 20-year Treaty life.

But there are other costs that will accrue directly to the taxpayers of the United States and which are hidden in the Treaties agreement as well as in implementing legislation yet to be submitted to the Congress. We are all aware that the U.S. government has entered into a corollary agreement to provide the tune of $295 million. In addition, the United States has agreed to provide military sales credits in the amount of $50 million. I might add that much of this will be used to beef up the Guardia Nacional in Panama which maintains the dictatorship of General Torrijos the presence of which is obtrusive during the time any foreigner spends in Panama.

In addition, the treaties provide that there will be transferred to the Republic of Panama over a period of time, immediately in some cases, a period of 30 months in others, Canal government services and facilities valued annually at at least $100 million or $2 billion over the life of the treaty. These services include oil bunkering and other facilities, housing, commissaries, theatres, retail stores and restaurants, service and recreational facilities.

Six months after ratification, 148 square miles of the Canal Zone's 372 square miles will be transferred to the Republic of Panama and at a conservative estimate of 10 cents per square foot or $4,356 per acre for prime real estate, this means that Panama will receive lands valued at at least $1.1 billion.

If one takes into account the value of the Panama Canal itself and adjacent improvements which will eventually come under the complete control and ownership of the Republic of Panama if these treaties are approved, another $3.6 billion can be added to the amounts Panama will receive.

In addition, the replacement cost of military installations which will be surrendered and transferred to the Republic of Panama immediately will be at least $1.5 billion.

My calculations do not include the fact that at present the operation of U.S. military installations and the Panama Canal company organization and their employees are estimated to provide in excess of $250 million annually in spending which benefits the Panamanian economy. This will be increased considerably because of the transfer to Panama of many of the facilities which provide services to the Canal. The new operators can then charge for such services as they see fit.

I think a word should be said at this point regarding the attitude of the government of the Republic of Panama toward those portions of the Canal Zone and the facilities which they will receive from the U.S. either immediately, or within a period of 30 months under the terms of the treaties.

After talking to Minister Barletta, it is plain to me that the Panamanians perceive this property and these lands as a gold mine to be stripped for the benefit of the Panamanian government and, one supposes, the people of Panama, though the history of the current regime certainly does not guarantee that those benefits to the people will follow. Minister Barletta made it plain that extensive plans are underway for the use of the money which Panama will receive. He presented me a 42 page document which explained in some detail these grandiose plans. Officials of the Canal Company made it clear that if the economic feasibility of these projects were as great as the Panamanian government supposes, they would have been developed by the Canal Zone government by now as a means of generating income for financing the operations of the Canal.

These plans include diversion of canal funds to Panamanian government projects once the treaties are ratified and include several sugar mills, a fishing port, container ports, an oil terminal, copper mining development, a cement plant, and expanding tourism.

In addition, it was estimated by Minister Barletta that the money can also be used for the expansion of Tocumen International Airport at Panama City which has been under construction for some time and is well behind its deadline for completion. Other funds will go to building the last remaining portion of the Pan-American Highway through the Darien Gap.

In talking with a number of officials of the Panamanian government as well as Panamanian and American businessmen in Panama, I do not think that members of the Senate or the House can take any great comfort in the ability of the Panamanian government to carry out these projects although we can certainly rest assured that the money that the canal generates will be demanded and taken by the government.

During the nine years of the Torrijos dictatorship, there have been a number of projects which have either fallen behind in their construction or have failed to come to completion. Among these are the airport which I mentioned, a major hydroelectric project which has yet to go on line though it is much behind in its planned operation date, several sugar mills, the Contadora Island resort, agricultural development programs and mineral and natural resources development. I would also cite the failure of a proposed public transportation system, particularly in the Panama City area. I heard from a number of Panamanians the woeful fate of several hundred buses purchased by the Torrijos government from Spain two or three years ago. Most of them now sit empty in parking lots because of lack of maintenance and the inability of the government to provide parts and labor.

Solely on an economic basis, I would predict that if indeed these treaties are ratified in their present form, we can expect rapid deterioration of the Canal and its facilities because of lack of maintenance since funds will be diverted from capital improvements to the uses of the government of Panama. I need not dwell on the inefficiency of the "double veto" system of government provided under the treaties under which either party can easily block the action of the other.

Now let me turn to the question of what this treaty is going to cost the taxpayers of the United States. The philosophy of the United States government in operating the Panama Canal since its beginning in 1914 has been to extract from the levy of tolls on canal transits only enough money to operate the canal and its facilities without making any great profit. In the last few years—although the situation has changed for the better over the last few months—the Canal has been losing money because of a combination of factors. As a result certain interest payments to the U.S. Treasury have been suspended by the Panama Canal Company as is permitted by law. We were told repeatedly by Mr. Linowitz and Ambassador Bunker in their testimony before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee last August that there would not be any additional costs to the United States and our taxpayers if these treaties go into effect. Secretary Vance in testimony has stated that payments to Panama will be completely derived from canal revenues and therefore “the treaties require no new appropriations nor do they add to the burden of the American taxpayer.”

I would like to disagree emphatically with those assertions. It is unfortunate that this type of misleading statement has been part of the propaganda campaign in support of the treaties. In truth the American taxpayers are going to be asked to ante up millions for the next 23 years if Canal operation is to be assured, but they will lose control and sovereignty over the canal.

What else will the taxpayers lose? There will no longer be the approximate $17 million annual payment to the U.S. Treasury from the new Panama Canal Commission for interest on the U.S. government's past investment. Over the life of the treaties the taxpayers will lose $340 million which otherwise would have been paid to the Treasury. In addition, in a slick bookkeeping arrangement the Panama Canal Company will transfer to the U.S. Department of Defense for payment by the U.S. taxpayers an estimated $66 million annually for schools, sanitation, fire and police protection, customs, health, postal and other services which are now provided by the Canal Company. This will mean an additional cost of $66 million to the taxpayers to keep the Canal running or about $1.3 billion over 20 years of the treaty. These funds are currently paid out of the Canal revenues.

The U.S. Civil Service Commission estimates that the cost of early retirement of present Canal employees will exceed $135 million. And what will be the as yet uncalculated costs of transferring present facilities into the shrunken U.S. areas remaining? Or the cost of training Panamanians to take over U.S. jobs?

Lastly, it should be considered that even optimistic estimates hold that to finance the provisions of the treaty and related economic agreements there must be an immediate increase in tolls in the nature of at least 30% (which is the lower State Department figure) or 40% (which is the Canal Zone government figure.) In this regard the committee heard last week testimony from Mr. Brandes, who as you know has been commissioned by the State Department and the Panama Canal Company to study the matter of toll sensitivity. I am sure that I can not improve upon that expert study. But it is plain on its face that despite the assurances given to your Ambassador Bunker a large increase in tolls is going to be needed to finance the operation of the Canal. The alternative will be a demand from the Panamanian Government that the United States subsidize the operation of the Canal.

If that demand is made, I suspect the State Department will support it as several witnesses from the shipping industry did prospectively before your committee last week. The U.S. would then be confronted with a double dilemma. The taxpayers would have to cough up hundreds of millions of dollars to keep the Canal open and operating or the Canal would close. Such payments would be in addition to the 10 billion dollars I have estimated that the treaty already gives to Panama, and this equation does not even consider the increase in the cost of goods to American consumers shipped through the Canal once the tolls have been increased. I believe these figures demonstrate that there most certainly will be an additional burden placed on the American taxpayer.

This leads me to a suggestion that I really think your committee ought to consider. That is that all of the implementing legislation which will carry out the terms of these treaties, should they be ratified, ought to be demanded from the administration immediately. This implementing legislation should be before the Senate and House and all appropriate committees including the committee on which I serve in the House, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, before these treaties are ever brought up for consideration in the Senate. It makes no sense at all in my view to begin debate on the treaties when the economic terms and eventual costs these documents will produce are shielded from public view until after the fact of ratification. I am confident that if the implementing legislation is presented to Congress, the treaties will be in great trouble. In spite of the repeated assurances of the Administration that these treaties will not cost one additional dollar to the American taxpayer, the truth is otherwise.

There are many other aspects which I would like to discuss with your committee and its membership but I will leave such topics as the character of the Torrijos regime, my meeting with Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chief Panamanian negotiator, and questions regarding the U.S. right to intervene to a full report we will be submitting shortly to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House.

Once again, I thank the distinguished members of the committee for their courtesy.

STATEMENT OF JOHN P. SHEFFEY, COLONEL U.S. ARMY (RET.)

Mr. Chairman, Gentlemen, I am Colonel John P. Sheffey, U.S. Army (Ret.). My experience in Panama Canal affairs has been rather extensive—five years as the Secretary of the Army's Military Assistant for Canal matters, five years as the Executive Director of the President's Atlantic-Pacific Inter-oceanic Canal Study Commission, and three years in the Department of State as Special Advisor to the U.S. Canal Treaty Negotiator on an appointment that was terminated by the Department of State in 1974. Subsequently, I have maintained contact with the State and Defense negotiators and have followed the development of the current treaty drafts. However, I have no official capacity today and am here only in the hope that I can help contribute to your understanding of the canal treaty problem. I do not speak for the members of the National Association for Uniformed Services. Most of them strongly oppose giving up the Panama Canal and are not happy with my view that a generous new treaty with Panama is both necessary and unavoidable.

The record of your earlier hearings includes almost every known argument for and against ratification of the proposed treaties, and I will not repeat them. Instead, let me clarify a couple of issues in which I can claim expertise. Then I will attempt to frame the Panama treaty problem in its true political context and suggest what should be done.

First, as the former Executive Director of the $22 million sea-level canal study in 1965—70, I assure you that there are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new Isthmian canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama. The economic, technical and political objections to the far longer routes in Colombia and Nicaragua eliminate them from practical consideration. Limiting the choice of routes to Panama for the remainder of this century costs the U.S. nothing, and the treaty proposal for this prevents other powers' meddling in the matter.

The theoretically feasible routes in Nicaragua and Colombia are 140 miles and 100 miles in length, respectively, as compared with 40 miles or less for the Panamanian routes. The movement of large ships in narrow canal waters is a slow and hazardous operation. Ship operators would not readily accept the risk and time lost in transit. The construction and operating costs of these longer canals would be three or four times the cost of the shorter canals in Panama, and even the shorter Panamanian routes are not economically feasible at currently forecast traffic levels.

In the 1970 study, the Nicaraguan and Colombian routes were considered only for a sea-level canal constructed by nuclear excavation. Nuclear excavation is of questionable technical feasibility at best, and is politically infeasible beyond doubt. Conventional excavation costs on these longer routes were so great that they were not even estimated with any precision. Today's construction costs on either route would be in excess of $20 billion, and this could easily double by the time such a canal might be needed.

Certainly, the foreseeable traffic cannot support two Isthmian canals, and 95% of the world shipping projected for the year 2000 will still be of sizes that can pass the present Panama Canal. The 5% of superships that need a larger canal cannot possibly support its cost even in Panama. The military advantages of a relatively indestructible sea-level canal are attractive, but have not moved us to build one in Panama. They are far from sufficient to justify a $20 billion investment in a technically unsatisfactory and politically abrasive canal outside Panama.

The second issue that I want to address is that of alleged Administration pressures on the Joint Chiefs of Staff to agree to the treaties. The pressures were real and continuing, but certainly were not political threats to their careers. They were in the form of persuasion by the Secretary of State and the treaty negotiators as to just what was possible to negotiate, and ultimate acceptance by the JCS that control of the canal by a friendly Panama under an umbrella of U.S. defense would better serve U.S. defense interests than a canal controlled by military force exerted against a hostile Panama. This took a long time and involved many successive Joint Chiefs. In the years since 1962 when President Kennedy first made the tentative decision to negotiate a new canal treaty with Panama, the U.S. position has progressively softened in the face of repeated Panamanian refusals to accept the terms offered. President Johnson and his National Security Council sought 100 more years of U.S. control and defense of an Isthmian canal, along with the right to build a sea-level canal. Upon the rejection of the 1967 treaties negotiated with this guidance, President Nixon and his NSC sought 50 more years of control of the present canal and dropped the sea-level canal objective. A treaty drafted under these terms was rejected by General Torrijos in early 1972, and subsequently Secretary Kissinger persuaded President Ford and his NSC to accept less than 50 years of U.S. control and defense. President Carter and his NSC finally accepted the 23 years proposed in the current drafts in return for Panamanian agreement to the permanent U.S.-Panamanian guarantee of the canal's neutrality. All the civilian and military officials involved have been intelligent and patriotic men, and all have acted in what they believed to be our country's interests.

You should note, however, that in the proposed treaties the Panamanians have wholly accomplished their original objectives at the outset of the negotiations in 1964. The only compensation offered the U.S. for the $8 billion gift of the Canal Zone and sacrifice of its military position on the Isthmus is goodwill. Goodwill between nations endures only so long as their interests do not conflict. Unfortunately, the conflict of U.S. and Panamanian interests in the canal is permanent. The new treaties will change its impacts, but they will not end it. Obviously, the U.S. has not used its true negotiating power in this situation, and I'll try to explain why.

From the beginnings of the Good Neighbor policy in the 1930's, the Foreign Service professionals in the Department of State have increasingly believed that the U.S. should withdraw from Panama. Public support for this view until recently has been limited to a liberal minority; but it is a view consistent with the anti-colonialist foreign policy the U.S. has followed since World War I.

Throughout most of this period, U.S. retention of the canal was an article of faith in the Department of Defense, supported by an overwhelming majority of the Congress and the American people. However, this period has been marked by a wholesale retreat of the colonial powers from Asia, Africa, and the Mideast. We freed the Philippines and gave Okinawa back to Japan. Egypt took the Suez Canal from the British. U.S. policy makers chose to accept, for good reasons, a stalemate in Korea, compromise of the Monroe Doctrine in Cuba, and abandonment of our objectives in Vietnam. We have castigated our own leaders for undemocratic actions in support of our interests in Iran, Greece, Chile, and elsewhere. Linkage of our position in Panama with this trend has been unavoidable. Equally unavoidable is the symbolism of the canal as a place for the U.S. to take a stand and stop its worldwide retreat.

If modern history has any lesson for us to apply to the Panama situation, it is that retention of overseas possessions and democratic treatment of the local inhabitants are utterly incompatible. While the Canal Zone is technically not a colony, Panama has been a U.S. satellite for all practical purposes. U.S. control of the canal and maintenance of this relationship are inseparable, but what U.S. President would now send in the CIA to topple Torrijos and replace him with a U.S. puppet?

Panama, her Latin neighbors, and our Communist and Third World critics long ago recognized the contradictions in the U.S. position in Panama, and they have played upon them so skillfully that our own policy makers, including the Joint Chiefs, have accepted that the Panamanian cause is a just one, and it would be in the best interests of the U.S. to end the tensions of our present relationship by giving up the canal and our military bases on the Isthmus. All have concluded that the ruthless actions that would be required to hold the canal are no longer feasible. The President and the Congress will not order them; and in the long run, they wouldn't work anyhow. Torrijos has been created by the situation in Panama, and the next Panamanian leader and the one thereafter will be equally determined to take possession of the canal. The world has changed since 1903. The U.S. today cannot use the methods of our "manifest destiny" days when we were assembling our empire. A foreign policy that requires shooting the natives who get in our way is no longer acceptable at home or abroad. This is the real issue in the Panama treaties. Our desire to adhere to our democratic principles and live by the golden rule in Panama has run head-on into the historical policies that made the U.S. great and powerful. Our current policy makers are acting in support of our principles but a vast number of Americans instinctively fear that the new Panama treaties are one more step in the decline and fall of the American empire.

There is no wholly satisfactory solution to the canal problem. The proposed treaties present a Hobson's choice between existing problems in our relations with Panama and a host of new ones. Our presence in Panama is not comparable with our bases in Germany or Japan. In those countries our presence is desired. In Panama it is not. A more applicable historical example would be the experience with the NATO line of communications across France. Common sense and our perception of France's obligations and self-interest gave no warning that de Gaulle would throw us out—but he did.

Every Administration since 1964 has attempted to negotiate terms acceptable to Panama that would continue to protect the irreducible minimum of U.S. interests in the canal. Unfortunately, from the time Kissinger became Secretary of State and Ambassador Bunker the treaty negotiator, all the signals to Panama were that we would make almost any concession to reach early agreement. Ambassador Linowitz's known views and short term appointment by President Carter were a similar signal: This gave the Panamanians unwarranted bargaining power in reaching agreement on the proposed treaties. Had these signals of U.S. softness not been made, the U.S. could have negotiated a more advantageous treaty that would have been acceptable to Panama. This now will be extremely difficult, if not impossible. However, the Senate is now faced with a decision that is far less complicated than the contradictory testimony before this Committee would indicate. There is no real choice of rejecting the treaties outright and maintaining the status quo. A U.S. show of force and determination won't change Panamanian goals or end worldwide support for them. The choice is only between accepting the treaties as drafted or advising the President that their broad concepts are acceptable, but some critical details must be changed. The U.S. can further delay making this choice, but in the end a treaty embodying the general principles of the proposed treaties is inescapable.

I believe only one aspect of the treaties creates an unacceptable risk to U.S. interests. That is the ambiguity of U.S. defense rights in Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty.

The argument that Panamanian self-interest will keep the canal open after 1999 is demonstrably nonsense. I have already cited the experience with the NATO line of communications across France. The experience with the Suez is more directly comparable. Egypt desperately needed Suez Canal revenues, but closed the Suez in the 1967 war and let it remain shut down for eight years. Our experience with the Berlin Corridor is another example of the futility of dependence upon goodwill. In any event, U.S. rights to take whatever action is necessary to keep the canal in operation must be so specific that they cannot be legally challenged by Panama. This is the surest guarantee that the U.S. will never be forced to use such rights.

Under the proposed treaties, an overt military threat to the canal would present no decision problem for the U.S. The problem would be in dealing with political closure after we have departed from the Isthmus. There are many scenarios in which hostility to the U.S. could develop in Panama. Suppose that sometime after 1999 another Cuba-type situation develops in Latin America, and the U.S. again must use the canal to deploy an assault force to protect its interest. The Panamanian government (or the labor union then controlling the canal operating force) does not support U.S. objectives, and the canal operating force goes on strike and closes the canal at the critical period when the U.S. needs it most. The Government of Panama gives lip service to its treaty obligations, but tacitly supports the strikers and makes only token efforts to terminate the strike.

Does the proposed neutrality treaty give us the right to bring in operating personnel and protective forces in these circumstances? Department of State lawyers claim that it does, but I very much doubt that General Torrijos would agree. In any event, neither side can be sure of what interpretation a future Panamanian government will put on the currently proposed treaty language, and our Presidents and Joint Chiefs of Staff after 1999 should not be handicapped by such vague wording, nor should an issue of such critical importance be in any measure dependent upon Panamanian goodwill.

We can live with the problem that are bound to come with the relinquishment of sovereignty and the transfer of Zone activities to Panamanian control. But there should not be the smallest shadow of doubt as to our responsibility and determination to insure that the canal is kept in operation. This is the one single duty to ourselves and the world that is more important than all of our other objectives in a new treaty with Panama. The world understands and accepts that great powers have such responsibilities. Doubt as to our intentions or will to act is what will invite trouble in Panama. Therefore, I recommend that the Senate advise and consent to ratification of the new treaties only with the reservation that Panama must agree that "in the event of any failure to keep the canal in operation and available to the U.S. and the world, unilateral U.S. action on Panamanian territory, aimed solely at restoring the canal to operation, would not be considered an act of war or intervention in Panama in violation of the Rio Pact and the UN Charter." This so-called derogation of Panamas' sovereignty is a small price for Panama to pay for the gift of the canal.

The recommended reservation is not a treaty change, and there is no constitutional requirement in Panama that it be voted upon by the Panamanian people. It is nothing more than a formalization of what General Torrijos as already stated in different language. If he were to refuse to concur in the reservation because it derogates Panamanian sovereignty, this would be a frank admission that Panama insists upon the right to deny the canal to the U.S. in some circumstances. In that event, the proposed treaties should not be ratified.

Thank you.

STATEMENT OF MR. EGON TAUSCH

The value of the Panama Canal to our national defense has been the subject of testimony by high-level military officials, active and retired. Some believe that the U.S. cannot be defended without the use of that waterway; others qualify such statements. But a recurring theme involves our ability to protect the Canal itself from local guerrilla activity or sabotage.

To judge this threat we have to know just how vulnerable the Canal is, under which conditions the Canal would be least vulnerable, and from what quarter we can expect danger. These questions are not only military matters; they are also technological and political.

The proposed treaties call for delivery of the Canal Zone to General Torrijos' government almost immediately after ratification with retention, by the U.S., of military bases within the Zone, and of practical control of the Canal itself until about the year 1990. If the treaties are not ratified, the U.S. retains control of the entire Canal Zone.

As long as the entire Zone is in the American hands there is little reasonable fear of guerrilla war with Panama. The tactical advantages adhere to the U.S., and the Panamanians are not interested in self-immolation.

Although large parts of Panama are jungle, the population is concentrated in the two major cities. Panama has never fought a war. The Guardia Nacional, which serves as both the army and the police of Panama, is 8,000 strong, almost all stationed in downtown Panama City, for political uses only. The Guardia doesn't like the jungle. The most committed fighters Torrijos has are the thousands of Leftist professional students, and these do better in romantic street demonstrations than in individual acts of sabotage or concerted struggles. The "martyrs" of the famous riot of 1964 were killed when a department store they were looting caved in.

Panamanians could be trained to fight—the U.S. Army has been trying to do this in jungle warfare schools in the Zone for years—but the probability, if war broke out, would be that Cubans would do all the fighting.

The analogy with Vietnam is valid, but not the way treaty supporters think it is. The crippling difficulty faced by the U.S. military in Vietnam was that geographic territory was irrelevant in that war. Fortifying towns or hilltops, though easy, was pointless; Vietnam remained a war of movement because the U.S. and Saigon forces had to maintain the offensive tactically in order to maintain political control. In the few instances when American installations were assaulted directly, the Vietcong and North Vietnamese attackers were slaughtered.

The Canal Zone, on the other hand, is only about fifty miles long and ten miles wide. Perimeters can be established and fortified. There are no "hearts and minds" to be won; only Americans live there. There are no Panamanian villages within the Zone to worry about, nor any reason why the frontier should not be cleared of vegetation for fields of fire. General Torrijos knows all of this. Difficulties would arise if and when the Zone were abandoned before the Canal was surrendered, and this is precisely what the new treaties propose to do.

The idea that the Canal itself, within an American Zone is vulnerable to sabotage by dissidents or guerrillas is based on ignorance of the physical structure of the Canal and on underestimation of 1910 technology. The Canal is not a complex, delicate mechanism. The locks are merely chambers built of solid concrete, with holes in the bottom through which the water passes by gravity when the valves are opened. The gates are steel, pivoting on posts, and locking under pressure of the water. The machine parts are simple, solid steel and brass, and every piece is manufactured in workshops on the banks.

The gates and valves are controlled from an electric table on the deck of the control house; if the table controls become inoperative, the circuits can be reconnected on a floor below; if these are destroyed, there are steam-operated controls within the concrete banks, and a final set of manual controls. Communication at the locks is by sight and voice—computers were installed, but found to be less effective than the old method and were discontinued. As few as eleven employees can operate the entire lock system. All of the original machinery is still functioning, though minor parts are replaced regularly.

There have been comments by the media to the effect that the Canal could be disabled by dropping a few hand-grenades into the locks. Actually, as I discovered by operating the locks myself and examining the entire structure, disabling the Canal would require aerial bombardment, or satchel charges placed at dozens of different locations—a project that would require almost complete control by hostile forces in order to carry out.

The greatest danger from guerrillas or saboteurs would occur only if the Canal Zone were abandoned by the U.S. before the waterway or the military bases.

Why ratification of such treaties would give the Panamanian government, or any of its people, cause to attack the Canal is a political and an ideological question.

By now Americans should have few delusions about the nature of the Torrijos regime. The General has exiled over 1,300 Panamanians and murdered over 500. He has bankrupted Panama with his mismanagement and socialist schemes. Private enterprise is paralyzed and unemployment soaring. Torrijos has blundered in and out of a soviet-style economy, reacting either to his own whims or to unknown foreign orders.

All political parties have been outlawed, but the members of each retain their hostility to Torrijos. This is true of the Arnulfistas, the Liberals, the Republicans, the Democratic Action Party, the Christian Democrats, and the new and growing Social Democrats. All maintain underground newspapers and masses of supporters. All stand against ratification of the treaties for fear of the power such treaties would give General Torrijos.

As the official organ of the Social Democrats has put it, "To change masters if not to become free . . . to oppose the United States only to fall into the hands of the Communist world is pointless." The political parties of Panama have announced that if any of them come to power they will immediately renounce the treaties. The Democratic Action Party states, "The Panamanian people still have the last word. A treaty signed with a dictatorship, without civil rights, will be of short duration and have at its origin the reasons for its prompt repudiation."

Obtaining the new Canal treaties is Torrijos' only hope for staying in power indefinitely; not because the Panamanian people want the agreements so badly, but because the American aid that comes with them will bail the dictator out financially, because the treaties will give Torrijos needed prestige among anti-American governments, and because the immediate disappearance of the Zone will increase the jurisdiction of his secret police, and give him a power base against the remaining U.S. presence.

He must maintain this hostility to remain in power. Ratification of the treaties will add to the motives for violence, and its probability of success. The proposed treaties do not give all American holdings to Torrijos at one time. Leftist students of the F.E.P. (Federation of Panamanian Students) have been demonstrating against the provision for American bases and against any American participation in the Canal during the transition period. Since the F.E.P. is an official government organization, its position should not be dismissed lightly. Torrijos profits sufficiently from the ratification of the treaties. Honoring his obligations under those treaties will gain him little more, and failing to do so might be the more prudent course.

On August 12, 1977, shortly before the proposed treaties were released, Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, chief Panamanian negotiator and friend of Torrijos who makes no effort to hide his Communist background and connections, made a significant speech at a closed meeting with the students of the F.E.P. The diplomat began with his usual Yanqui-baiting then got to the meat of his exhortation. Although the new treaties he helped bring about were necessary, he said, "there are still theories that we can get more, much more, through confrontation. I believe this is true." But those who oppose the continuing bases in the Zone should do the fighting themselves. "When they talk to me, I tell them to go to the Canal Zone and attack it. I have not yet met a revolutionary who asks the government for permission to attack any blasted thing." After the applause, Escobar Bethancourt added, "In the past, when we set the bombs against our oligarchy, when we challenged the regimes established in our country, we never asked anyone for permission. You have never asked anyone for permission . . . When one wants a confrontation, one puts his knapsack on his back, his bomb at the waist, and goes to stage the confrontation. This is not written in any book . . .

" . . . as General Torrijos has said: I prefer a nation of Castroite youths to one of castrated youths."

This incitement to violence was predicated on ratification of the proposed treaties by the U.S. Senate.

It is speeches like Escobar Bethancourt's which disprove the argument that Panama would have no reason to sabotage its own Canal when the treaties go into effect. There will still be differences between the Americans with their partial control and their bases, and the Panamanian Leftists. If the Canal is sabotaged after the Zone is lost, it probably will not be done by level heads in the Panamanian government, but by radical students whom that government has so incited for so many years that the economic value of the Canal means little to them.

Ratification of the proposed treaties would betray the majority of the people in Panama, give decisive support to a dictatorship, and invite violence—guerrilla war and sabotage—against the United States and the Panama Canal.

STATEMENT BY DR. GEORGE FOX MOTT

Mr. Chairman and members of your committee, I am here today on a matter of importance to me, to my clients, and, I believe, to our nation. The issue is one involving our government's primary responsibility to American citizens, and deals with the good faith and sincerity of a nation with whom we are now discussing new international treaties.

At this point, what you gentlemen want to know—and want I want you to know—is what this is all about.

There is a tract of land comprising some 1,000 square miles on the Caribbean coast of Panama. This tract, known as "El Nispero," was purchased in 1912 by a group of about 800 Americans incorporated as the Isthmian Timber Company. They bought at the open market price of $220,000 U.S., with clear title which went back to a grant from the King of Spain. These Americans saw a chance to develop and share in the development and growth of the new nation of Panama.

At that time Panama was a remote and primitive country with a population of 600,000. The Americans poured into their project all the resources they were able to harness, gradually, as they were able to do so.

In 1931, Panama brought suit to challenge title to the land. The Americans won in the local court and later, in 1936, in the Panama Supreme Court—this, incidentally, at a time when Panama was hoping for Senate ratification of the 1936 treaty. At the very time when the Americans' title to the land was confirmed by the Panama Supreme Court, Panama was moving illegally and secretly to take the property from the American owners by kangaroo court actions that made a mockery of justice. They were held in secret, and were not disclosed for the public record until two years had passed—until, indeed, after the U.S. Senate had ratified the treaty, in 1939.

Our legal counsel has advised that in his opinion the whole proceeding was void and therefore the property legally still belongs to our claimants.

As of this date, Panama has refused to do anything. The U.S. State Department has stated on the record that the whole matter is such an embarrassment to Panama that it should not be made public. "Don't call us," they said. "We'll call you."—and the call is never going to come.

The property was valued in 1937 at 130 million dollars. In 1942, the stockholders in desperation to salvage something out of their loss put a value of 6 and a half million on the property. That amount compounded at 6 percent since 1937 is now One Billion, 370 Million Dollars.

We have had the 1937 timber cruise reviewed by experts and the minimum value of the timber alone on today's market is 700 Million Dollars. There are exploitable quantities of gold, silver, platinum and copper in the land.

We should request of Panama that she demonstrate her good faith by righting the wrong perpetrated by public officials secretly and illegally wresting title from the American owners.

There are those who may argue that those actions were the actions of a prior regime. If the U.S. Senate accepts this argument, where will the United States be when the next regime says of these treaties currently under consideration—"They were the treaty of a prior regime and we have nothing to do with them."?

This, in highly condensed form, is what I am talking about.

May I add that the responsibility of our nation—indeed, the first essential duty and the first justification for any form of government since tribal times—is to provide protection to its citizens for life and property at home and abroad. In reality, all other functions are simply extensions of this basic responsibility.

This case is pertinent to your hearings because it parallels in a striking way the history of U.S.-Panama relations from the beginning—namely, from 1903 to 1978, as you will discover when you read the summary calendar comparison of events in our formal presentation.

Before I go further, Mr. Chairman, may I introduce my key associates? Our Chief Counsel, Mr. Royal E. Cabell, Jr., distinguished attorney of Richmond, Virginia; Dr. E. Y. Ham, political scientist with doctorate from the University of Wisconsin; and my associate-at-large, Colonel John T. Carlton, known to many of this committee as the longtime Executive Director of the Reserve Officers Associate, recently retired from that position, and my friend of 30 years.

As a matter of record, I also wish to tell you that on November 17 and 18, 1977 a copy of our full presentation including bibliography and other pertinent material was hand-delivered to each Senator and Congressman and receipts were obtained in every case. To my amazement on an issue of this magnitude, less than 10% of Senate and House members even made pro forma acknowledgement, and some of my close friends in The Congress, when queried personally, affirmed they had never seen nor heard of it. Of course, I understand, but it does suggest that staff are not tending the store and votes are being pressured before facts are known!

I should also like to say that though a press release was prepared and made available through normal media channels, including all the great newspapers, the national editor of two such—one in Washington and one in San Francisco—told me that pressures were being exercised to prevent this story from being told. (As the editor of a leading textbook on journalism, I ask myself, "When did we lose a truth-serving media? Of what value is the first amendment?")

At this point, Mr. Chairman, may I ask that our basic "White Paper," a copy of which is before each of you, be placed in the Congressional Record after this testimony? It should also be of record that complete sets of copies of supporting documents have been deposited with the Librarian of the Senate and of the House, and in Library of the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, at Stanford University.

I also ask that I may be allowed to provide additional data, if such information is desired by your committee or seems to be germane to the story of Panama and what her citizens and government have or have not done to develop her own resources in addition to subsisting on moneys and expertise from the United States. I request this consideration for a 30-day period after this hearing. Do I have your permission to provide such additions to your committee for information and consideration?

In this connection, I quote from a letter received recently from a Panamanian now resident in this country. Professor Gustav Anguizola, teaching at the University of Texas in Arlington, wrote:

I quote: "Panamanian courts are quite venal and this goes for the Supreme Court."

He says, also; "It is interesting that in the new treaty or treaties there is no proviso for a claims commission which might do justice to your clients."

I suggest to you that instead of conciliatory efforts, we try calling the shots. A good start would be to require return of this tract of land stolen from American citizens; or, at least, reimbursement to the claimants for their lost property. At compound interest—or at current value of the timber alone (something more than 715 Million Dollars)—it is quite a sum. And since the government of Panama is demanding enormous sums from us to go along with the gift of the Canal, let us stipulate that she uses some of this money to reimburse fully these American claimants.

In view of these considerations, I suggest further that before any treaty or understanding with Panama is formalized, either the property be officially returned by Panama to the claimants, or reimbursement to them should be made without further delay. Our claim in 1942 was $6,747,900.00. The value of the land and its timber and other resources can now be variously calculated, considering interest and the changed value of the currency, at from One to Two Billion Dollars U.S. Something a little over One Billion Dollars may be a reasonable claim.

We are not seeking "pie in the sky," but we feel that our clients are entitled to an indemnity which rightfully should come from Panama—unless the United States feels that the raising of the issue would be damaging to international relations, as the State Department has contended over the years. If at this juncture it behooves the United States of America not to embarrass a foreign power because of the wrongful acts of its highest officials—to the point that the United States is not willing to protect the rights of its citizens to have their property, it would appear that this is a cost which should be borne by the public treasury and not by the private investors. All of the claimants are people of conservative nature; nevertheless we feel that if this is the position of our government, then these claimants should be granted an indemnity by all of the people by way of a bill for private relief.

This is not a hypothetical issue. For unpaid taxes U.S. citizens go to jail. For unpaid reimbursement to American citizens someone is responsible. The United States Federal Government which was founded to protect the lives and property of its citizens has been negligent.

The evidence of this miscarriage of justice to private Americans is compelling. In view of our native penchant for generosity to foreign powers, is it not meet and proper that property plainly stolen by arch chicanery from American citizens be given equal billing?

After reading nine thousand clippings about the Canal treaties—pro and con—it is clear to me and to our group that money looms first and foremost in Panama's thoughts of the new treaties. Before we officially hand over to her further vast sums, with or without total control of the Canal, let us pay back a debt to some of our own people. Let us do it publicly and give the world clear proof that we still stand back of our citizens and that our American system of "freedom with responsibility" is a two-way street.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A REVIEW OF THE RECORD

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is now only a matter of days before the Panama Canal treaties reach the Senate floor for consideration. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will begin markup on the resolution of ratification on Thursday and I understand the Senate Armed Services Committee will be winding up its hearings in the next week or so. By now, many of our colleagues have expressed their position on the treaty issue, and the nature of the forthcoming Senate debate is becoming evident.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY REVISIONS

Little by little, the treaty modification concept has gained a following in the last few months. Some who once believed these treaties to be essentially perfect now admit to certain defects. Some who once denounced treaty revisions as impractical or unacceptable now appear resigned to accept them. In fact, in some respects, a "bandwagon" approach now appears to be underway.

When the junior Senator from Kansas first proposed treaty amendments and reservations in September 1977, there was no immediate surge of interest. By mid-October, however, controversy over defense and passage provisions was strong enough to necessitate a joint statement of understanding—a tacit admission by both the Carter and Torrijos administrations that the treaties required clarification.

Now, it is gratifying to note that both the Senate majority leader and minority leader have publicly endorsed treaty modifications. General Torrijos has expressed willingness to accept some Senate revisions. And 10 Members of the Senate have so far sponsored or cosponsored proposed treaty amendments.

Just this morning the Senator from Kansas understands the administration has indicated a willingness to accept some modification. Many more have publicly or privately expressed willingness to vote for treaty changes.

So there has been a lot of movement in that direction in the past 4 months, and it is an indication of recognition that these treaties are flawed. It is an indication that these treaties will not be ratified in the forms presented last September.

Perhaps it is also an indication that many of the Members of this body are ready to assert the proper constitutional role that Congress should play in the treaty-making process. What began as a modest effort last September to reinstate active congressional involvement in the international treaty-making function has set the stage for amendments to the canal treaties, and may well have set the pace for treaty consideration in years to come.

REVIEW OF EVENTS

Mr. President, I will briefly review the chronology of my activities relating to the Panama Canal treaty issue, so that it may be a part of the permanent record.

After a careful review of the two Panama Canal treaties which were made public on September 7, I determined that I could not support the accords in their present forms. On September 23, I introduced six amendments and two reservations in order to clarify and improve upon the treaties. My proposals address themselves to a number of issues, including defense and passage rights for the United States, the right to negotiate with any country for a new sea-level canal, extension of the transition period, reduction of toll payments to Panama, congressional approval for the transfer of U.S. property, and protection of human rights.

On October 5, I appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to elaborate upon my amendments and reservations, and submitted the text of a State Department cable which demonstrated beyond a doubt that American and Panamanian negotiators were giving different interpretations to certain vital provisions in the neutrality treaty. At that time, I commented:

There may be a few members who would just flatly oppose anything, but I don't know of anyone in that category . . . I believe that if the proper changes were made, the treaties would have widespread support.

Despite State Department intimidation efforts, I insisted upon the public's right to know about the dangerous ambiguities in the treaties.

On October 13, I advised the Senate of allegations that Gen. Omar Torrijos and other members of his family have been involved in drug-trafficking operations in the Western Hemisphere. The following day, I submitted a freedom of information request to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration requesting specific files which I still believe may contain information on this subject. Despite my repeated efforts to obtain these files, the administration has refused to turn over the bulk of Government materials on the Torrijos drug connection. Files have been withheld on the basis of national security and sensitive foreign policy matters. I now have an appeal pending with the Department of Justice on this subject, which certainly would expose some light on the integrity of the Panamanian Government.

Three days after the Carter-Torrijos statement of understanding was released, I introduced two additional amendments containing the identical language of that statement. I pointed out that "the joint statement, by itself, is not legally binding. And the joint agreement disproves the notion that renegotiation of certain treaty provisions is impossible." I have believed from the beginning that that statement should be made a part of the treaty language itself, and I am pleased that so many others are finally coming around to that point of view.

During late December, Senator Paul Laxalt and myself spent 2 days in Panama familiarizing ourselves with the operation of the Panama Canal, and discussing treaty provisions with local employees, civic councils, Canal Zone Government officials, and with General Torrijos. My earlier concerns about the treaties were reaffirmed as a result of that trip.

Most recently, on January 19, I introduced three additional amendments to the treaty which, in my opinion, will better protect our national interests in the area. These amendments would authorize a separate base agreement to permit U.S. retention of some military installations in Panama after the year 2000, and would prohibit the presence of any military troops or bases in Panama other than those of the United States and Panama—after ratification of the treaties.

FULL DEBATE INSURED

We can expect to see more treaty amendments and reservations introduced in the next few days. This is useful, for it insures that the Senate will give its most careful review to the details of the treaties. It also insures that there will be full debate on treaty provisions, along with efforts to clarify ambiguities and compensate for omissions. I look forward to continuing my longstanding efforts to insist upon substantive guarantees and protections within the treaties. I hope more of my colleagues will join me in those efforts.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DeConcini). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL—EXECUTIVE N, 95-1

AMENDMENT NO. 15

(Ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.)

Mr. DOLE, as in executive session, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to executive N, 95-1, the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

AMENDMENT NO. 16

(Ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.)

Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. Curtis, Mr. Garn, Mr. Helms, Mr. Laxalt, Mr. McClure, Mr. Thurmond, Mr. Eastland, and Mr. Allen), as in executive session, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Executive N, 95-1, the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Panama Canal treaties raise a serious constitutional issue that should be resolved before the Senate turns to the consideration of the merits of these agreements. The issue is whether the President of the United States has the constitutional authority to transfer U.S. territory in the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama by treaty alone, without the approval of both House of Congress.

Representatives of the State Department and the Justice Department argue that the President may make such a treaty because he possesses concurrent authority with Congress to dispose of American territory and property by treaty. Senate approval of the treaties, they insist, is all that is necessary in order to meet the requirements of the Constitution.

As a member of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which recently held extensive hearings on this constitutional question, I was somewhat surprised to learn that none of the State Department's legal advisers who testified before the subcommittee was able to cite clear and unequivocal judicial precedent in support of this novel interpretation of the President's treaty-making power. The testimony of Attorney General Bell, who appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was, in my judgment, equally deficient of valid judicial precedents that would justify this extraordinary exercise of executive power. What is more, there appears to be no prior instance in American history when a President laid claim to the existence of such concurrent authority.

In effect, then, the President is now claiming for himself a new power, a power to enter a legislative field which Congress has definitively and exclusively controlled since the creation of the Constitution. The Canal Zone was acquired in accordance with the terms of a 1902 statute passed by Congress known as the Spooner Act. By law, Congress authorized the President to acquire from Colombia perpetual control of the necessary lands for the construction of an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama. Acting in pursuance of this congressional authorization, the President negotiated the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Convention on November 18, 1903, between the United States and that portion of Colombia which became the Republic of Panama. In this manner did the United States acquire in perpetuity the rights to the territory now known as the Canal Zone, with sovereign and exclusive powers to administer it.

Since that time, the Canal Zone has remained an unincorporated territory of the United States. It is administered by the President of the United States, but only in accordance with enabling legislation enacted by Congress. This includes appropriation authority for its administration during the current fiscal year. Laws enacted by Congress have directed the form and substance of the administration and jurisprudence of the Canal Zone from the moment of acquisition to the present. In short, it is Congress which authorized treaty negotiations for the permanent acquisition of the land; and it is Congress which subsequently enacted legislation setting forth the legal status of the Canal Zone, establishing courts of justice, enacting civil and criminal codes, providing for defense, and appropriating money for the maintenance and operation of both the zone and the canal.

Moreover, all previous transfers of property in the zone under treaties with the Republic of Panama have rested on the solid foundation of congressional approval. In 1955, for example, when the United States entered into its most recent treaty with Panama, it was provided under article V that transfers of property were "subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress." It seems reasonable to me that if all previous transfers of real estate to Panama have occurred under the authority of Congress, that the transfer of the entire zone should proceed on the same basis; otherwise we are left with the dubious proposition that prior enactments of Congress authorizing the property transfers were gratuitous exercises in futility which the President was free to ignore. I am not aware that this peculiar notion has ever been adopted by Congress or the President in any negotiations with Panama prior to those that are presently under consideration. As recently as 1957, a representative of the State Department who testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee stated that legislation would be required in order to implement the transfer of all property in the zone.

Comes now the President, standing on an unprecedented and previously unexercised claim of "concurrent authority," asserting that he has the right to abrogate the power of Congress and repeal the entire statutory structure which Congress has developed since the beginning of the 20th century. If the Senate stands aside and allows the President to usurp the powers of Congress—as it has often done before—it will be preparing the way for further encroachments in the future.

In the first place, "The Panama cession will constitute a landmark which, should the State Department prevail, will be cited down the years for 'concurrent jurisdiction' of the President in the disposition of U.S. property. Acquiescence in such claims spells progressive attrition of congressional powers; it emboldens the Executive to make even more extravagant claims." Second, "it needs constantly to be remembered that a succession of Presidents have circumvented Senate participation in treaties of gravest import by resort to Executive agreements."

These are the words, Mr. President, of Raoul Berger, the eminent constitutional authority whose scholarly writings on executive privilege were so vitally instructive to the Congress when we confronted the Presidential claim of self-serving "precedents" upon which the executive branch relied for the purpose of withholding information. Today, the President seeks to circumvent the House of Representatives and gain approval for the disposal of billions of dollars worth of American territory merely by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. And what of tomorrow? How long will it be before another President seeks to dispose of other territories by an executive agreement—which is very similar in power to a treaty and does not require any congressional consent at all?

Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution states that—

The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States.

The courts have repeatedly ruled that this is an exclusive power of the full Congress. Any authority of the Chief Executive to dispose of U.S. territory, therefore, must first be derived from authority given by an act of Congress.

In light of these considerations, Mr. President, as in executive session, I am submitting today an amendment to the treaties which would require that they shall enter into force only after both Houses of Congress have enacted legislation authorizing the transfer of Canal Zone territory and property to the Republic of Panama.

Mr. President, this is an amendment which all Senators should eagerly support, whether they favor the treaties or oppose them, because it calls upon the Senate to debate the merits of the treaties in their proper constitutional context. It speaks not to our economic, political, or strategic interests, nor to the advantages or disadvantages of transferring the canal to the Panamanians, but to the higher law which must govern our proceedings.

It is true, of course, that I have been critical of these treaties; but I hope that my colleagues will resist the temptation to allow my personal views on the treaties to cloud their judgment on the need for adherence to the Constitution. What is more important than whether the treaties are approved or rejected in the proper constitutional manner. I appeal not to the supporters of the treaties or to the opponents, but to all Senators who believe, as I do, that the Constitution must be obeyed, enforced and, in fact revered.

Even if I favored these treaties in every respect, even if changes were to be made to make them acceptable, I would continue to insist that article IV of the Constitution be followed. For there is more at stake here than the Panama Canal. There is our Constitution to consider, our separation of powers, and our commitment to limiting the growth of Executive power. I would hope that past experience has made it clear to every Member of this body that any President, be he Republican or Democrat, will be tempted to reach beyond the constitutional limits of his office if we neglect our responsibilities to check his advances.

Already we observe that a succession of Presidents have skirted the Constitution in order to get the treaties before the Senate. The Kissinger-Tack agreement, setting forth the general principles of agreement, was never submitted to the Senate for discussion and debate. Congress has never passed any legislation authorizing any new agreements or treaties with Panama; and because of our failure to insist that the Executive first receive authority to enter into the negotiations which produced these treaties, Presidents have labored at their self-appointed task in total disregard of the wishes of Congress and the American people. At no stage of the proceedings, in fact, has the Senate participated in these negotiations, or been given an opportunity to give its advice and consent. To be sure, the Executive has bypassed the Senate, just as it is now seeking to bypass the House.

Mr. President, even the Senate's confirmation process has been avoided by the acquiescence of the Senate in the interim appointment of Sol Linowitz, one of the chief negotiators of the treaties. Where does this abuse of Presidential power stop? At what point does the Senate tell the Executive: "You shall go no farther." I submit, Mr. President, that our last opportunity to confine the office of the President to its proper constitutional limits is embodied in the amendment to the treaties that I am submitting today.

There are a few skeptics, I would imagine, who will argue that the Senator from Utah is wrapping himself in the Constitution in order to defeat the treaties and embarrass the President, because he believes that the House of Representatives will never agree to the transfer of the canal. This would be a convenient excuse for opposing my amendment, but it begs the question. In the first place, we are bound by our oaths of office to uphold the Constitution, not the Executive, and, I believe no one who knows my values and deep sincerity would ascribe improper motives to me in this regard. I have not been motivated to propose this amendment by the thought that its acceptance will defeat the treaties, because I don't know that it will. Indeed, I have no way of knowing whether the House of Representatives would favor the transfer of property or oppose it. I only know that we have a constitutional duty to perform, and that if we do not perform it these treaties will come back to haunt us for years to come. Not only will the legality of the treaties always remain in doubt, but other Presidents will use the treaties as a convenient precedent to bypass the legislative process in future international agreements involving territorial transfers.

Mr. President, I urge every Senator to study carefully the testimony of all of the legal experts who have appeared before the congressional committees regarding the constitutionality of these treaties, and to weigh it objectively against the claims of the President's spokesmen; for I firmly believe that any Senator who does this will come to the fair and honest conclusion that the proposed treaties with Panama are unconstitutional unless both Houses of Congress enact implementing legislation authorizing the transfer of canal territory.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment I have submitted, together with the testimony of Raoul Berger before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment and statement were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 16

In paragraph 1 of article I, after "Upon its entry into force," insert "subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in paragraph 5,".

In the first sentence of paragraph 2 of article I, after "related agreements," insert "and subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in paragraph 5,".

At the end of article I, add the following:

"5. For all purposes of this Treaty, the two Parties undertake to enact, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, the legislation necessary to implement the provisions of this treaty, including the legislation necessary to exercise the power of the Congress of the United States of America under article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, relating to the disposal of territory or other property belonging to the United States of America."

In the first sentence of paragraph 1 of article III, after "as territorial sovereign," insert "but subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in Article I,".

In paragraph 10 of article III, after "Upon entry into force of this Treaty," insert "subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in Article I,".

In the first sentence of paragraph 1 of article XI, after "The Republic of Panama shall" insert a comma and the following: "subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in Article I,".

In the second sentence of paragraph 1 of article XI, after "upon the date this Treaty enters into force," insert "subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in Article I,".

In paragraph 1 of article XIII, after "Upon termination of this Treaty," insert "and subject to the enactment of the implementing legislation referred to in Article I,".

STATEMENT BY RAOUL BERGER

You have invited me to comment on the relation between the Article IV, 3(2) power of Congress to dispose of property of the United States and the treaty power. Although I am in favor of the Panama Canal Treaty, I share your solicitude for the preservation of constitutional boundaries and your concern lest the function committed to Congress be diminished. I have long held the conviction that all agents of the United States, be they Justices, members of Congress, or the President, must respect those boundaries. No agent of the people may overleap the bounds of delegated power, or encroach on power granted to another. That is the essence of constitutional government and of our democratic system.

The effect of these hearings ranges beyond the Panama Treaty, for the Panama cession will constitute a landmark which, should the State Department prevail, will be cited down the years for "concurrent jurisdiction" of the President in the disposition of United States property. For it needs constantly to be remembered that a succession of Presidents have circumvented Senate participation in treaties of grave import by resort to Executive Agreements. Acquiescence in such claims spells progressive attrition of Congressional powers. Your insistence on respect for constitutional boundaries will warn the Executive against encroachments on the powers of Congress; it will alert foreign nations to the fact that treaties for the cession of United States property must be subject to the consent of the House as well as the Senate.

The President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate", may make treaties. But Article IV, 3(2) provides that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States." How are the two provisions to be accommodated? For present purposes the question whether the United States has "sovereignty" over the Panama Canal need not detain us because, in my judgment, the grant of "use and occupation . . . in perpetuity" constitutes "property" no less than the familiar lease of realty for 99 years. Then there are the installations that cost billions of dollars. Disposition of these no less requires the consent of Congress than does that of territory. In 1942, the President, by Executive Agreement, promised to return certain installations to Panama subject, however, to Congressional approval.¹ A similar provision is to be found in the Treaty of 1955.² These executive constructions are confirmed by established canons of interpretation.

First, there is the settled rule that "where there is in an act a specific provision relating to a particular subject, that provision must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the act, although the latter, standing alone, would be broad enough to include the subject to which the more particular provision relates."³

In other words, "a broad statutory provision will not apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same act."⁴ Restated in terms of the present issue, the specific power of disposition, in which the House of Representatives must concur, governs the general provision authorizing the President and Senate to make treaties.

Second, there is the canon that express mention signifies implied exclusion, which the Supreme Court has employed again and again: "When a statute limits a thing to be done in a particular mode, it includes the negative of any other mode."⁵ The grant of the disposition power to Congress, in other words, excludes its exercise by Senate and President. The rule was invoked by the Founders; for example, Egbert Benson said in the First Congress, in which sat many Framers and Ratifiers, that "it cannot be rationally intended that all offices should be held during good behaviour, because the Constitution has declared [only] one office to be held by this

We should "prefer a construction which leaves to each element of the statute a function in some way different from the others" to one which causes one section to overlap with another. tenure.”⁶ Under these rules it is of no moment that Article IV contains no express exclusion of “concurrent jurisdiction” under the treaty power. Having given Congress the power to dispose of public property, it follows that the President and Senate were impliedly excluded therefrom. Although this particular exclusion was not before the Court, it tacitly ratified the application of the foregoing rules of construction when it stated that Article IV “implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property which could interfere with this right”⁷

Attorney-General Griffin B. Bell conceded in his statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 25, 1977 (hereafter cited as A.G.), that “the specific powers granted to the House of Representatives and Congress in fiscal matters (Article I, section 7, clause 1 and Article I, section 9, clause 7, money bills and appropriations power) preclude making treaties self-executing to the extent that they involve the raising of revenue or the expenditure of funds. Were it otherwise, President and Senate could bypass the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the purse-strings.”

A.G. 4-5. Now Sections 9 and 7 are couched in quite dissimilar terms. Section 9(7) is framed in terms of flat prohibition: “No money shall be withdrawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. . . .” Section 7(1), however, merely provides that “All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House.” Yet the Attorney General reads 7(1) to preclude the President and Senate from “bypass[ing] the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the pursestrings.” What is there that distinguishes “All bills . . . shall originate in the House” from the Congress shall have power to dispose”? The impalpability of the distinction is underlined by the State Department’s concession that “treaties may [not] impose taxes.”⁸ Nothing in the Article I, 8(1) “The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes” distinguishes it from the Article IV “The Congress shall have power to dispose.”

If the President may not by treaty “bypass” the power of the House to originate revenue-raising bills, or the power of Congress to tax, no more may he “bypass” its “power to dispose” of the property of the United States.

In their testimony before the Congress, Herbert J. Hansell, Legal Advisor, Department of State,⁹ and Ralph E. Erickson, Deputy Assistant Attorney General,¹⁰ cited a string of cases in support of “The power to dispose of public land . . . by treaty.”¹¹ For the most part they fall under boundary treaties or treaties with Indian tribes which, as will appear, turn on circumstances peculiar to themselves. Preliminarily consider Hansell’s citation of Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920). It arose out of a State challenge to the treaty with Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds which annually traversed parts of the United States and Canada. Justice Holmes, addressing the argument that the treaty infringed powers reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, stated:

“Wild birds are not in the possession of any one, and possession is the beginning of ownership. The whole foundation of the States’ rights is the presence within their jurisdiction of birds that yesterday had not arrived, tomorrow may be in another State, and in a week a thousand miles away.”¹²

Consequently, the State could assert no “title” in migratory birds. By the same token, the United States also could not lay claim to “ownership” of the birds, and Missouri v. Holland is therefore wholly irrelevant to the power by treaty to dispose of property belonging to the United States.

The Indian treaty cases constitute one of the pillars of the argument for “concurrent power”; and Attorney General Griffin B. Bell referred to them as “a substantial body of Supreme Court decisions dealing with Indian tribes which holds that a treaty may dispose of property belonging to the United States without implementing legislation under Article IV, section 3, clause 2”¹³

¹³ A.G. 9.

To begin with Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1 (1899), both Hansell and Erickson quote, "It is well settled that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the Executive authority of the United States."¹⁴ This was because the treaty merely reserved certain individual tracts from the cession to the United States. It "set apart from the tract hereby ceded [by the tribe] a reservation of six hundred and forty acres" for an individual Indian, and the issue was what kind of title did he take. The Court quoted from an opinion of Attorney General Taney, destined before long to succeed Chief Justice Marshall:

"These reservations are executed out of the grant made by the treaty, and did not therefore pass with it; consequently the title remains as it was before the treaty; that is to say, the lands reserved are still held under the original Indian Title."¹⁵

The Court held that "the reservation, unless accompanied by words limiting its effect, is equivalent to a present grant of complete title in fee simple."¹⁶ That explanation presumably responded to the fact that tribal lands were generally held in common; individual titles were all but unknown, so that such title had to be secured to an individual through the machinery of the treaty. But that is far from a disposition of government land because, as Taney explained, the "reserved" title remained in the Indians. Many, if not most, of the Indian treaty cases involve just such "reserve" provisions.

We might dismiss Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. 211 (1872) because, as Attorney General Bell noted, "The Court conceded that the question was immaterial in the case at bar because Congress had actually implemented and ratified that particular treaty." A.G.9. Nevertheless, the Court, in what he terms a "strong dictum", stated that "there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an Act of Congress conferring it * * *"¹⁷ I was at pains to study each of the cases cited by the Court for this assertion, and abstracted them in an appendix attached to my statement before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. There you may see for yourself that half of the cases thus cited are entirely irrelevant, and that the rest concern "reserves" under which, as Taney observed, no title had passed to the United States but remained in the given Indian. In considering such dicta, it is well to bear in mind Chief Justice Taney's statement that the Court's "opinion upon the construction of the Constitution is always open to discussion when it is supposed to have been founded in error, and that its judicial authority should thereafter depend altogether on the force of the reasoning by which it is supported."¹⁸

By that standard the Holden dictum is no authority at all.

As to other treaties, Hansell tells us, "the precedents supporting the power to dispose of property by treaty alone can be found in the boundary treaties with neighboring powers, especially in the treaties between the United States and Great Britain in 1842 and 1846 for the location of our northeast and northwest boundaries. . . ."¹⁹ Settlements of boundary disputes are not really cessions of United States property. The Oregon boundary dispute proceeded from an extravagant claim; "Fifty-Four Forty or Fight"; the British, on the other hand, claimed land down to the forty-second parallel. Only when the dispute was settled by negotiation at 49 degrees could either party confidently assert that it had title. As a respected commentator, Samuel Crandall, observed, "a treaty for the determination of a disputed line operates not as a treaty of cession, but of recognition."²⁰

Among other examples of alleged treaty transfers of property, Hansell instances the return to Japan of the Ryukyu Islands.²¹ By Article III of the 1951 Treaty of Peace with Japan, the United States received the right to exercise "all and any powers of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of those islands * * *." While Japan renounced in Article II "all right, title and claim" to various territories, it made no similar renunciation with respect to the Ryukyus.²² Quoting the Legal Advisor of the State Department, that "sovereignty over the Ryukyu Islands * * * remains in Japan," a District Court stated that sovereignty over a territory may be transferred by an agreement of cession," but it concluded that there had been no cession.²³ The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals quoted a statement by Ambassador John Foster Dulles, a delegate to the Japanese Peace Conference, that the aim was "to permit Japan to retain residual sovereignty," and it held that the treaty did not make "the island a part of the United States, and it remains a foreign country for purposes of" the Federal Tort Claims Act.²⁴ In sum, Messrs. Hansell and Erickson have failed to make out a case for the President's "concurrent jurisdiction" with Congress in the disposition of United States property.

It remains to consider the arguments advanced by Attorney General Bell before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He cited United States v. Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 51, 88-89 (1833) to prove that "the Court held self-executing certain clauses of the Florida Treaty with Spain which related to the regulation of property rights in newly acquired territory." A.G.10. At the cited page it appears that Article 8 of the treaty provided, "all the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty * * * in said territory ceded by His Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands. * * *"

This article, Chief Justice Marshall held, "must be intended to stipulate for that security of private property which the laws and usages of nations would, without express stipulation, have conferred."

In other words, the treaty provided that prior Spanish grants to private persons should be ratified and confirmed, a provision far removed from presidential "regulation" of public territory. Such regulation is confined to Congress, as Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 314-315 (1829) held with respect to the self-same provision: "the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be by the Act of the Legislature," i.e., Congress.

REMARKS IN THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE TREATY POWER

Before discussing the legislative history adduced by the Attorney General, permit me a few words of explanation and apology. When his statement before the Senate Committee reached me late of a Saturday afternoon, as appears in my own Senate statement, I had only about two days to prepare my comments before having them typed and forwarded to the Senate Committee. Pressure of time conduces to oversights, and I was mistaken respecting a time sequence, and in following the Attorney General's erroneous identification of a motion made by Williamson and Spaight with one he attributed to Sherman and Morris. Leisure for reflection and further research has since enabled me to correct such inaccuracies and to sharpen my analysis. And it has strengthened my conviction that the treaty power was not designed to diminish the Article IV power of Congress.

For the most part the Attorney General's citations have reference to settlement of boundary disputes by treaties of peace which, as we have seen, do not involve cessions. He begins with a remark of George Mason in the Constitutional convention, an in terrorem statement during a debate on whether the Senate could share in originating revenue-raising bills. Speaking for exclusion of the Senate, Mason stated that the Senate "could already sell the whole country by means of treaties," and then toned down this extravagant overstatement to that quoted by the Attorney General: "the Senate by means of a treaty might alienate territory, etc., without legislative sanction." A.G.6, 2 Farrand 297. Mason spoke before the Article IV progenitor was even proposed and referred to the Committee on Detail, 2 Farrand 321, 324, and of course before the resultant "disposition" provision was debated, id. 466. Manifestly his earlier remark hardly expressed the view that the treaty power overrode the as yet unborn "power to dispose."

The Attorney General's other citations will be considered seriatim.

(1) The remarks of Gerry, and of Williamson and Spaight, cited A.G.6, were made after Madison's motion to "except treaties of peace" from the two-thirds vote requirement had been agreed to by unanimous consent. 2 Farrand 540. Gerry protested "that in treaties of peace a greater rather than a lesser proportion of votes was necessary than in other treaties. In treaties of peace the dearest interests will be at stake, as the fisheries, territory, etc. In treaties of peace also there is more danger to the extremities of the Continent, of being sacrificed, than on any other occasions."

Id. 541. The "extremities" patently refer to boundary disputes. Notwithstanding, Madison's "exception" was again approved by a vote of 8 to 3. Now Williamson and Spaight took up the opposition and "moved that no Treaty of Peace affecting territorial rights should be made without the concurrence of two thirds of the [members of the Senate present.]” id. 543²⁵ In short, they sought to exclude treaties of peace “affecting territorial rights” from the Madison “exception.” A note added to Madison’s records recites that “The subject was then debated, but the motion does not appear to have been made.” 4 Farrand 58. On the following day, Sherman and Morris spoke “agst leaving the rights, established by the Treaty of Peace, to the Senate, & moved to annex a proviso that no such rights shd be ceded without the sanction of the Legislature,” id. 548,²⁶ a clear reference to boundary disputes. The matter was resolved by striking Madison’s exception. 2 Farrand 548–549. Throughout all that was under discussion was the performance of the Senate’s own “advice and consent” function, without a hint of desire to curtail the House function under Article IV. The Convention’s overnight reversal of its approval of Madison’s motion testifies how fluid were its views in this area, arguing against giving the remarks of Gerry et al preponderant weight.

(2) Of the same order is a letter by Hugh Williamson, a delegate to the Convention, written to Madison some nine months after its close, to recall to him “a Proviso in the new Sistem which was inserted for the express purpose of preventing a majority of the Senate . . . from giving up the Mississippi. It is provided that two-thirds of the members present in the Senate shall be required in making treaties.”

A.G. 7–8; 3 Farrand 306–307. As the Attorney General’s fuller quotation shows, Williamson feared that General Wilkinson might be led to give up “the Navigation of the Mississippi,” and recalled that “the Navigation of the Mississippi . . . was not to be risked in the Hands of a meer Majority.” A cession of territory was not therefore involved, but rather claims to rights of navigation. At best, the Mississippi issue was a boundary claim finally settled by the Louisiana Purchase. Nor was that issue the sole motivation for insistence on a two-thirds requirement. George Mason explained in the Virginia Ratification Convention that because of their concern about the Newfoundland fisheries, “The eastern states therefore agreed a length, that treaties should require the consent of two-thirds of the members present in the Senate.” 3 Farrand 335. Such diverse motives counsel against reading the several “two-thirds” remarks as evidencing an intent to diminish the role of the House under Article IV. It was one thing to insist that the Senate, in the performance of its own function, must act by a two-thirds vote, and something else again to court the wrath of the democratically minded, who placed their faith in the House and were already disgruntled by the exclusion of the House from the negotiation and making of treaties, by further reducing the role of the House under Article IV.

(3) The Attorney General also cites an amendment proposed by the Virginia Convention as exhibiting the awareness of the Founding Fathers that the Constitution authorizes self-executing treaties disposing of the territory and property of the United States²⁷:

“No commercial treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of the members of the Senate (not merely of those present); and no treaty ceding, contracting . . . the territorial rights or claims of the United States . . . shall be made but in cases of extreme necessity; nor shall any treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively.” (Emphasis added.)

A.G. 7; 3 Elliot, Debates on the Federal Constitution 600. From this attempt to bring the House into treaty ratification the Attorney General would infer that it could be excluded from the Article IV “disposition” of territory. It is simpler to read it as a renewal of the struggle for House participation in treaty-making. In any event, he proves too much. The Virginia Convention likewise recommended “That the legislative, executive and judicial powers should be separate and distinct,” that the right to challenge jurors should not be restrained. 3 Elliot 657–658.²⁸ Do these proposals prove that the separation of powers therefore is not a fundamental principle of the Constitution, or that it does not guarantee the rights to challenge jurors? When implicit rights are not thus negated, how much stronger is the case for giving effect to the express Article IV grant to Congress despite such proposals. Like the earlier remarks, the Virginia amendment testifies to the importance the Founders attached to the disposition of territory—no cession except “in cases of ²⁵ The Attorney General mistakenly attributes a more complete version of this motion to Sherman and Morris, A.G. 6–7, citing 4 Farrand 58. That page merely sets forth an insertion to be made in 3 Farrand 543, which contains only the “motion” of Williamson and Spaight.

²⁶ Emphasis added.

extreme necessity"—and suggests, as in the proposal to spell out the right of challenge, that the Virginians were merely seeking to make assurance doubly sure.

Our guide is furnished by Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 554-555 (1967). There the Court declared with respect to the common law immunity of judges from suit for acts performed in their official capacity:

"We do not believe that this settled principles was abolished by 1983, which makes liable 'every person' who under color of law deprives another of his civil rights * * * we presume that Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish the doctrine."

Thus the all-inclusive "every person" was held not to curtail an existing common law immunity in the absence of a specific provision. The more equivocal treaty-making power demands an even more exacting standard. Before it be concluded that it in any way diminishes the explicit grant to Congress of "power to dispose" of territory and property, a clearly expressed intention to do so should be required. That requirement is not satisfied by the random remarks collected by the Attorney General.

In my judgment, the Panama Treaty should contain a provision making it subject to approval of the Congress.

AMENDMENT NO. 17

(Ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.)

Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. Nunn, and Mr. Stafford) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to executive N, 95-1, the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, on October 17, 1977, I proposed amendments to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. My primary goal was to assure that the rights of the United States: First, to act militarily even after the year 2000 to protect the freedom of transit of the canal; and second, to enjoy "head-of-the-line" priority passage for our vessels of war and auxiliary vessels in time of emergency or need, were written into the actual text of the treaty. That way, there could be no future reason for doubt or confusion as to what was intended by the negotiators.

When I submitted those amendments, I included a third, and rather technical, amendment. In the interest of addressing the more major concerns of the two amendments I have just mentioned, and with the agreement of my cosponsors, I am asking for a reprint of my amendments with the third one deleted and the minor changes noted herein.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 17

At the end of article IV, add the following: "Panama and the United States assume the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure for ships for all nations. The United States and Panama shall, each in accordance with its respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality and each shall have the right unilaterally or collectively to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal. This shall not be interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of Panama but as a right of the United States to take such action, military or otherwise, for the sole purpose of insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible. Such right shall never be exercised against or directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

Amend paragraph 1 of Article VI to read as follows:

1. (a) In recognition of the important contributions of the United States of America and of the Republic of Panama to the construction, operation, maintenance, and protection and defense of the Canal, vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of those nations shall notwithstanding any other provisions of this Treaty, be entitled to transit the Canal irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination, armament or cargo carried.

(b) The vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and of Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended and it shall be so interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency as determined by either party, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the Foreign Relations Committee wound up its hearings this week on the proposed Panama Canal treaties. These hearings have been extremely informative and have contributed substantially to our knowledge and understanding of these treaties. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the committee and its distinguished chairman, Senator Sparkman, for the valuable contribution that the committee has made.

One issue, which was brought up during the hearings on Wednesday, was the matter of a second interoceanic canal either in Panama or elsewhere in Central America. Serious concern has been expressed that the proposed treaties cede too much to Panama in agreeing to seek Panamanian concurrence on the site of another canal.

Colonel Sheffey testified before the committee regarding this point. Colonel Sheffey is an extremely well-qualified witness to testify on this matter having served as a military assistant for canal affairs for the Office of the Secretary of the Army and as the Executive Director for the Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Study Commission. Colonel Sheffey stated:

There are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new Isthmian canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama. The economic, technical and political objections to the far longer routes in Colombia and Nicaragua eliminate them from practical consideration. Limiting the choice of routes to Panama for the remainder of this century costs the U.S. nothing, and the treaty proposal for this prevents other powers' meddling in the matter.

Colonel Sheffey goes on to discuss why sites in Colombia and Nicaragua are not viable options as well as other considerations regarding a second interoceanic canal. I think that my colleagues might find Colonel Sheffey's testimony quite interesting so I ask unanimous consent that this statement relating to a sea-level canal be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

TESTIMONY BY COLONEL SHEFFEY

Mr. Chairman, Gentlemen, I am Colonel John P. Sheffey, U.S. Army (Ret.). My experience in Panama Canal affairs has been rather extensive—five years as the Secretary of the Army's Military Assistance for Canal matters, five years as the Executive Director of the President's Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Study Commission and three years in the Department of State as Special Advisor to the U.S. Canal Treaty Negotiator on an appointment that was terminated by the Department of State in 1974. Subsequently, I have maintained contact with the State and Defense negotiators and have followed the development of the current treaty drafts. However, I have no official capacity today and am here only in the hope that I can help contribute to your understanding of the canal treaty problem. I do not speak for the members of the National Association for Uniformed Services. Most of them strongly oppose giving up the Panama Canal and are not happy with my view that a generous new treaty with Panama is both necessary and unavoidable.

The record of your earlier hearings includes almost every known argument for and against ratification of the proposed treaties, and I will not repeat them. Instead, let me clarify a couple of issues in which I can claim expertise. Then I will attempt to frame the Panama treaty problem in its true political context and suggest what should be done.

First, as the former Executive Director of the $22 million sea-level canal study in 1965-70, I assure you that there are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new Isthmian canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama. The economic, technical and political objections to the far longer routes in Colombia and Nicaragua eliminate them from practical consideration. Limiting the choice of routes to Panama for the remainder of this century costs the U.S. nothing, and the treaty proposal for this prevents other powers' meddling in the matter.

The theoretically feasible routes in Nicaragua and Colombia are 140 miles and 100 miles in length, respectively, as compared with 40 miles or less for the Panamanian routes. The movement of large ships in narrow canal waters is a slow and hazardous operation. Ship operators would not readily accept the risk and time lost in transit. The construction and operating costs of these longer canals would be three or four times the cost of the shorter canals in Panama, and even the shorter Panamanian routes are not economically feasible at currently forecast traffic levels.

In the 1970 study, the Nicaraguan and Colombian routes were considered only for a sea-level canal constructed by nuclear excavation. Nuclear excavation is of questionable technical feasibility at best, and is politically infeasible beyond doubt. Conventional excavation costs on these longer routes were so great that they were not even estimated with any precision. Today's construction costs on either route would be in excess of $20 billion, and this could easily double by the time such a canal might be needed.

Certainly, the foreseeable traffic cannot support two Isthmian canals, and 95 percent of the world shipping projected for the year 2000 will still be of sizes that can pass the present Panama Canal. The 5 percent of superships that need a larger canal cannot possibly support its cost even in Panama. The military advantages of a relatively indestructible sea-level canal are attractive, but have not moved us to build one in Panama. They are far from sufficient to justify a $20 billion investment in a technically unsatisfactory and politically abrasive canal outside Panama.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY DEBATE

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the proposed Panama Canal treaties will soon be reaching the Senate floor for a vote. It is not fashionable to oppose these treaties, a situation reflected most clearly in the news coverage of the ongoing debate. Opponents have been consistently characterized as indulging in grade-school chauvinism, and the overwhelming disapproval expressed by the American public has been repeatedly represented as "backward" and "blind to present-day realities."

This attitude of condescension is dangerous for several reasons. It calls into question the integrity of a system that was originally designed to reflect the will of its citizens. It divests treaty proponents of their responsibility to answer the very many serious questions that remain unresolved by the present version of the treaties. And it deprives the issue at hand of the larger context within which a matter of such grave implications should necessarily be considered.

An extremely perceptive article, appearing in the December issue of the American Security Council's Washington Report, does a great deal toward restoring the perspective vital to the consideration of these important treaties. I commend it to the careful attention of my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WHY WE MUST KEEP THE CANAL

(By M. Northrup Buechner, editor)

(Quite a bit has appeared in the news media recently about the Panama Canal issue. Most of it has been in response to the PR campaign orchestrated by the White House to gain Congressional and popular support for the proposed Treaties. The White House effort has been primarily theatrical, with the elaborate dinner for the Latin American leaders being the big event, carefully staged for maximum TV coverage.)

(Leading opposition voices have been given grudging play in the press. And the powerful popular opposition has been relegated to sparse reports of public opinion polls.)

(The article below is one we recommend highly to WR readers. It goes to the issues behind the Treaties. It reveals the inadequacy of the opposition arguments that have been presented so far in the Congress. And it provides a valuable service on behalf of the general public, by offering a compelling rationale for the so far inarticulate cry of objection from the American heartland.)

The abysmal level of the public debate over the Panama Canal was epitomized in a national interview with a prominent undecided Senator. Asked what considerations he was weighing in making up his mind, the first thing he mentioned was the veto power the new treaties give Panama over a second canal. The public pondering of such details has spread the impression that only trivia is at stake in this debate. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The public advocates of keeping the canal, however, have missed the point almost as badly as that Senator. The primary issue is not the military importance of the canal. It is not the economic importance of the canal. And it is certainly not the details of the new treaties. The primary issue is the right of the United States to exist.

The moral principle at stake is the right of the United States to keep her values, her achievements, her wealth, in the face of overwhelming global opposition. And since a country, like a man, cannot survive without values, at issues is the right of the United States to survive.

That is why the American people oppose the new treaties. That is the principle behind their desperate feeling that giving away the canal would be wrong in some way much more important than they know how to say. When they tell reporters "we have given away too much already," and "we have to stop letting them push us around," that is what they are trying to say. Though they lack the words, they see surrender of the canal for what it would be: a step in the direction of renouncing the United States' right to her values and her life.

Unfortunately, a national debate cannot be won without the words. It is not enough for people to be right. They must know why they are right. They must have the words and principles to defend their position. What happens when they do not has been most evident in the United States Senate.

Because they did not know how to oppose surrender of the canal in principle, a number of Senators have tried to prevent its surrender by becoming enmeshed in debate over the details of the new treaties. In doing so, they have made several significant contributions to the other side.

They have accepted a context for debate where it is treated as already established that we should give up the canal and the dispute therefore, is only over the side conditions. They have trapped themselves in a position where, if the conditions to which they object are changed, they cannot vote against the treaties. And they have been diverted from giving any effective leadership or voice to their enormous support in the general population.

What position should they have taken? How should the new treaties be opposed? The most damning evidence against the treaties is the arguments that are given in their favor. Those arguments fall into two general categories: the practical arguments and the moral arguments; or the arguments from fear and the arguments from guilt.

THE PRACTICAL ARGUMENTS

The most extreme, and therefore the clearest, of the practical arguments holds that if the Senate rejects the new treaties, Panama will become "another Vietnam." In other words, we should give up the canal out of fear of a war with Panama or, even more disgraceful, out of fear of independent guerrillas.

This argument marks a new low in the level of political discourse in this country and not many have had the effrontery to make it openly. That it has been left largely to implication and innuendo is the only sign that our leaders retain any respect for the American people.

For example, it was argued explicitly before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the best way to retain access to the canal is to give it to Panama so they will be on our side if we should have to defend it. It is very revealing (and somewhat frightening) that this argument was taken at face value by all the news media, and its implications went completely unnoticed.

Militarily, observe the helplessness of the United States implied by so desperate a need for support, and from Panama of all places, as to justify giving away the canal. Strategically, observe the absurdity of assuring access to the canal by placing all the complex, delicate machinery and equipment and controls for its operation in the hands of a potential enemy.

And, finally, since attacks by Panama are the only current danger to the canal's security, observe the threat implied by raising the issue of, and hence doubts about, our access to the canal. The real meaning of that argument was that if we try to keep the canal, Panama will deprive us of its use, and therefore we had better give it to them.

To spread this kind of thinking, an unforgiveable campaign has been carried on through the media for the last several months, specifically directed at undermining the self-confidence of the American people and frightening us into giving up the canal. Its most disgraceful element has been the effort by our own military leaders to leave the impression, again by hint, insinuation, and innuendo, that the United States is militarily impotent to assure the security of the Panama Canal.

The argument about access to the canal, for example, was repeated several times before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by military leaders. When the Panamanian dictator was making thinly veiled threats of guerrilla war, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff did not dismiss him as absurd. Rather he implied that the threat was serious by saying he could not defend the canal with 100,000 men.

In the face of this atmosphere of national self-abasement, when President Carter clearly stated that we can and will defend the canal, his declaration came like a breath of fresh air. Then, he threatened that it would be a major, difficult, dangerous undertaking, thus contributing to that atmosphere himself.

It is shameful that this kind of fear was a major factor in the negotiations for the new treaties. Fear is a disastrous motive on which to base policy in any case. But whatever consequences might have been expected from such a policy, ceding the canal out of fear of Panama would have been beyond anyone's ability to predict.

There is no way that Panama could become another Vietnam. Militarily, the two situations have nothing significant in common. Guerrillas could be even a minor problem only if we insisted on following the same insane policy we pursued in Vietnam of fighting effects rather than causes.

In this case, however, fighting of any kind can be avoided altogether. All that is necessary is a statement by the President that an attack on any part of the Canal Zone would be considered an attack on the United States, and that any country supporting such an attack would be considered an enemy of the United States and treated accordingly.

The practical argument also holds that surrender of the canal is essential for good diplomatic relations with the Latin American countries. But even if they were the great powers of this hemisphere, it would be obviously self-defeating to curry their favor by giving away our possessions.

Yet, blinded by a frantic, suicidal anxiety over the good opinion of the world in general and our southern neighbors in particular, that is the course insisted on by most of our political and intellectual leaders. The tragic failure of their leadership to be worthy of the American people was never more evident.

It would undoubtedly be pointless to remind those leaders that it is we who are the great power here, and if anyone should worry about good opinions, it is our southern neighbors who should worry about ours.

THE MORAL ARGUMENTS

But if the practical arguments are insulting, the moral arguments are worse, much worse.

It is said we stole the canal and our presence in the area represents a colonialist affront to the sensitive feelings of the Latin American people. We should give up the canal, it is implied, out of guilt for these offenses.

The charge of colonialism, though repeated mindlessly by everyone, is a transparent fraud. A colony was a settlement of people, not an industrial engineering enterprise. A colony, by definition, was administered for the economic benefit of the mother country. The Panama Canal is not a colony, nor has the United States ever had a colony anywhere in the world.

But the vilest distortion in the whole debate is the charge we stole the canal. It is the exact opposite of the truth.

The opposite of theft is production. We did not steal the canal; we built it. The moral right of the United States to the canal is the right of any creator to what he has created. That right, however, is a property right, the root of all property rights, and it is not surprising that modern intellectuals and politicians are unwilling to defend anything based on that source.

It is their view that control of the canal by the Panamanians is a legitimate aspiration of the Latin American people. But there is no such thing as a "legitimate aspiration" by some to an achievement created by others.

Not only did the United States pay the costs of constructing the canal. It was her citizens who figured out how to conquer the previously unconquerable obstacles and then directed the construction in an enormously heroic effort. The Panama Canal was the greatest engineering feat in the history of many up to that time and ~~we~~ did it.

Nothing is more depraved than ridiculing the American people for their pride in their canal, a tactic adopted by some, not all, of the advocates of the new treaties. No people ever had a better right to pride in any national accomplishment. The Panama Canal is a reflection and embodiment of all that is best in the American character.

Whatever shenanigans were involved in getting sovereignty over the Canal Zone, and no one's account makes them very serious, they are nothing next to the incredible achievement of the canal itself. Without us, the Canal Zone would be just so much empty, deadly, malaria infested lakes and jungle—as would the rest of Panama.

If one considers what Panama would be like today without the canal, it is clear who has received a disproportionate share of the benefits, and if moral debts were to be collected, who would owe what to whom. Then consider that an agreement reached in conjunction with the new treaties calls for us to pay them some 345 million dollars. This is over and above the negotiated increase in payments for use of the Canal Zone from 2.3 million to about 60 million dollars a year.

WHY THEY WANT THE CANAL

There is no moral justification whatever for the demand that the United States give up the canal. What then is the cause of that demand? The same cause that is the leitmotiv in the treatment of the United States by most of the undeveloped world.

It is the motive behind the burning of American consulates, the attacks on American diplomats, the seizure of American fishing boats, the expropriation of American property, the constant attempts to humiliate us in the U.N., all of it accompanied by demands for more money, and lately, by claims of a right to a share of our wealth.

Stripped of the meaningless vicious jargon about colonialism, imperialism, and exploitation, the moral argument holds that we must give up the canal to satisfy the malice, hatred, and envy of the worst elements in the Latin American countries, and indeed, in the whole undeveloped world. Those are the "sensitive feelings" we are accused of affronting.

What is the cause of this global hostility toward the United States? It comes from two related sources.

First, whether communist, fascist, socialist, or non-ideological, the underdeveloped countries of the world are almost all dictatorships. As such, their hatred and fear of the United States has a purely practical element.

We are the last, best, shining example of the kind of life that is possible to man on earth when he is left free. We are the unavoidable proof that the brutality, torture, terror, and death they have imposed on their people are unnecessary.

But the more fundamental cause of their opposition is also the cause of tyranny as such. It is "envy" in its most vicious, virulent, destructive sense. It is what Ayn Rand has identified as "hatred of the good for being the good."

Today that motive is widely regarded as normal and natural. It is sympathetically explained, "Of course they hate us and would like to see us destroyed. After all, we are rich and they are poor; we are great and they are small; we have created achievements they cannot approach; we built a canal they could not conceive."

What that view sanctions and expresses is the ultimate evil in human psychology, the lowest and worst motive that is possible to man. It represents a hatred of every living human value, the same motive that sets up concentration camps, torture chambers, and dictatorships as ends in themselves.

The canal is a hatred symbol all right, but not of a nonexistent American colonialism. What the canal really symbolizes, and what the value-haters want symbolically to wipe out by making us give it up, is the overflowing abundance of energy, efficacy, and pride of a free people.

To surrender the canal in the face of such a motive is unthinkable. It would mean accepting their view of our virtues as vices and our achievements as stains on our national character. It would mean sanctioning hatred of the United States as natural and right and deserving a positive response. To what portion of our wealth and achievements could we claim a right after that and on what grounds?

That is the most important reason for keeping the Panama Canal. If there were no other reason whatever, that would be sufficient to hold on to it for dear life.

CONCLUSION

Those who think the Vietnam War demonstrated the unwillingness of the American people to fight for their values should think again. The only thing that war demonstrated was that the American people will not fight indefinitely for nothing.

The difference between Vietnam and the Panama Canal is the difference between fighting to save the house of a remote neighbor you have never met and fighting to save your own home.

The American people want to keep the Panama Canal. They are right to want it. And they will support the policies necessary to do so.

There is no practical reason for surrendering the canal. There is no moral reason. There is nothing but the pressure of a viciously irrational global opposition. The Senate should confound that opposition and assert the United States's right to keep her values and her life by rejecting the new treaties.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Jan. 30, 1978]

VIEWS OF DEAN LOUIS POLLAK ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, one of this country's outstanding constitutional lawyers is Dean Louis Pollak of the University of Pennsylvania Law School.

Dean Pollak, who has also been dean of the Yale Law School, has had a varied career including private practice and experience in Government; he has written a major work on "The Constitution and the Supreme Court." He has been studying the Panama Canal Treaties and carefully following the debate now taking place on the constitutional issues these treaties present. One of the most important of these is the treaty power in relation to the transfer of U.S. property and territory, a matter of great interest to the Senate.

He has sent me a short paper summarizing his views, which I believe will be highly informative to all taking part in the consideration of these treaties.

His conclusions are, first, that the Supreme Court has recognized that there is a power to dispose by treaty of territory belonging to United States which is independent of the concurrent Congressional power, and second, that the discussion in the constitutional Convention of 1787 confirms the settled understanding of our treaty-makers and of the Supreme Court that territory belonging to the United States may be ceded by treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Dean Pollak's analysis be printed, in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CAN THE UNITED STATES CEDE TO PANAMA, BY TREATY, U.S. RIGHTS IN THE TERRITORY AND INSTALLATIONS OF THE CANAL ZONE?

On November 4, 1977, Senator Allen placed in the Congressional Record a statement by Raoul Berger, former Charles Warren Fellow at Harvard University, made in hearings on the Panama Canal Treaties held by the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. The thrust of Mr. Berger's statement was that cession to the Republic of Panama of such title as the United States possesses in (1) territory in the Canal Zone, and (2) United States installations in the Zone, cannot constitutionally be effectuated by treaty, but only by statute, for the reason that the disposition of territory and other property of the United States is vested by Article IV, 3(2) of the Constitution exclusively in Congress. Mr. Berger is a constitutional lawyer and historian of great distinction, whose scholarly work has enriched our understanding of many aspects of the Constitution, and so it is appropriate to pay close attention to his views on major constitutional questions. Nonetheless, careful examination of the arguments advanced by Mr. Berger persuades me that in this instance he is in error. It is my submission that the proposed treaties with Panama, if consented to by the constitutionally required two-thirds of the Senate and duly ratified by the executive branch, will of their own force accomplish the cession to Panama of the territory and the installations in question:

A. THE DEVELOPMENT OF TREATY PRACTICE AND TREATY DOCTRINE

1. Broadly stated, Mr. Berger's thesis is that the treaty power, which the Constitution vests in the President and the Senate but does not define, cannot be read as giving to the President and the Senate powers concurrent with the powers specifically delegated to Congress by Article I, 8, Article IV, 3(2), and other provisions of the Constitution.

2. The thesis is not a new one. It was strongly advanced in 1795, in opposition to the Jay Treaty; and it was strongly resisted by no less a constitutional authority than John Marshall—the Virginia legislator who was later to be a Congressman, then Secretary of State and finally Chief Justice. Beveridge, in his authoritative biography of Marshall, sums up the argument:

"Among the many objections to the treaty, the principal one . . . was that it violated the Constitution. The treaty regulated commerce; the Constitution gave that power to Congress, which included the House of Representatives; yet the House had not been consulted.

" . . . Marshall's position was that a "treaty is as completely a valid and obligatory contract when negotiated by the President and ratified by him, with the assent and advice of the Senate, as if sanctioned by the House of Representatives also, under a constitution requiring such sanction"; and he admitted only that the powers of the House in reference to a treaty were limited to granting or refusing appropriations to carry it into effect."¹

3. Marshall's position anticipated the pattern which has in fact characterized the utilization of the treaty power. As Secretary of State (former Congressman, former Senator and former Vice President) John C. Calhoun observed in 1844, "From the beginning and throughout the whole existence of the Federal Government it has been exercised constantly on commerce, navigation and other delegated powers." O. Wright, The Control of American Foreign Relations (1922) 344. Moreover, such treaty provisions have routinely been treated as self-executing except where, as Professor Louis Henkin has put it in his definitive work, "the treaty-makers voluntarily left some subjects to regulation by Congress (e.g., international tariffs and trade). . . ." Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (1972) 149. Although the treaty-makers have generally supposed the treaty power to be concurrent with that of Congress with respect to commercial regulations, the disposition of American territory and other government property, and most of the other powers expressly lodged in Congress by the Constitution (and have routinely been sustained in this supposition), they have customarily felt obliged to seek statutory implementation of treaties touching the area of Congressional authority with respect to which Marshall felt action by the House of Representatives was constitutionally indispensable—namely, "granting . . . appropriations." The reason for acknowledging an exclusivity in Congress with respect to the appropriations power, but not with respect to most of its other powers (the regulation of commerce, the disposition of the property of the United States, etc.) arises from the text of the Constitution. Most legislative powers are merely couched in the familiar phrase, "Congress shall have power . . ."—a phrase which, syntactically, does not preclude concurrent authority in the President and Senate as treaty-makers. But the spending power, although couched in the same general form, is also subject to an express constitutional limitation—"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law . . ." [Article I, 9(7)—a limitation which arguably requires statutory implementation of a treaty commitment to make expenditures.]

4. The thesis which John Marshall steadfastly resisted in 1795 was adopted by Marshall's great rival, Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual of Parliamentary Practice. Jefferson—who as Secretary of State, Vice President and President "was no friend of the Treaty Power," [Henkin, supra at 142]—set forth four propositions, the second and fourth of which were as follows: "2. By the general power to make treaties, the Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those subjects which are usually regulated by treaty, and can not be otherwise regulated . . . 4. And also to except those subjects of legislation in which it gave a participation to the House of Representatives." Ibid. Marshall was not the only one of Jefferson's great contemporaries who was unpersuaded by Jefferson's narrow view of the treaty power. Justice Story noted that "The power 'to make treaties' is by the Constitution general; and of course it embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war; for commerce or territory; for alliance or succours; for indemnity for injuries or payments of debts; for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law; and for any other purposes, which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other." III J. Story, Commentaries on the ² I say "arguably" because no such restraint on the treaty power was intimated by the Supreme Court in its classic exposition of the scope of the power in Groffey v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890), quoted in the text infra, at note 6. Textual analysis akin to that dealing with the appropriations power provides an arguable basis for concluding that treaties cannot, without statutory implementation, levy taxes, since the Constitution specifies that "all Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." Article I, 7(1). Congress' power to declare war may also be another power not shared by the treaty-makers. See the quotation from Calhoun in the text, infra at n.3.

Constitution of the United States (1833) 355. Story acknowledged that the treaty power was not unlimited; "A treaty to change the organization of the government, or annihilate its sovereignty, to overturn its republican form, or to deprive it of its constitutional powers, would be void; because it would destroy, what it was designed merely to fulfill, the will of the people. Whether there are any other restrictions, necessarily growing out of the structure of the government, will remain to be considered, whenever the exigency shall arise." Id. at 356. And then, in a footnote, Story dispatched Jefferson's constitutional doubts: "Mr. Jefferson seems at one time to have thought that the Constitution only meant to authorize the president and senate to carry into effect, by way of treaty, any power they might constitutionally exercise. At the same time, he admits, that he was sensible of the weak points of this position. 4 Jefferson's Corresp. 498. What are such powers given to the president and senate? Could they make appointments by treaty?"

5. Marshall and Story were early expositors of what—Jefferson and a few others apart—has always been the orthodox view that the President and the Senate, in making treaties, can regulate almost every subject matter also entrusted to the legislative authority of Congress. But it fell to Calhoun—speaking as a Congressman, a quarter-century before he became Secretary of State—to explain, with more precision than either of the great Justices achieved, the scope of the treaty power and the constraints which other parts of the Constitution impose upon its exercise [29 Annals of Congress 530-31 (Jan. 9, 1816)]:

"The grant of the power to make treaties is couched in the most general terms. The words of the Constitution are that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate concur. In a subsequent part of the Constitution, treaties are declared to be the supreme law of the land. Whatever limits are imposed in those general terms ought to be the results of the construction of the instrument. There appeared to him but two restrictions on its exercise; the one derived from the nature of our Government, and the other from that of the power itself. Most certainly all grants of power under the Constitution must be controlled by that instrument; for, having their existence from it, they must of necessity assume that form which the Constitution has imposed. This is acknowledged to be true of the legislative power, and it is doubtless equally so of the power to make treaties. The limits of the former are exactly marked; it was necessary to prevent collision with similar co-existing State powers. This country is divided into many distinct sovereignties. Exact enumeration here is necessary to prevent the most dangerous consequences. The enumeration of legislative power in the Constitution has relation then, not to the treaty-power, but to the powers of the State. In our relation to the rest of the world the case is reversed. Here the States disappear. Divided within, we present the exterior of undivided sovereignty. The wisdom of the Constitution appears conspicuous. When enumeration was needed, there we find the powers enumerated and exactly defined; when not, we do not find what would be vain and pernicious. Whatever, then, concerns our foreign relations; whatever requires the consent of another nation, belongs to the treaty power; can only be regulated by it; and it is competent to regulate all such subjects; provided, and here are its true limits, such regulations are not inconsistent with the Constitution. If so they are void. No treaty can alter the fabric of our Government, nor can it do that which the Constitution has expressly forbade to be done; nor can it do that differently which is directed to be done in a given mode, and all other modes prohibited. For instance, the Constitution of the United States says, no money 'shall be drawn out of the Treasury by an appropriation made by law.' Of course no subsidy can be granted without an act of law and a treaty of alliance could not involve the country in war without the consent of this House." * * *

6. As Professor Henkin recently observed, Jefferson's conception of the treaty power "would outlaw treaties on matters as to which Congress could legislate domestically" and thus "would virtually wipe out the Treaty Power." Henkin, supra at 149. But Jefferson's conception, as Professor Quincy Wright stated over half a century ago, was "both erroneous and incomplete." Wright, supra at 123.

It is a conception which, as Professor Henkin has noted, "[e]ven in Jefferson's day * * * was hardly accepted by all; it has now been long dead. Treaties have dealt with many matters that were also subject to legislation. * * * The House of Representatives has frequently bristled, but its exclusion from the treaty process was the clear constitutional plan. * * *" Henkin, supra at 149. In short, Calhoun has won the day.

* Ibid. at n. 2 (emphasis in original). That Story and Marshall were well aware that the treaty power includes authority to cede American territory is evident from the exchange of letters between Governor Edward Everett and Story set forth in Appendix A, infra.

7. Among the many legislative powers which can also be exercised by treaty is the particular power which Mr. Berger would deny to the treaty-makers—the power to dispose of American territory and other property. The matter was clearly put over sixty years ago by Dr. Samuel Crandall in his illuminating comparative study of the treaty power:

"In respect of territory not within the boundaries of a State, the central government exercises, subject to the express prohibitions of the Constitution applicable thereto, all the powers of government enjoyed by both the central and State governments over territory within the limits of a State. Accordingly, the power to cede such territory, if it exists as a power of government, resides in the organs of the central government. That the consent of the inhabitants of the territory to be ceded is essential to give validity to the transfer cannot be maintained. The power to cede outlying territory is no less essential to the full exercise of the treaty-making power of the United States, which "extends to all the proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations," than is the power to acquire. Various treaties have been concluded by which the United States has relinquished extra-territorial rights theretofore enjoyed in other countries."

B. JUDICIAL RECOGNITION THAT THERE IS A TREATY POWER TO DISPOSE OF AMERICAN TERRITORY WHICH IS INDEPENDENT OF THE CONCURRENT CONGRESSIONAL POWER

1. Dr. Crandall, as Mr. Berger has observed, is "a respected commentator." Text of Berger Statement, at note 42. But the decisive question is whether Dr. Crandall's view of the treaty power—incompatible with Jefferson's, but consonant with that of Marshall, Story, and Calhoun (and Professors Wright and Henkin)—is in accord with the views expressed by the Supreme Court. The answer is in the affirmative.

2. "It is settled," said the unanimous Court in Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1, 16 (1899), "that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the Executive authority of the United States." This proposition, validating the power to alienate American territory by treaty, was central to the disposition of Jones v. Meehan. The principal issue before the Court was whether the Treaty with the Chippewas of 1863 conveyed full title to Chief Moose Dung of "six hundred and forty acres near the mouth of Thief River." The Court's holding was that:

"The title to the strip of land in controversy having been granted by the United States to the elder chief Moose Dung by the treaty itself, and having descended, upon his death, by the laws, customs and usages of the tribe, to his eldest son and successor as chief, Moose Dung the younger, passed by the lease executed by the latter in 1891 to the plaintiffs for the term of that lease; and their rights under that lease could not be divested by any subsequent action of the lessor, or of Congress, or of the Executive Departments. The construction of treaties is the peculiar province of the judiciary; and except in cases purely political, Congress has no constitutional power to settle the rights under a treaty, or to affect titles already granted by the treaty itself."

3. The Court's holding in Jones v. Meehan is consistent not only with its earlier pronouncement in Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. 211, 247 (1872) ("On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands (lands which belonged to the United States) without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political"), but with its classic formulation of the scope of the treaty power in Geoffroy v. Riggs:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government and that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U.S. 525,

* S. Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement (2nd ed., 1916) 226-227. For concrete examples, see id. at 227-8.

* Mr. Berger discusses Jones v. Meehan in the light of an opinion rendered by Attorney General Taney before he became Chief Justice; the Taney opinion, dealing with an earlier transaction, was discussed by the Court and rejected as not controlling. See 174 U.S. at 12-18. See also Percheman v. United States, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 511 (1833), in which Marshall held that the Treaty with Spain of 1819 had of its own force confirmed the titles of pre-treaty owners of Florida land ceded to the United States by the Treaty; Percheman held that the interpretation of the 1918 Treaty approved in Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253 (1829) (a case relied on by Mr. Berger [Addendum to Statement, Part II]), was in error.

541. But with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."^a

4. Whether, as the Court said, the Constitution precludes treaty cession of territory within a state without the state's consent, may be debatable, for the Constitution does not in terms so confine the treaty power (or the concurrent legislative power to dispose of federal territory). Nonetheless the dictum is one which conforms at least in spirit to the Constitution's insistence that new states not be created out of the territory of existing states without the consent of the state or states affected. Article I, 31).

And considerations of prudence would seem to support such a constraint on the exercise of the treaty power. (See the Court's discussion, in Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe [cited in Geofroy v. Riggs] of the procedures followed in fashioning the Webster-Ashburton Treaty [the Washington Treaty of 1842], settling the long-vexed questions surrounding the United States-Canadian boundary: Justice Field noted that "it was deemed necessary on the part of our government to secure the cooperation and concurrence of Maine, so far as such settlement might involve a cession of her sovereignty and jurisdiction as well as title to territory claimed by her, and of Massachusetts, so far as it might involve a cession of title to lands held by her").^b In any event, it is plain that no consent, whether of the inhabitants or of Congress, is necessary where, as in the proposed Panama treaties, the land to be ceded by treaty is not located in a state.^c

C. THE DISCUSSION IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION CONFIRMS THE SETTLED UNDERSTANDING OF OUR TREATY-MAKERS AND OF THE SUPREME COURT THAT AMERICAN TERRITORY MAY BE CEDED BY TREATY

1. The discussion of the treaty power in the Constitutional Convention plainly discloses the awareness of the framers that treaties might frequently be a mechanism for the cession of territory. Indeed, as Mr. Berger's Addendum shows, this awareness manifested itself more than once in proposals to surround the treaty-making process with special safeguards when it involved the cession of territory.

2. One such proposal would have stipulated "that no Treaty shall be made without the concurrence of the House of Representatives, by which the territorial boundaries of the United States may be contracted. * * * IV Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (1937 ed.) 58. This proposal, advanced on September 7, 1787—very late in the Convention's deliberations—"was then debated, but the motion does not appear to have been made."

3. The lapsed motion of September 7 evidently reflected concern at the great power proposed to be lodged in two-thirds of the Senate. But there were counter-concerns—some members of the Convention were troubled at permitting one-third-

^a 133 U.S. 258 (1890). Geofroy v. Riggs is a particularly strong illustration of the capacity of treaties to regulate matters delegated to Congress: That case applied a treaty to rights of inheritance in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding that Article I, 8(17) confers on Congress the power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" relating to the District.

^b 114 U.S. 525, 541 (1885). See also the following in The Writings and Speeches of Daniel Webster (1903): vol. IX at 78 et seq., vol. XI at 270 et seq., and vol. XII at 21 et seq. Set forth below, in Appendix A of this memorandum, is an exchange of letters between Story and Massachusetts Governor Edward Everett which evidences Story's and Marshall's shared recognition of the capacity of a treaty to effectuate a cession of territory. (For having drawn my attention to the Everett-Story exchange, I am particularly indebted to Professor Stefan A. Riesenfeld, currently Counsellor to the Legal Advisor of the Department of State).

^c With all respect, I submit that the two Supreme Court cases relied on by Mr. Berger to support the asserted exclusivity of legislative (as opposed to treaty) power to dispose of American territory, in no way undercut the doctrines so plainly announced in Holden v. Joy, Jones v. Meehan, and Geofroy v. Riggs. (1) The Court's opinion in Sioux Tribe v. United States, 316 U.S. 317 (1942), does refer, at pp. 324 and 326, to the "exclusive" Congressional power to dispose of United States territory, but the question which the Court there answered in the negative was whether the President, acting solely on his own authority, could "convey to the Tribe the same kind of interest in the lands affected as it had acquired in the lands covered by the Fort Laramie Treaty. * * * (Id. at 324) (emphasis added.) Thus, Sioux Tribe v. United States properly held presidential power over federal lands to be subordinate to Congressional power, and did so against an historical background clearly illustrating that treaties are as effective as statutes to transfer title to federal lands. (2) Wisconsin Central R.R. Co. v. Price County, 133 U.S. 496 (1890), also relied on by Mr. Berger, holds state authority over federal lands to be subordinate to Congressional authority: when one bears in mind that the opinion was published in the same volume of the United States Reports as Geofroy v. Riggs, and indeed was written by the same Justice (Justice Field), it is quite clear that the Court's insistence on the paramountcy of Congressional power was directed solely at the rival power before the Court at that time—and not at the concurrent treaty power, which is, like Congressional power, part of "the Supreme Law of the Land." Article VI, 2.

plus-one of the Senate to block treaty ratification. Thus, on September 8, Rufus King "moved to strike out the 'exception of Treaties of peace' from the general clause requiring two-thirds of the Senate for making Treaties," and James Wilson then urged that "the requisition of two-thirds * * * be struck out altogether." And at this point, "A reconsideration of the whole clause was agreed to." II Farrand 547-48.

4. In the course of the ensuing debate, Roger Sherman stated that he "was against leaving the rights, established by the Treaty of Peace, to the Senate, & moved to annex a 'proviso [sic] that no such rights shd be ceded without the sanction of the Legislature.'" According to Madison's notes, "Mr. Govr. Morris seconded the idea of Mr. Sherman." Nonetheless, the proposal of September 8, like the proposal of September 7, does not appear to have ever been put to a vote.

5. Mr. Berger, in his Addendum, mentions the September 7 proposal and speculates on the inference to be drawn from the failure of the Convention to pursue the matter:

"Why was the motion not made after debate? Presumably, the matter was postponed for consideration [when Article IV,] Section 3(2) would come up for discussion. During this subsequent discussion of 'The Legislature shall have power to dispose of * * * the territory. * * *', it is singular that no mention was made of an exception for disposition under the treaty power. II Farrand 466. Non-mention is the more remarkable because such an exception would carve out an area of undefined magnitude from the power conferred, a matter which would affront the democratically minded who placed their faith in the House. It seems more reasonable to infer from the history that Article IV, Section 3(2) was designed to set at rest the fears that territory might be ceded without the concurrence of the House."

6. Mr. Berger's inference might be thought to have some modest plausibility if the discussion of Article IV, (2), to which Mr. Berger refers (the discussion summarized at II Farrand 466), had in fact been "subsequent" to the discussion of the treaty power. But it was not. The discussion of Article IV 3(2) referred to by Mr. Berger took place on August 30, a little over a week prior to the debate on the treaty power adverted to above.

Conclusion

As noted earlier in this memorandum, the thesis put forward by Mr. Berger is essentially the narrow Jeffersonian conception of the treaty power which would "outlaw treaties on matters as to which Congress could legislate domestically"—a conception which "has now been long dead." Henkin, supra, at 149. In a sense, then, it seems anomalous to be reexamining this ground in 1978. And the anomaly is only underscored by the fact that, in our own time, the major constitutional debate about the scope of the treaty power has been of a wholly different nature: Can the treaty-makers, through the exercise of their authority to act on all matters of international concern, empower Congress to enact legislation going beyond its specifically enumerated grants of power?

Yes, the Supreme Court held, in Missouri v. Holland.⁹ Is the treaty power then wholly unrestrained, provided it is exercised in an area of international concern? No, the Supreme Court announced, in Reid v. Covert.¹⁰ The treaty-makers, like all other departments of government, are restrained by those prohibitions—most notably, those embodied in the Bill of Rights—to which all actions taken under the authority of the United States must conform. In sum, since 1920, when Missouri v. Holland was decided, the active questions as to the scope of the treaty power have grown out of the perception that the treaty power is, at least in theory, broader than the power of Congress to enact domestic legislation. Those questions are no longer as significant as they once were—in part because of the limitations on the treaty power announced in Reid v. Covert, and in part because the domestic legislative authority of Congress is now acknowledged to be far broader than was perceived half a century ago. In any event, the proposition that the treaty power is infinitely narrower than the Congressional power—the clear implication of the Jeffersonian conception which Mr. Berger has now revived—is a constitutional anachronism.¹¹

¹¹ Mr. Berger's concerns about the aggrandizement of executive authority—concerns rooted in the traumas of Vietnam and Watergate—do not advance analysis of the scope of the treaty power. Treaties are made by the President, but subject to the consent of two-thirds of the Senate—hardly a recipe for unrestrained Presidential power. Arguably, such concerns are pertinent when a President proposes to take major international initiatives on his own account

If the proposed treaties with Panama are approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and duly ratified, they will in my judgment, of their own force effectuate the cession to Panama of American title to the land and installations of the Canal Zone.

APPENDIX A

Exchange of Letters Between Governor Edward Everett and Mr. Justice Joseph Story, Taken From II, W. W. Story, Life and Letters of Joseph Story [1851], pp. 286-89:

To Hon. Joseph Story.

BOSTON, APRIL 14, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR: The legislature has adopted some resolves relative to the Northeastern Boundary of the United States, which have been presented to me for my official signature. One of them is in the following terms:

"Resolved, That no power delegated by the Constitution to the government of the United States authorizes them to cede to a foreign nation any territory lying within the limits of either of the States in the Union."

I beg leave to ask your opinion, (to be given confidentially or otherwise as you may deem proper,) whether you consider the principle asserted in this resolve, as a well-settled doctrine of Constitutional Law. I have carefully read what is said of the treaty-making power in your Commentaries, Volume iii. p. 354, et seq. At the close of 1502, you name certain restrictions on the treaty-making power, which must be assumed; but that of ceding a part of a State is not one of them. You add, however, the remark, "Whether there are any other restrictions necessarily growing out of the structure of the government will remain to be considered whenever the exigency shall arise."

The restriction in question (if it exist) must be one of this character, and I should prefer to follow your wise counsel, and let it remain to be considered, when the exigency arises. The present controversy does not appear to me to create such an exigency, for it is a question not of ceding an admitted portion of the territory of Maine, but of ascertaining the boundary between the British territory and ours. The resolve of the legislature, however, raises the abstract question, and I wish your advice, whether I can safely affirm it.

I am, dear Sir, with the highest respect, And Sincere attachment,

Faithfully yours,

EDWARD EVERETT.

I would observe, that it is my present inclination, if I do not sign the Resolves, to let them pass sub silentio, as they are only expressions of the opinions of the legislature.

CAMBRIDGE, APRIL 17, 1838.

To His Excellency Edward Everett.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of the 14th inst. which I received by yesterday's mail, I beg to say, that I consider the Resolve referred to as very objectionable as a matter of Constitutional Law, I cannot admit it to be universally true, that the Constitution of the United States does not authorize the government of the United States "to cede to a foreign nation any territory within the limits of the States of the Union." If the proposition is true, then in case of war, it would be incompetent for the government by a treaty to cede any territory conquered during the war, and which might be indispensable to purchase peace. So a cession could not be made, even with the assent of the State within which the territory was situated; for neither the State nor the United States could alone cede it, and then both could not. Yet the cession might be of a nature calculated for the safety of both nations, and might be an equivalent for a like cession on the other side.

I remember to have had some conversation with Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, some years ago, when the subject was under discussion, with reference to the contested by executive agreement with a foreign power. Cf. 39 Op. Atty. Gen. 484 1941. They are not pertinent—indeed, they may properly be termed impertinent—when a President, acting in meticulous conformity with the procedures specified in the Constitution, has asked the Senate to fulfill the partnership role in the making of treaties which the Constitution expressly contemplates.

¹² Dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School; Albert M. Greenfield University Professor of Human Relations, History and Law.

boundary in Maine. He was unequivocally of opinion, that the treaty-making power did extend to cases of cession of territory, though he would not undertake to say that it could extend to all cases; yet he did not doubt it must be construed to extend to some.

It appears to me that our legislature have very unnecessarily, and (as I think also) against our true public policy with reference to the contested boundary of Maine, stated this proposition. It may embarrass the government in its negotiations; and it is wholly gratuitous, — since, in a case of contested boundary, there is no pretence to say that an ascertainment of the true boundary involves the question of cession.

I always look with alarm and regret upon all attempts of our legislatures to settle constitutional questions in the heat of controversy, and under the impulses of party. Nor do I think that Massachusetts ought to commit herself upon any doctrine of this sort, at this time. I doubt its soundness; but I do not at all doubt its inexpediency. The time may arrive when our very existence and salvation as a nation, may depend upon the exercise of this very power. If the national government does not possess it, it is to all intents and purposes an extinguished right of sovereignty, for the States do not possess or retain it.

I see no objection to your leaving the resolve to its constitutional operation, sub silentio, if you think it best not to return it to the legislature with objections. I think the doubt of a constitutional point furnishes of itself a sufficient ground for rejecting a resolve embodying a positive declaration of it, unless there be an absolute necessity for some declaration on the subject.

What I have written I must ask you to consider as confidential, though I do not mean by this to say that I should object to its being seen by any of our confidential friends, such as Mr. Webster, if you should wish to consult him.

Believe me, with the highest respect,

Truly yours,

JOSEPH STORY.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, one of the Nation's ablest military experts is Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, U.S. Navy (retired).

Admiral Moorer is the only person in the history of our Nation to serve as commander in chief, Pacific Fleet, commander in chief, Atlantic Fleet, Chief of Naval Operations, and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Admiral Moorer testified today before the Senate Armed Services Committee in regard to the proposed Panama Canal treaties.

His statement to the committee is an excellent one which I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT BY ADM. THOMAS H. MOORER, U.S. NAVY, RETIRED

Mr. Chairman and Distinguished Members of the Senate Armed Services Committee: I am honored to be here as a witness before this Committee. For the past 12 years I have appeared here many times as a member of the Executive Branch of our Government. Today, I would like to make clear that I do not represent any particular Group, Organization, or Political Party. Rather, I am here as a very concerned Citizen who has had a high level professional involvement in the use of the Panama Canal—in peace as well as war—as it relates to the military security of the people of the United States.

Although I am prepared to answer questions concerning any aspect of the proposed treaties, I will focus my statement primarily on defense of the Canal in a local sense as well as the defense of the United States in a global sense.

While I was opposed to the disposal of the Panama Canal from the outset for global strategic reasons, and so informed the President in writing, I have now carefully studied the proposed treaties in detail and am even more convinced that ratification in their present form would be very detrimental to the national interests of the people of the United States for years and years to come.

As you know Mr. Chairman, what we are addressing here today is two Treaties, three Annexes, a Protocol, two Implementary Agreements—and now we have under consideration a sugar coated Amendment which is claimed to give the United States the "right" to defend the Canal and to "go to the head of the line" with her ships. The complexity of such a conglomeration together with the ambiguities in meaning have already surfaced and in my view will continue indefinitely. Certainly there has been quote after quote from Torrijos and his associates contradicting the interpretations placed on these Treaties by the U.S. negotiators. I can supply these quotes for the record, if desired.

Turning now to the global implications contained in these proposed Treaties. The Panama Canal is one of the four maritime gateways of the world, together with the Malacca Straits, the Suez Canal, and the Gibraltar Straits. Anyone who has observed Soviet actions since World War II and studied their literature concerning maritime affairs soon learns that the Soviets fully understand the importance of the Panama Canal, even if some here in Washington do not. Only last August a Soviet strategist, writing in Red Star—later published in England as well as in Cuba—stated that "the Canal Zone must be considered by the Soviet Union as a "Priority Zone." He then goes on to describe ways to attack the Canal, using Cuba, Puerto Rico and Colombia. Writings of this kind which have appeared from time to time over the years serve to reinforce my view that the prime reason that the Soviet Union accepts the burdensome support of Cuba is due to their desire to dominate the Caribbean, including the Panama Canal, as they greatly expand their maritime capabilities—both warships and merchant ships. We have here the development of a Torrijos-Castro-Moscow Axis. Castro has sent thousands of troops to Angola, Ethiopia, and Mozambique armed and transported by the Soviets. He has been to Moscow where he is greeted with open arms. Torrijos has been to Havana where he has been decorated by Castro while both extolled the success of their respective revolutions. He has been to Libya to visit Qaddafi who, next to Castro, is the most active international revolutionary—and rich besides after, like Castro, confiscating millions of dollars worth of property belonging to American citizens. When Torrijos overflew Havana on his return to Panama after the signing of the Treaties in Washington last fall, he sent the following message to Castro: "On my return trip to my country and flying above the sky of Cuba I salute you with friendship always. . . . In Latin America your name is associated with feelings about dignity that have been channeled toward a shameful period of colonialism." Also noteworthy is the fact that in July of last year a Soviet commission visited Panama seeking port and airport concessions and offering economic assistance.

I mention these things, Mr. Chairman, not because I am one who cannot keep up with the times and am still fighting the Cold War, as my critics suggest, but because I am convinced that the above actions and attitudes clearly point to the fact that these proposed Treaties are not, as claimed by the proponents, simply a long-delayed redress of the wrongs of American colonialism imposed on a helpless tiny nation. They cannot be viewed in such a simplistic way since they have worldwide implications. The defense and use of the Panama Canal is wrapped unextricably with the overall global strategy of the United States and the security of the Free World. I submit that, if the United States opts to turn over full responsibility for the maintenance and operation of such an important waterway to a very small, resource-poor and unstable country as Panama and then withdraws all U.S. presence, a vacuum will be created which will quickly be filled by proxy or directly by the Soviet Union as is their practice at every opportunity.

So Mr. Chairman, and Members of the Committee, do not be surprised if this Treaty is ratified in its present form, to see a Soviet and/or Cuban presence quickly established in Panama. In any event any confrontation over the "neutrality" of the Canal then becomes a confrontation with the Soviet Union rather than with Panamanian guerrillas or terrorists. With the Soviets already on the scene, fighting our way in—with or without the help of the small 1500-men Panamanian Army will not be without unnecessary loss of U.S. men and material, not to mention loss of the use of the Canal.

I believe a permanent U.S. presence in the Panama Canal Zone to be the only feasible and safe posture for all of the nations of this hemisphere. In saying this I must also emphasize that the year 2000 is meaningless insofar as the requirements for the security of this hemisphere are concerned. The threat, the problems, the global balance will not change as if by magic in the year 2000, so why should we pass this dilemma down to our children and grandchildren?

In view of the above, Mr. Chairman, I have yet to hear any convincing justification advanced as to why the United States should willingly sacrifice the strategic and economic advantages afforded the United States—and indeed all our friends and allies—by our exercise of full control and economical operation of the Panama Canal as we do today and have done for years. In fact, stripped to the essence I have heard only three reasons put forward in support of the proposed treaties: (1) By signing the new Treaties we will divest ourselves of the stigma and guilt we should feel over our ruthless colonialization of Panama. (2) If we do not surrender the Canal some unknown individuals in the Isthmus of Panama will blow it up. Since we are interested in use and not control let us give it away, it is defenseless any way unless we deploy 100,000 troops to Panama and start another Vietnam. (3) The Canal is not of much use. Traffic between oceans is a convenience but is not vital. Besides aircraft carriers and big tankers cannot use the canal and less than 10 percent of the merchant ships fly the American flag—so why the concern? The American people do not buy such logic, Mr. Chairman. Despite a steady drumbeat of often misleading statements highlighting the above positions even the staunchest supporter of the Treaties will readily admit that the American people are two to one against ratification of these Treaties. The people are well aware that the United States has never had a colony of any kind for the purpose of exploitation and that they have paid out more blood and treasure on behalf of mankind, worldwide, than any nation in history. They are aware of the effort it took to construct the Panama Canal. They know that Panama achieved her freedom and her very existence due to the Canal. The Canal does not owe its existence to Panama. The American people are aware of the part often played by the Canal in the rapid transfer of Naval Forces from ocean to ocean in case of an international emergency. But above all, the American people recoil over the thought that we should base our foreign policy on sheer fright or in response to threats. Nevertheless, they have been warned many times lately that failure to ratify these Treaties will result in riots and sabotage. Such encouragement to lawlessness and violence by the advocates of these Treaties could well make them self-fulfilling prophets.

With the above as background I would now like to be more specific as to the military aspects of the proposed Treaties as they relate to: (1) the military value of the Panama Canal to our global strategy; (2) the defense of the Canal against an external threat; (3) defense against the internal threat; (4) the capability of Panama to defend, maintain, and operate the Canal, particularly after the year 2000 when American assistance is no longer available.

(1) The Military Value of the Panama Canal To Our Global Strategy.

The intrinsic value of the Panama Canal lies in its linkage of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, thereby saving 8,000 miles and 20 to 30 days steaming time from ocean to ocean. Expressed in military terms, the Canal provides the following: rapid transit of ships, personnel and supplies during periods of tension or actual conflict; flexibility in application of force; timely arrival at the scene of conflict; efficient use of shipyards, warehouses and training areas on both coasts of the United States, and a steady flow of logistic support. In fact, there is no feasible war plan for the United States, taking into account our reduced forces and extended commitments, that does not assume that the Panama Canal will be available for full time priority use. The only alternative that would permit the meeting of time scales of current war plans based on the threat in both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans would be a major buildup of Naval combat forces overall, together with a very large expansion of supply and ammunition storage facilities for both the Army and the Air Force on both coasts. The utility of the Canal has been demonstrated over and over again in times of emergency. World War I, World War II, the Korean War, the Cuban Crisis, and the Vietnam War all placed heavy loads on the Panama Canal which were efficiently handled to the great benefit of the United States.

I see no change whatever in the critical contribution of the Canal to our military strength in the near future or in the out years far beyond the meaningless years of 2000. Only this week the Department of Defense announced a military policy focused on NATO which is time-sensitive and hence demands early Naval use of the Canal. Furthermore, in any NATO war, which by definition is a war with Soviet Russia and hence World War III, the United States will require in Panama air bases, communications, fueling facilities, air defenses, etc., in order to conduct anti-submarine warfare against Soviet submarines which are bound to concentrate in the approaches to the Canal and use the bases we have allowed them to acquire in Cuba, such as Cienfuegos. Therefore, I believe it is most unwise to surrender all of our Panama bases as proposed in these Treaties.

(2) The external threat.

In my view there is no external overt threat to the Panama Canal except in the context of World War III involving the Soviet Union. Here the main thrust of our defense would be primarily the interception of any hostile or suspicious ship well clear of the territorial waters of Panama. However, this operation is now complicated by the inclusion in the proposed Treaties of the dangerous proviso that permits the warships and auxiliary vessels of all nations to transit the Canal freely, without inspection, search, or even surveillance, in time of war or peace, while the policing of the Canal is entrusted exclusively to the Panamanian police and fire departments. This guarantee to all nations does not wait until the year 2000 to become operative. It is immediately applicable despite the fact that the United States "shall have primary responsibility to protect the Canal" until the year 2000. This is responsibility without authority. We were not quite so foolish in World War I and World War II. President Wilson not only barred all enemy ships but also proclaimed that no enemy alien should "enter or be found within the Canal Zone." President Roosevelt amplified these prohibitions in World War II and no nation in the world ever questioned our right to protect, defend, and police the Canal and Canal Zone and adjacent waters, or to sink and destroy enemy warships wherever found. Even the Treaty of Versailles, which was not exactly favorable to the Germans, granted them the right to protect the Kiel Canal in time of war.

The external covert threat is real and exists today. As I have explained earlier, there is a link between Torrijos, Castro, and Moscow. The Soviets have air and naval base rights in Cuba, and they frequently deploy aircraft and ships to Cuba. We would be naive indeed if we did not expect the Soviets to establish direct or proxy presence in Panama at the earliest opportunity.

(3) The Internal Threat.

The proponents of these Treaties proclaim again and again that the only way to handle the internal threat is to ratify the Treaties and give up the Canal. It is repeated over and over again that we are not interested in ownership, only continued use, which can be acquired only with the help of the Panamanians. Otherwise, they say, 100,000 troops will be required to defend the Canal and we will immediately be plunged into another Vietnam. I do not accept any of these scare statements. In the first place, a major part of the income of Panama is due directly to the existence of an operating Canal. If the Panamanians make an effort to sabotage the Canal they are the ones that will be harmed. Most of them know this. In the second place, it is a gross overstatement to suggest that 100,000 men will be required to defend against saboteurs even if they are supported by the 1,500 men Panamanian armed forces. I estimate that 50,000 or less would be adequate even in the face of an unusually large scale determined effort. The most likely attacks can be handled with present forces. So far as the fear of another Vietnam is concerned, there is absolutely no comparison. Vietnam is on the other side of the world, 10,000 miles away. It had at least 17 battle-hardened infantry divisions. It was supported materially and politically by both Soviet Russia and The People's Republic of China. The people of the United States were divided over Vietnam; but in this case the majority are firmly united when it comes to their Panama Canal. Finally, the Canal itself is tough. One hand grenade, or stick of dynamite, will not bring the Canal operations to a complete halt as some suggest. While I do not doubt that there could be student demonstrations motivated from time to time by—to quote Ambassador Bunker—"persons trained in communist countries for political action," I do not think they comprise a threat that will bring about closing of the Canal or serious confrontation. I should point out, however, that under the terms of the proposed treaties, the Canal Zone disappears immediately and this will complicate the defense against intruders and those bent on sabotage since no longer will it be possible to emplace secure electronic warning devices.

(4) The capability of Panama to defend, maintain, and operate the Canal after the year 2000.

The overall capability of Panama to maintain and operate the Canal after the year 2000 when the United States is required to withdraw is a troublesome point. In my view the custodian of such a waterway, so important to so many nations is obligated to operate it at minimum cost for the benefit of all, as the United States has done over the years. We have already had one sad experience in the case of Egypt, which assumed control of the Suez Canal in 1956. First Egypt chose to use the Canal for her own political purposes and denied its use to Israel. Israel retaliated and sank several ships in the Canal. Egypt, lacking any industrial capacity could do nothing about it. The Canal remained closed to all shipping for several years, causing great increases in the cost of world commerce. The Suez Canal would be closed today if the United States Navy had not opened it in 1974. In the case of Panama, her capabilities are far more limited than Egypt with a population of 40 million. In the first place, the Panama Canal with its locks, pumps, and electrical controls is extremely more complex technically than the sea level Suez Canal. Furthermore, Panama is a very small country with a population about the size of Atlanta, George., i.e., 1.7 million. She is led by a military dictator with Marxist leanings. Political opponents have been exiled. Until recently all political activity had been outlawed. The press is controlled. The country is heavily in debt, and spending 40 percent of its income carrying its debt. Panama has no heavy industry worth the name and is woefully lacking in management skills as evidenced by the fact that several large-scale construction projects attempted recently have failed. It is very doubtful whether Panama will acquire the capability to maintain and efficiently operate an industrial complex the size of the Panama Canal, even long after the year 2000.

Along with the capability to operate and maintain the Canal one must consider the contribution of the Panamanian Armed Forces in the defense of the Canal. What will happen when the United States leaves in the year 2000 under the terms of these proposed Treaties? How long before the Canal falls in unfriendly hands? With the second smallest population in Latin America, Panama's army consists of nothing more than 1,500 light infantry with no modern equipment. In addition, there are about 6,000 of the Guardia Nacional who are assigned police duties, including making certain that Torrijos remains in power through removal of political opponents. It is apparent that some of the Guardia Nacional, such as Colonel Noriega, the director of intelligence, are hostile to the United States. In any event, Panama's capability to defend the Canal is practically nil.

I would like to note at this time that the proponents of these Treaties frequently claim that ratification will not result in cost to the American taxpayer. This leaves me confused since the U.S. investment in the Canal is about $7 billion and it will take about $40 to $50 million of appropriated funds simply to rearrange the U.S. base structure. Furthermore, the sudden increase of 30 to 40 percent in tolls is bound to be felt by both the U.S. importer and exporter of consumer goods and could become critical to our friends and allies in South America. Panama has already announced she intends to raise tolls and operate the Canal for profit.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I will close with a brief discussion of the proposed Amendment which, it has been reported, has been designed to soften the strong and vociferous opposition that has been continuously voiced by the American people at large. As I understand it, the proposed Amendment will cover two points: the right of the United States to defend the Canal against a threat to its "neutrality", and the right of U.S. ships to expeditious passage. With respect to the first point: who will decide that the neutrality has been violated? Suppose the existing government of Panama supports the insurgents, or claims that there has been no violation? Does the United States make a unilateral decision to intervene militarily in order to force the maintenance of neutrality? If so, how do we reconcile such action with another proviso in the Treaties whereby we agree not to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama? Listen to General Torrijos on this subject, while speaking to the 10th Congress of the Panamanian Students Federation on 15 September 1977. "I am not afraid, nor am I denying that I signed a clause which if misinterpreted by future U.S. generations could give rise to intervention. But I am not afraid, I know the youth we are producing. And in order for there to be intervention there must be people willing to accept intervention and these people here have no intention of accepting it." Rousing applause. The new amendment now being proposed may solve our domestic political problems but the big question still unanswered is: What problems will the United States face when she sets about to correct violations of neutrality and what practical actions do we propose to take? This has not been examined in depth.

Neither has the other point in the proposed amendment, "expeditious passage," been thought through in a practical way. Now listen to Mr. Escobar Bethancourt, one of the Panamanian negotiators on the subject: "Expeditious passage does not mean privileged passage. As a matter of fact the concept of privileged passage is rejected. . . . If, after examining the provision, the Gringos say 'I want to go first,' then that is their problem with the other ships waiting there. We cannot go that far." What do we do even if the Panamanians permit U.S. ships to go to the "head of the line" but then simply walk off the job for a coffee break? The captain of a ship cannot bull his way through this lock-type canal. He must have all controls skillfully manned.

What is very unclear in many of the Annexes, Amendments, etc., is who actually enforces the terms of these agreements. There are all kinds of guarantees but no guarantor. It is shocking, and indeed frightening, to me to observe that so many of my countrymen in high places are supporting the idea that if we try to keep the Canal, Panama will deprive us of its use, and therefore the only solution is to give it away thereby placing all the complex, delicate machinery and controls in the hands of a country whose interests, under influence of our enemies, could well be contrary to those of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out before, the American people are opposed to these Treaties by a significant majority. No one can contradict this fact simply by suggesting that the American people don't understand the fine print. They understand it only too well. So it is of some concern and disappointment to me to learn through the press that plans are now underway to utilize the new amendment so as to permit individual Senators, who choose to do so, to vote for ratification of the Treaties, while at the same time demonstrating to their constituents that they are strongly supporting their opposing position.

Assuming these press reports are correct, it is my judgment that the American people will not be deceived by such a tactic.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, during the past year the policy of the United States has been to loudly proclaim our support together with our willingness to punish those who oppose majority rule in far away places. The Panama Canal issue is one issue about which a very significant majority of the American people have taken a firm and public position. Why cannot we begin with majority rule right here at home?

In closing, let me repeat that I am strongly convinced of the following:

1. A maritime link between the Atlantic and the Pacific is vital to the security of the United States and will always be so.

2. The Canal is not vulnerable and can be defended.

3. A permanent U.S. presence will provide the best defense and the best insurance against a major conflict in the Caribbean area.

4. There is no reason whatever for the United States to feel guilty about our construction and operation of the Canal for the benefit of all maritime nations and Panama in particular.

5. Our South American friends, despite their public statements, do not want the United States to withdraw from Panama.

6. The provision in these Treaties will cost the American taxpayer millions of dollars.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, yesterday the Committee on Foreign Relations, by a vote of 14 to 1, favorably reported the Panama Canal treaties.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I prepared for use during committee deliberations be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT

This has been one of the most difficult issues I have confronted in my 21 years in the Congress. I have long recognized that a major revision in our treaty relationship with the Republic of Panama is desirable and could be in the interests of both countries.

I recognize the importance of maintaining close and friendly relations with the people of Panama and with the people of other nations throughout the hemisphere. I am deeply conscious of, and concerned about, the impact that outright rejection of the treaties could have on our relations in the hemisphere.

Sometimes political responsibility imposes upon public officials the necessity of choosing among several undesirable courses of action. That may seem to be the dilemma that we face with these treaties.

After months of agonizing consideration, I have concluded that I cannot consent to ratification of the treaties before us. I think they are fatally flawed in a number of substantive respects. In my view they do not adequately protect the interests of the United States or of other nations which depend upon the canal.

I will, of course, be more specific in a statement of my individual views which will be filed with the committee report. I might just point, however, to Article XII of the Panama Canal treaty, which deeply concerns me. It takes away an option of the United States, between now and the year 2000, to even consider the possibility of building a second canal, possibly a sea-level canal, in another country. Under these treaties we would tie our hands and deny ourselves that option, which I think would be very valuable and important.

I am concerned that too much of the treaty language (and in very important areas) is full of ambiguities—ambiguities so apparent that people representing each country are telling their respective constituents that the language means different things.

If there is concern now about defending the canal—with the troops we have stationed there—and that seems to be a concern of many people who support these treaties, there should be greater concern about what would happen after the year 2000 under the provisions embodied in these treaties. I don't find that the understanding reached (between President Carter and General Torrijos) is adequate to cover that concern.

I am also disturbed that between now and the year 2000 a dwindling number of United States citizens and a growing number of Panamanian citizens would be expected to operate and maintain the canal "as employees of the United States"—but under the laws of Panama, except to the extent that there is other provision made in these treaties. Not in the year 2000, but in 30 months after the treaties are ratified, the area now included in the Canal Zone would become subject to the laws of Panama, to the police of Panama, and to the courts of Panama. I think that is a situation that would be fraught with great difficulty. There is no mechanism, no machinery provided for in these treaties to resolve the disputes that would arise.

Furthermore, I believe the defects—and I have only focused on a few of those which concern me—are so basic and so serious that they cannot be remedied by trying to rewrite the treaties on the Senate Floor.

Although these treaties should not be ratified, I believe there is a course open to the Senate other than outright rejection. Despite all of his knowledge about the history of the canal, or perhaps because of it, David McCullough, the distinguished author of "The Path Between the Seas" acknowledged before the committee that he had experienced great difficulty in reaching a personal decision about the merit of these treaties. Although he finally decided, on balance, to support the treaties, he made a very profound and perceptive point in his testimony before this committee. I would like to quote him:

"... if we say 'yes' to these (treaties) in a grudging way . . . (because we think) we have painted ourselves into a corner and we have to get out . . . (that would be) unfortunate . . . (and) just as wrong, and in some ways a greater mistake than to say 'no' in the spirit of saying 'no' because (it should be) done right—because we don't want to have to come back in 15 or 20 years and have to do it all over again."

Under the Constitution, of course, the Senate's role is one of "advice and consent." Instead of consenting to these treaties, I believe it would be a wiser course for the Senate to exercise only its "advice" authority. In other words, without rejecting these treaties outright, I believe it would be wise for the Senate in this instance to advise the President to send the negotiators back to the drawing boards with instructions to persist until a more acceptable treaty can be fashioned.

I want to say in all sincerity that I respect the two Senate leaders and those of my colleagues who have come to a contrary conclusion—those who in their own minds are convinced that these treaties do serve the best interests of the United States. To the extent that they have the courage of their convictions, that is in the best interest of the Senate, because I believe with Edmund Burke that a Senator owes his constituents his judgment and should not sacrifice it to public opinion alone.

But, when the call on the merits of an issue is as close as this is, or as I perceive it to be, I think the judgment of the people ought not to be taken lightly. Very honestly and frankly, I have come to the conclusion that in this situation, as is often the case, the people are right.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: FURTHER MODIFICATION IS ESSENTIAL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee completed markup on the proposed Panama Canal treaties yesterday. Their recommendation of an amendment to the neutrality treaty concerning American defense and passage rights through the canal signaled a major shift on the part of both the committee and the State Department, regarding modification of the treaties.

The amendment recommended by the committee is, of course, virtually identical to my proposal of last October that the text of the "Carter-Torrijos understanding" be incorporated directly into the treaty itself—not as an "understanding," not as a "protocol" or "annex," but as an integral feature of the document we are asked to ratify.

When the Senator from Kansas introduced the same amendments on October 17, there were some who said it was an obstructionist tactic. Others said that an understanding might be needed to clarify U.S. defense and passage rights, but that a treaty amendment was neither practical nor necessary. Still others—including the State Department—said that the treaties would stand on their own merits and no further alterations were desirable or necessary. I am happy to say that after 4 months of work by this Senator, as well as others, we appear to have got our point across.

MORE TO BE DONE

But let me emphasize that this initial improvement does not eliminate some of the most troublesome aspects of the proposed treaties. While progress has been made in protecting America's vital interests, the threshold of acceptability has not yet been crossed, in this Senator's view. There is more that can and must be accomplished if the Panama Canal treaties are to guarantee that future generations do not have to grapple with problems created by these treaties. My position is not one of obstinacy, but of commitment to the principle that we should not create problems for the long run, by glossing over our misgivings in the short run.

The Senate must still confront the very important issues of the duration of the transition period, our rights to a base agreement in Panama after the year 2000, and whether we are to close our options to construct a new canal outside Panama if we so choose. These and other matters will be thoroughly discussed, I am sure, during the forthcoming Senate debate on these treaties.

Finally, I think it is important to note that the Senate's primary responsibility in the ratification process is to determine whether these treaties are in the Nation's best interests—not whether or not our actions might lead to further negotiations or referendums in Panama. There has developed among some Members a "preoccupation with the plebiscite problem," to the extent that this has become the foremost point of attention in their treaty ratification efforts. In making every effort to avoid the necessity of further treaty negotiations or popular referendums in Panama, the Senate risks the obvious inclination to overlook serious defects and shortcomings in the treaties. As undesirable as further delays might be to the State Department or the Panamanian Government, it is essential that the U.S. Senate fulfill its obligation to fully "advise and consent" on the substance of the treaties.

That is why further amendments and reservations may be necessary, and may well be approved by the Senate during the next several weeks. Our attention must remain directed to the long-term consequences of the treaty, and not to the inconveniences of the moment.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ABOUT SENATE RATIFICATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to direct the attention of my colleagues to two documents which may facilitate the forthcoming Senate debate on the proposed Panama Canal Treaties. Both contain highly relevant information pertaining to the treaty ratification processes of the United States and Panama, and I believe that every Member of the Senate will want to be thoroughly familiar with these basic facts before debate begins.

The first document, prepared by the Senate steering committee, is an authoritative review of the distinctions between treaty amendments, reservations, and understandings. Citing a number of historical precedents, this paper clarifies the impact and the consequences of the various treaty modification procedures. There are important differences that every Member of the Senate should be aware of, as this may well be a point of contention in the forthcoming debate.

The second item is a report prepared by the Library of Congress at my request, detailing the treaty ratification provisions of the Panamanian Constitution. The report suggests specific conditions under which a new popular plebiscite might be required in Panama as a result of Senate action.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that both of these documents be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

UNDERSTANDINGS, RESERVATIONS, AND AMENDMENTS TO THE INTERNATIONAL TREATIES

Under the Constitution, the Senate has the role of providing advice and consent to the President on international treaties. The popular misconception notwithstanding, the Senate does not ratify treaties; this act is constitutionally part of the President's role. The "advice" it provides is nonetheless binding on the Chief Executive. In its first years of existence, the Senate limited its actions to acceptance or rejection of treaties. A precedent was set in 1794, however, when an amended version of the Jay Treaty was approved; since then modifications have been included in about sixteen per cent of all international treaties approved by the Senate.

In approving changes on the floor of Congress, the action of the Senate is not technically that of "amending" a treaty (an act which is not within its constitutional province), but rather that of giving detailed "advice" to the President, who, if he decides to proceed with the treaty, is bound to accept it and initiate whatever additional negotiations with the other parties these changes might entail. Changes made by the Senate have at times been quite substantive. The Gadsden Purchase Treaty of 1853 with Mexico was virtually redrafted on the Senate floor; this example, although not representative, indicates the degree to which the Senate may impose fundamental changes. In stipulating conditions, moreover, the Senate has often approved provisions differing sharply with the views of the President or the other nation involved. According to statistics compiled in 1967, one out of every three treaties approved conditionally by the Senate up to that time was subsequently rejected either by the President or another party for the agreement.

There are several kinds of modifications: statements, declarations, understandings, reservations and amendments. All have been employed by the Senate at one time or another. Unlike treaties, which must be approved by two-thirds of those Senators present and voting, these modifications are adopted by a simple majority vote. The Senate may also choose to express its views in the Committee Report, thus making its concerns part of the legislative history of the treaty.

The terms "understanding," "statement," and "declaration" are generally used for statements which clarify or explain a country's position on a given matter in the treaty, or which give notice of a certain policy or principle; these, in other words, are statements which clarify but do not change a contractual relationship.

A reservation, by contrast, is a statement whose effect is to alter the contractual relationship. The difference between an amendment and a reservation is not necessarily one of substance, but rather of procedure. By definition an amendment involves a change in the authentic text of the treaty, and results (if the President wants to proceed with the treaty) in further negotiations with the other parties leading to the adoption of new language. While new rounds of talks are frequently held as a result of reservations, a fundamental difference between amendments and reservations is that the latter do not organically lead to such exchanges.

Although the country imposing conditions may use whatever terms it chooses (understanding, reservation, etc.) to describe them, it is ultimately their substance, and in particular the other parties' perception of this substance, that determines how they are treated. Country A might label a condition as an "understanding," thereby implying that the statement is tangential to the basic operation of the treaty; Country B, however, may feel it is substantial enough to be a "reservation," and treat it as such. Similarly, just as Country A is free to describe a reservation as relating exclusively to its personal obligations, Country B has the right to assert it changes the contractual relationship between all the parties.

Upon receipt of the Senate's conditional consent, the President has several options. He may ratify the treaty, and later notify the other parties of the conditions (or follow these steps in reverse order); he may fail to execute ratification if he considers the conditions to be totally objectionable; and he may also return the treaty to the Senate with additional explanation or for further consideration. There are no limits, either procedurally or legally, to the number of times the Senate might be asked by the President to reconsider conditions it has already insisted on.

With regard to acceptance of reservations (or understandings, statements or declarations) by the other government involved, it is customary in bilateral Inter-American treaties for that government's view to be sought and obtained before ratification takes place. If the conditions are found acceptable, ratification, whereby the instruments of ratification are exchanged by the two nations, can take place.

The second country may convey its acceptance of a reservation either explicitly or tacitly. With reference to the latter, if a country ratifies an agreement without making reference to a reservation by the other nation, but being in full knowledge of it, under traditional law its approval of the treaty is interpreted to embrace acceptance of the reservation.

While this procedure does not normally result in problems, confusion has occasionally arisen, with nations lodging objections after the ratification ceremony.

The second nation may also make explicit reference to its acceptance of a reservation in its instruments of ratification. This procedure makes its acceptance of the reservation binding beyond dispute. Consequently, were the legislative body of Country A concerned about Country B respecting its reservations, it could make ratification by the Chief Executive contingent of receipt of diplomatic messages from Country B explicitly acknowledging and accepting these reservations.

The response of the second party is not always one of simple acceptance of a reservation. At times, it may attach reservations of its own in response to those imposed by the first party. Traditionally, when such reservations are received by the United States after the Senate has finished its consideration of the treaty, they are dealt with by the Executive Branch. The President consults with the Senate on them, but does not normally submit them to that body for official consideration.

Other options open to the second country upon inclusion of reservations by the first are to indicate a desire to reopen negotiations, or to simply withdraw from the treaty.

Amendments, as has been stated previously, automatically lead to further negotiations, in the course of which the Chief Executive of the nation proposing these changes seeks to obtain the approval of the other party for the substitute language. The reopening of negotiations per se does not annul the agreement which has already been signed. Consequently, if an American President fails to achieve agreement by the other party on the proposed changes, he may resubmit the original text to the Senate for renewed consideration.

If any changes are made at all in the wording of the treaty, a new signing ceremony must take place, and the text submitted to the Senate for approval as though it were a new treaty. If this occurs, and the new language agreed to by the second party incorporates some, but not all, of the changes stipulated by the Senate, it is then up to that body to decide between approval of the new text of insistence on the remainder of its earlier amendments. Should it vote to take the latter course, the President would have to reopen negotiations yet another time.

In the case of amendments, the other parties to the treaty would also have to follow the steps provided for under its laws to gain approval of the new language. In the case of Panama, for example, that country's constitution requires a national referendum on any treaty relating to the Canal. Presumably, then, modification of the language of the Panama Canal treaties already approved by the Panamanian people would be contingent on a second referendum. According to the State Department, were General Torrijos to ratify an amended text on his own initiative, the legality of that treaty would be highly susceptible to challenge (and, by inference, the possibility exists that the 1903 treaty would still be in force).

SUMMARY

Historically, the Senate has frequently imposed conditions on the ratification of international agreements. If the Senate uses the language of "understanding," the implication is that the contractual relationship between the parties is merely being clarified. If the Senate attaches a "reservation," to the resolution of advice and consent, the inference is that the obligation incurred under the treaty is being modified. Finally, if the Senate adds an amendment, a change is being made which involves an alteration of the actual treaty text.

Upon receipt of the Senate's advice and consent, the President may ratify the treaty, informing the other parties of the Senate's conditions in the process (in the case of reservations and understandings); he may return the treaty to the Senate for further consideration; or he may simply lay the treaty aside, taking no further steps toward its ratification. When amendments have been added to the treaty by the Senate, the President must initiate further negotiations with the other parties, unless he selects to simply put the treaty aside. If a new text emerges from these negotiations, it must be submitted to the Senate for advice and consent as though it were a new treaty. Before ratification can take place, the other parties to the treaty also have to obtain approval for the new text in accordance with the steps called for under their legal systems and constitutions.

PLEBISCITE FOR AMENDMENTS TO PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

PANAMA

The requester desires an opinion as to whether amendments to the Panama Canal Treaties would require a new plebiscite in Panama.

I. Constitutional provisions

The Constitution currently in force in Panama was enacted and came into effect on October 11, 1972.¹ According to its article 163 (4) one of the functions of the President of the Republic is "to conduct foreign relations, to accredit and receive diplomatic and consular agents, and to enter into international treaties and agreements, which shall be submitted to the National Assembly for consideration."

This provision, also present in all past Panamanian constitutions, has two important exceptions in the current constitution. First, article 277 (transitory) recognizes Brigadier General Omar Torrijos Herrera, Commander in Chief of the National Guard, as the Supreme Leader of the Panamanian Revolution, and, in order to ensure the fulfillment of the objectives of the revolutionary process, authorizes him to exercise for a 6-year period a number of public functions, one of which is the direction of the country's foreign relations.

The second exception related to treaties dealing with the Panaman Canal, which under the purview of articles 274 (transitory) of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

Art. 274. Treaties which may be signed by the Executive Organ with respect to the Panama Canal, its adjacent zone, and the protection of the said Canal, and for the construction of a new Canal at sea level or of a third set of locks, shall be submitted to a national plebiscite.

Finally, article 141 of the Constitution provides that the functions of the National Assembly of Municipal Representatives (Asamblea Nacional de Representantes de Corregimientos) include enacting laws for several purposes, among which is: "1. To approve or reject public treaties signed by the Executive."

As far as we can ascertain no other constitutional or statutory provisions regulate this subject.

II. The plebiscite of October 23, 1977

Law 33 of September 13, 1977,² submitted the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal to a plebiscite in the following terms:

Act 1. A plebiscite is hereby convened that shall take place on October 23, 1977, [with the purpose] that the citizens though their vote shall decide whether or not they approve the new Treaty of the Panama Canal, the Treaty concerning the permanent neutrality of the Panama Canal, and the related agreements and annexes signed between the Governments of Panama and the United States of America on Wednesday, September 7, 1977.

According to article 11 of the same law voters had to choose between ballots saying "yes" or "no" to the following proposition provided by article 10 of the same law:

"I agree with the new Treaty of the Panama Canal, the Treaty concerning the Permanent Neutrality of the Canal and the Operation of the Panama Canal, the minutes agreed upon, the exchanges of notes, maps, the related agreements, and the annexes signed between the Governments of Panama and the United States of America on Wednesday, September 7, 1977."

Neither the text of the ballot nor any other provisions of Law 33 of 1977 referred to future amendments to the treaties being approved by the Plebiscite of October 23, 1977.

In the Plebiscite the Canal treaties were approved by a wide margin by Panamanian voters.³ It appears, therefore, that the remaining constitutional step would be the enactment of the treaties as a law by the National Assembly, according to article 141 of the Constitution, cited above.

III. Conclusions

The 1972 Panamanian Constitution requires that treaties signed by the Executive concerning the Panama Canal must be submitted to a national plebiscite for their approval. Neither the Constitution nor any statutory provision states whether or not a plebiscite is required in the case of amendments to treaties already approved by a plebiscite. Therefore, the law governing the subject must be interpreted by resorting to sources other than the statutes themselves.

The requirement of a plebiscite for the approval of treaties dealing with the Canal was established for the first time in the 1972 Panamanian Constitution. Unfortunately, the materials available to this Library do not cover the legislative history of this Constitution or provide any other judicial, administrative, or even monographic sources related to this problem, preventing us from issuing a substantiated opinion on the subject at the present time.

We can note, however, some of the basic elements that may be considered, within the context of Panamanian law, for arriving at a definite opinion on the subject:

(1) The Plebiscite of October 23, 1977, as noted in part II above, approved the text of the Panama Canal treaties and related agreements and documents as signed by the Governments of Panama and the United States on a specific date: September 7, 1977.

(2) The eventual amendments to the treaties could range from mere formalities to substantial modifications to the nature, extent, and content of the treaties; therefore, the content and nature of the amendments to be introduced to the treaties may determine, to an important extent, the necessity for a new plebiscite.

(3) According to Panamanian law, the interpretation of this legal problem can be considered an attribute of the Executive, which is in charge of the conduct of foreign relations, but the National Assembly of Municipal Representatives could consider the problem while passing the treaties as a law. Also, the Supreme Court could eventually be asked to rule about the legality of the treaties and their formal approval is an important element of the case.⁴

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I testified last Thursday at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on the Panama Canal treaties.

I ask unanimous consent that my testimony be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE ROBERT C. BYRD

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I will not unduly detain the committee and its work today.

I certainly want to express my appreciation for the opportunity to appear before the committee today.

I want to commend you, Mr. Chairman, and commend the members of the committee for the diligence of the committee in giving such extensive consideration to the treaties and to the issues that are related to the treaties.

The record you have made in your hearings, involving a wide range of witnesses, constitutes an invaluable source of information on this subject for the public and for the Senate.

I particularly appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the manner in which you and the committee are responding to my request in regard to the timing of the conclusion of your action on the treaties. In my letter of December 1, 1977, to you, Mr. Chairman, I asked the committee to attempt to report the treaties by about January 25 so that the Senate would be able to move to consideration of the treaties shortly thereafter, certainly in early February. I am gratified that the committee has been able to adhere to that schedule.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that you and your colleagues are aware of my announced position in support of the treaties, provided certain conditions, which I will shortly refer to, are met.

Today I want to reiterate that strong support. It will not be a passive support; it will be an active support. And, I want to elaborate on some of the reasons why I believe that ratification is the right step to take.

In reaching this decision, I have attempted to consider all of the relevant factors in an objective manner. An important part of this process was the visit to Panama in November by a delegation of Senators which I led. It was a seven-member Senate delegation, and on that delegation was Senator Sarbanes, who is present. I believe that he was the only member of your committee on that particular visit.

I am pleased to see that most members of this committee have also visited Panama in recent weeks.

I suspect that, as in my own case, the trip was of great benefit in furthering your knowledge and understanding of the issues involved.

Since I first had the opportunity to review the treaties in September, it has been apparent to me that it would be necessary to clarify and guarantee at least two important points, and that this would need to be done in order to gain public support for, and Senate approval of, the treaties. I stated this position as early as last September.

The two critical points as far as I am concerned are:

One, the rights of the United States to guarantee neutral access to the canal at all times, beyond the year 2000; and

Two, expeditious, or "head-of-the-line", passage for United States military and auxiliary vessels.

I stressed to President Carter the importance of clarifying these matters, these two points, before the Panamanian plebiscite on the treaties on October 23. Some members of this committee will recall a subsequent meeting at the White House at which this was discussed. Thereafter, on October 14, President Carter and General Torrijos agreed to the Statement of Understanding clarifying these two important points.

Our Senatorial delegation discussed this Statement of Understanding with General Torrijos when we were in Panama, as did your group and as did the delegation led by the distinguished member of the committee, our distinguished Minority Leader, Senator Baker. General Torrijos stated to our delegation clearly that he subscribed to the agreement and would be willing to sign it.

Furthermore, it was clear that the Panamanian people had been fully informed about these points before the plebiscite, particularly through the televised address to the nation by General Torrijos on October 20, as well as through newspaper accounts. Our delegation viewed a videotape of General Torrijos' October 20 address while we were in Panama.

In view of all this, there should not be any doubt about our right—and about the recognition of that right by the Panamanians—to defend the canal. However, because this will be a matter of importance to future generations—and so that there can be no question about the interpretation as enunciated by General Torrijos and President Carter in their joint statement—I have consistently taken the position that the substance of the October 14 statement should be formally approved and incorporated in appropriate language and through the proper parliamentary technique by the Senate. Senator Baker, the Minority Leader, has expressed similar concerns, and he and I have, upon several occasions, discussed the necessity for the Senate to take some formal, positive action in this regard. It is our intention to continue to work with members of the committee and with other Senators in seeing that such action is taken.

Senator Baker and I discussed this with some of you recently. We will continue to discuss it with you. The committee is well aware of our position in this regard.

Like most Americans, I take great pride in the Panama Canal. It represents a monumental achievement. Even in today's space age it remains one of history's outstanding engineering feats. As David McCullough, who testified before you a few days ago, wrote in "The Path Between the Seas," the creation of a water passage across Panama was one of the supreme human achievements of all time, the culmination of a heroic dream of 400 years and of more than 20 years of phenomenal effort and sacrifice.

However, while taking justifiable pride in the role that the United States played in constructing and operating the canal, we must also try to understand the pride and the aspirations of the Panamanians. It is their nation—their nation, not ours, it is not my State of West Virginia—that is bisected by a strip of land and water controlled by a foreign power. It is their country that is bisected by the Canal Zone.

One of the benefits of traveling to Panama was the opportunity not only to see things on a first-hand basis, but also to hear the views of the Panamanians. The trip of my delegation to Panama certainly heightened my awareness of how the Panamanians feel, of how American businessmen feel who are in Panama, of how Americans who are living in Panama feel, and of how Americans who live in the Canal Zone feel.

We met with people who are opposed to and supportive of the treaty. We met with the opposition lawyers group. We met with students. We met with Panamanian government officials and with our own government officials. We tried to get a first-hand basic viewpoint from as many sources as possible—both pro and con.

Our discussions with Panamanians, as well as with U.S. citizens, served as a reminder that the 13 years of negotiations under Republican and Democratic Administrations which led to the treaties involved a two-sided process, attempting to reconcile the interests of both nations.

During the period since the treaties were signed, I have been impressed by the good faith exhibited by the Panamanians. Panama's interests and our own interests are closely interwoven. And, after visiting Panama, I am more hopeful and more confident about that country's future political direction, particularly if the Senate approves these treaties, and if they are ratified by the President.

The Senatorial delegation of which I was a member expressed some strong concerns to General Torrijos about human rights and civil liberties in Panama. Senator Sarbanes, in particular, Senator Metzenbaum, and Senator Riegle were among those who expressed these concerns. General Torrijos pledged to that delegation that steps would be taken to abrogate certain repressive laws, including those which had limited the right of assembly and had provided for summary trial and detention.

He has subsequently informed me that these laws have been abrogated, and that action is being taken to insure greater press freedom as well.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to focus my own analysis of the treaties on one basic question and I stated this in Panama. May I say, parenthetically, that there is no political mileage for any United States Senator in voting for these treaties. Any Senator who votes for these treaties, in my judgment, will have some of the political skin taken off his political nose. And, that is true in the State of West Virginia as elsewhere.

But I believe that as people become better informed concerning the history of the treaties, the content of the treaties, and the implications upon future relations with other countries, particularly Latin American countries, of ratification of the treaties—or, on the other hand, rejection thereof—I believe that a well-informed public, will see that the treaties in the long run are in the best interests of the United States.

This has been the basic question on which I have tried to focus, and I believe that my delegation felt the same. What is in the best interests of the United States? Is ratification of the treaties in the best interests of the United States?

I have concluded that the weight of the evidence argues convincingly that approval and ratification of the treaties are in the best interests of the United States. Indeed, these treaties better protect our long-term interests than does the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, which was never signed by any Panamanian.

Panamanians have long resented that treaty and the unusual circumstances under which it was concluded.

The new treaties would provide Panama with a greater stake in the canal and thus a stronger interest in its efficient and unimpeded operation.

I believe that those of us who have been to the canal are aware of the potential vulnerability of many of the canal facilities. I was particularly impressed by the obvious vulnerability of the facilities to sabotage, to terrorist activity, to guerrilla action. This was particularly apparent during our helicopter overflight of the canal. The potential threats cannot be overlooked.

However, under these treaties the United States would retain a high degree of control over the canal through the end of this century, as well as defense rights thereafter. We will have the right to take action against any aggression, or threat directed against the canal, or the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal after the year 2000.

This must be made clear by the United States Senate as it acts on the approval of these treaties.

In my view, these treaties are the best means of assuring continued access to and use of the canal—and that should be our primary concern.

I have been particularly impressed by the testimony of our top-ranking military officers in support of the treaties. The men who are responsible today—not yesterday, not 50 years ago—but those who are responsible today for the defense of this country support these treaties. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have pointed out that the strategic value of the canal, is in its use, in keeping it open. That is more easily assured if we enjoy cooperation and goodwill from the Panamanians, rather than confrontation with Panama or resentment on the part of the Panamanians.

Although we want to maintain ready access to the canal, there have been significant changes and advances in alternative modes of transportation in recent years. Further, our giant aircraft carriers, as well as the largest cargo ships and the new super tankers, are too big to transit the canal.

Mr. Chairman, I know the committee has looked at all aspects of the treaties, as I have endeavored to do. They rank among the foremost international issues of our time. The committee's action will, I believe, affect the course of international relations with Latin America for many years.

I hope the committee will conclude that, in the final analysis, these treaties are true to our own national values, and that ratifying them will be consistent with our role as a leader among nations. Approval of the treaties is particularly important for our future relations with Latin America and should open a new era of mutual trust and cooperation in inter-American relations.

In discussions with representatives of Colombia and Venezuela, I have found that they are very supportive of the treaties.

It has been claimed by some that approval of the treaties would give rise to increased communist influence in Panama. In my judgment, just the opposite is true. The best way to prevent increased communist influence is to approve the treaties. Our failure to do so would almost certainly give renewed impetus to extremist elements on the right and on the left in the area and would open the way for greater Soviet and Cuban involvement.

As I mentioned earlier, Panama's history is closely interwoven with our own. I believe that the Panamanians desire friendly relations with us. That is their natural inclination. These treaties offer the best way to assure good relations between our nations and to discourage the rise of communism in that area.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I want to express the hope that the committee, in its recommendations to the Senate, will provide guidance for the Senate as to how the Senate might best meet the concerns that many of us have about the treaties, without creating the necessity for reopening the negotiations, and, I would hope, without creating the necessity for another plebiscite in Panama. That could be a situation fraught with danger and uncertainty and could undercut all that has been done to move us toward a successful resolution of the matter.

Mr. Chairman, the Panama Canal, as David McCullough has written, is an expression of that old and noble desire to bridge the divide, to bring people together. Certainly, the canal has done this in many respects. Now, however, the time has come to bridge the divide between Panama and the United States and for the two nations to work together in seeing that the canal continues to serve the people of the United States and Panama and the world.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the role of an elected representative in a democracy is not only that of a constituent servant. We are elected also to use our own best judgment, and it is my opinion that the elected official who abandons his judgment in favor of popular sentiment abdicates his responsibility to bring his own faculties to bear on the issues of the day.

If I believed I was sent to Washington by the people of Vermont simply to poll them and reflect the results in my own votes, I would be compelled to oppose the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties. But I do not believe that. On the contrary, I believe each of us is bound to come to our own determination of what is in the best interest of the Nation and the people of our respective States.

With that in mind, I am here this morning to announce that after months of studying the canal treaties and discussing them with many of my constituents, after listening to the public debate on the issue and in light of what I observed during my recent trip to Panama, it is my judgment that the treaties, as modified by the Carter-Torrijos clarification of October 14, should be ratified and I will work toward that end.

As a Nation which categorically rejects colonialism, our only valid interest in the canal is that it continue to operate in the manner it has since it was completed in 1914. We must insure that the canal will remain open to the world shipping and secure from military threat. The question then becomes how best to accomplish that. The answer is ratification of the treaties.

Prior to my trip to Panama, I had been told by a number of different people how difficult it would be to defend the canal from either internal or external attack. The Joint Chiefs of Staff estimate that at least 100,000 U.S. troops would be required.

But as I flew over the canal, it became clear to me how grossly I had underestimated the vulnerability of the canal. I am not a military expert, but with all due respect to our Armed Forces, I doubt the canal could be adequately protected by 100,000 American soldiers.

Given that situation, one can more clearly understand the opinion of Defense Secretary Harold Brown when he told the Foreign Relations Committee:

Ability to defend and control access to the canal is essential. But the issue is how that ability can best be assured—by a cooperative effort with a friendly Panama or by a garrison amid hostile surroundings.

If we learned nothing else from Vietnam, certainly we discovered the difficulty of fighting indigenous forces in their own jungle terrain.

By ratifying the treaties and truly making the Panama Canal Panamanian, we increase the stake the Panamanians have in keeping the canal open. Increased toll revenues will be a keystone of their national economy and colonial resentment can give way to nationalistic pride.

Those are a few of the pragmatic reasons for ratifying these treaties. But there are other reasons, reasons that I feel are ultimately far more important in terms of our country's relationship with the rest of the world, and surely in terms of its relationship with Latin America.

As has been pointed out before, there are elements in the history of the canal that we cannot and should not look upon with pride. We cannot be proud that we fostered the Panamanian revolution from Colombia in 1903 and then concluded the original canal treaty with a Frenchman who never returned to Panama. We cannot be proud that that original treaty was never signed by a Panamanian.

But we have every reason to be proud of the way in which we have operated the canal. That operation has always been marked by scrupulous neutrality, and we have never operated the canal as a money-making venture. Rather, we have maintained it as a nonprofit service to world shipping. And obviously, the canal stands as an incredible technological feat today, to say nothing of the era in which it was built. Indeed, in this regard it ranks with the building of the pyramids and the landing of a man on the moon.

Despite this record of operation, the canal remains a constant reminder of an earlier, less enlightened era in our foreign policy. The memory is not a happy one for our American neighbors to the south and has proven to be a barrier to better relations with those neighbors. The Organization of American States unanimously supports the new treaties. To reject them would invite worsened relations with Central and South America.

But there is even more at stake than our relations with the nations of the Western Hemisphere. The entire Third World would regard rejection of the treaties as a further indication of our lack of commitment to political and economic justice for the developing countries.

Much has been written and said about how ratification of the treaties would play into the hands of the Communists. I believe the effect would be quite the opposite, for I suspect the Communists would rejoice at the loss in world opinion we would suffer if the treaties are rejected.

I will have more to say on these matters during the Senate debate on ratification as I plan to take an active role in that debate. Also, I will be sending my constituents a letter in which I will outline the arguments both for and against the treaties and detail my reasons for supporting them. I am sure most of them will be convinced of the merit of this decision.

This is not the most momentous issue of foreign policy that we face as a nation. Certainly the upcoming SALT treaty is of substantially greater world importance. But the Panama Canal treaties represent one of the most controversial questions in the country today. It is our responsibility to study and act on this issue rationally in the same way we would a more obscure bit of business. If that is our approach, it seems to me an inescapable conclusion that the option of ratifying these treaties will better insure the future operation of the canal than any military option available to us, and it will enhance the standing of the United States in our own hemisphere and in the world at large.

The greater and more powerful a country is, the greater the responsibility that country has to be just. The United States is the greatest and most powerful nation in the world—it can afford this act of overdue justice.

Mr. President, I yield back the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senate yield?

Mr. LEAHY. I certainly will yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I commend the Senator on his statement, on the logic of his statement, and on his courage in taking a position that is an unpopular one in any State, I would judge at this time. But the Senator has demonstrated this type of courage before, and he has demonstrated this kind of vision and understanding, and I am not surprised that he has taken the unpopular position in this instance, believing that in the long run his position is in the best interests of the country.

I applaud him and I salute him.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I might say that the decision is certainly made easier by the enlightened leadership on this position shown by the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader.

I discussed this matter with the President of the United States yesterday, and I made it a point to commend to the President the leadership of the Senate. There are many who, because of their office, because of their national office, such as the one that our distinguished majority leader holds, have far more at stake politically in taking the positions they have taken. Certainly that is a leadership position that commends itself to all of us.

I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for his very, very kind remarks.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY—EXECUTIVE N, 95—1

AMENDMENT NO. 18

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATCH, as in executive session, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Executive N, 95—1, the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there is an important consideration regarding the Panama Canal Treaties that has been overlooked thus far in our discussion of these agreements. In our efforts to unravel all of the mysteries associated with the precise meanings of various provisions of the treaties as they appear in the English text, we have neglected to examine the language in the Spanish text to determine whether it accurately reflects the language in our own documents. I am persuaded that there are a number of discrepancies which warrant our concern.

Recently, the Senate steering committee, of which I am a member, prepared a comparative analysis of the English and Spanish versions of the treaties. This study is entitled "The English and Spanish Texts of the 1977 Panama Canal Treaties: A Comparison." It was written by Silvia Castellanos, a bilingual staff member of the committee, with the assistance of linguists and legal experts drawn from the universities and the Library of Congress. The study contains a line-by-line analysis of the language in the two versions of the treaties, and concludes that "inconsistencies abound in the documents."

On January 25, 1978, my distinguished colleague from Alabama (Mr. Allen) inserted in the Record the overview section of this study, which summarizes the basic problems of translation in the documents. I commend Senator Allen for calling our attention to this study, and urge Senators to examine it closely. Copies of the full study are available at my office, 6317 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Mr. President, these inconsistencies create a second layer of problems for the United States. Their presence means that we must contend not only with conflicting interpretations of the English text, but also the Spanish meaning of every word in the documents.

Why the State Department did not carry out its responsibility of insuring that the two versions of the treaties are substantively the same is a question that I cannot answer. I do know, however, that these discrepancies indicate carelessness on the part of the State Department, and arouse skepticism in my mind regarding State Department assurances in the past about the proper interpretations of the agreement and the intentions of the negotiators.

In anticipation of serious disagreements between the United States and Panama about these matters, I am today submitting an amendment to the treaties which would establish needed guidelines for the resolution of controversies pertaining to the proper interpretation of these agreements. The amendment provides that the English text shall prevail whenever there are differences of interpretation between the United States and the Republic of Panama.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 18

In the signature clause thereof, strike out "both texts being equally authentic" and insert in lieu thereof "but, in case of divergence, the English language text shall be binding on the two Parties".

SECRETARY VANCE CLARIFIES U.S. ECONOMIC COMMITMENT UNDER THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. STONE. Mr. President of great concern to many Americans has been the question: What economic commitments to Panama is the United States entering into under the Panama Canal treaties? Many people have been concerned that our financial commitments will be quite extensive and I have shared their concern.

For this reason I questioned the Department of State extensively during Senate Foreign Relations Committee markup of the treaties and proposed: First an amendment eliminating language from article XIII paragraph 1 of the main treaty requiring the United States to turn over the canal to Panama in the year 2000 "free from liens or debts" and second an understanding that no financial obligation from the United States to Panama is established by ratification of the treaties other than the specifically stated toll revenue provisions of article XIII.

In response to my concerns, Secretary of State Vance today sent me a detailed letter stating clearly that:

First, there are no "hidden or secret" financial agreements or obligations between the United States and Panama arising from these treaties.

Second, the only financial obligations of these treaties are specifically stated in the treaty. Economic and military assistance to Panama would continue only by the regular annual appropriations process involving the Congress.

Third, there will be, at the end of fiscal year 1978, no Panama Canal Company outstanding long-term obligations. Any future liens and debts which may arise would be subject to United States control and approval.

This letter is a useful and informative declaration summarizing the nature of the economic relationship between the United States and Panama arising out of the Panama Canal treaties. It has clarified my concerns and will be a useful addition to the record for the Senate debate and a historical document for interpretation of this economic relationship between our countries in future generations. I ask unanimous consent that this letter be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C.

Hon. RICHARD STONE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR DICK. This is with reference to the concerns which you raised during the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Hearings of January 27, and the proposals you made to clarify the nature of the U.S. financial obligation under the proposed Panama Canal Treaty. It is understood that the intended purpose of these two proposals is to ensure that ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty would impose no "hidden" financial obligations of the United States to Panama.

We wish to assure you that all proposed financial commitments to Panama under the new Treaty have been fully disclosed. There are no "secret" agreements. Moreover, we wish to set forth the following specific assurances with regard to the particular concerns you raised.

First, the only financial obligations to the Republic of Panama resulting from the Treaty are those specifically set forth in the Treaty and the two Agreements in Implementation. The contemplated economic and military cooperation programs described in my note to the Panamanian Ambassador of September 7, 1977, would not come into being unless and until (a) a further exchange of notes is entered into between the two Governments and (b) all applicable legislative and program criteria have been met with respect to each proposed project, including the availability of appropriated funds where necessary. These contemplated programs were intentionally made the subject of a separate instrument not legally related to the Treaty to assure that the rights and obligations of the Parties under the Treaty would not be contingent in any way upon the contemplated programs. In short, ratification of the Treaty would establish no obligation on the part of the U.S. with respect to these programs or any similar financial transactions that may be proposed in the future. Rather, these programs are to be addressed on their own merits in accordance with applicable U.S. law and program criteria.

Second, you expressed concern that the U.S. obligation under Article XIII(1) to turn the Canal over to Panama upon the termination of the Treaty in operating condition "and free of liens and debts, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree" be clarified. This provision was included in the Treaty in recognition of the fact that until the termination of the Treaty on December 31, 1999, the Canal will be operated and managed by a United States Government agency in accordance with U.S. law. Accordingly, the U.S. will retain the authority to structure the financial management of the Canal operation as it sees fit.

Our management authority under the Treaty is so broad that the U.S. could, for example, authorize the new Commission to borrow funds from private sources. Accordingly, it was considered appropriate to provide Panama the assurance contained in the quoted phrase that the U.S. would turn over the Canal free and clear, and not subject to a mortgage to which Panama did not consent.

In this connection, I would note that the U.S. has always operated the Canal on a self-sustaining basis, and that the Panama Canal Company has never had to exercise the authority granted it by law to borrow from the U.S. Treasury. In FY 1976 it did use its legal authority to defer $93 million of certain statutorily required payments to the Treasury. It has already paid part of this deferred amount and will pay the remaining $39 million in FY 1978. Once this payment has been made, the Company will have no outstanding long-term obligations and will have continued its record of meeting all its expenses from operating revenues.

The Treaty does, however, provide that if the two Parties agree, liens and debts may be carried over. For example, during the last years of U.S. operation, a major capital improvement might seem desirable, but the U.S. might not wish to finance all of the expenditures required given the remaining length of its tenure as Canal operator. In these circumstances, the Parties could agree to an arrangement whereby Panama would assume responsibility for amortizing the debt involved in the investment when it took over management of the operation. Thus, the Treaty embodies a balanced and responsible approach to the problems involved in a transition from one manager to another.

I trust that the foregoing clarifications and assurances will fully meet the important and legitimate concerns you so clearly defined during the Committee hearings.

With warm regards,

Sincerely,

CYRUS R. VANCE.

THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I have before me an excellent article which appeared in the Tuesday, November 29, 1977, New York Times on the Panama Canal controversy.

It was written by one of our most respected diplomats and statesmen, our friend John Davis Lodge.

Mr. President, this is a scholarly article which should be brought to the attention of each Member of the Senate before the debate begins on the canal treaties, and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE CANAL: A RAMPART

(By John Davis Lodge)

WESTPORT, CONN.—The principal arguments veliemently raised in support of the Panama Canal treaties are not altogether convincing.

It is alleged in screeching tones that we stole it. That is contrary to the record. It was an act of constructive statesmanship by one of our great Presidents, Theodore Roosevelt. It constitutes a notable public service by the United States to the entire world. We should not be apologetic but proud of this unprecedented engineering achievement. We succeeded where the French failed. But for us, the Panama Canal would not exist. In one way or another it has been paid for by us many times over.

Should we now say that the Louisiana Purchase, by which President Thomas Jefferson bought one-third of the United States from Napoleon for $15 million, was a steal and that therefore we should return this vast area to France? And how about Alaska? And Hawaii?

It is asserted that the Panama Canal constitutes an anachronistic vestige of colonialism in a decolonializing world. Certainly the British, French, Spaniards and Portuguese have been shedding their colonies. But how about the Russians and their satellites? Are these satellites not in effect colonies?

Moreover, the Panama Canal Zone is not a colony. It is inhabited by many thousands of Americans. True, it is not contiguous to the United States, as it is to Panama. Is contiguity then the criterion? Well then, how about Alaska, contiguous to Canada and close to Siberia. Should we hand Alaska over to Canada or perhaps to Russia? Alaska is a state as is Hawaii. Yes—and we could conceivably make a state out of the Panama Canal Zone.

It is declared that the Latin Americans resent the North American presence in the Canal Zone. Yet there are many others who fear Russian control of the canal by means of their control of Fidel Castro's Cuba and Castro's power and influence over Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, the current, temporary, unelected, left-wing, military dictator of Panama. And there are many others around the world who fear that the Panamanians, in spite of their threats and promises, will not run the canal as efficiently as we do. We run it very well indeed.

Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, Uruguay, Paraguay and Ecuador have anti-Communist Governments and fear Communist infiltration of the Canal Zone. Many in these countries would dread our relinquishing control of it.

The principal argument advanced in favor of the treaties is that, as General Torrijos has warned us, if they are not ratified by the Senate there will be trouble in Panama—demonstrations, riots, bombs, guerrilla activity—and that therefore we must agree to the treaties as an act of appeasement—a mini-Munich, if you will—but, in effect, a shotgun arrangement.

We got tired of the Vietnam War, we refused to help in Angola, and so now it is proposed that 217 million Americans should cave in and run away before the ominous threat of 1.5 million people in Panama. This is the worst possible reason for ratification of the treaties, for it portrays us Americans as a supine pack of cowards, a paper tiger who will give in at the slightest threat of combat. It is succumbing to blackmail.

This is the argument that would cause us to lose face and friends and confidence in many parts of the world, particularly in South America, where our sanctimonious sermonizing about human rights has made us unpopular.

Certainly the treaties can properly be revised. However, let us recognize that in the mortal struggle in which we are inextricably involved, for the United States to surrender control of the canal will, in this jungle world, present the enemy with an advantage. While in some ways the canal may be obsolete, in unfriendly hands it could present a difficult and dangerous problem for the United States, especially in the event of a showdown.

The overriding question is this: Is it in the interests of our national security, is it in the best interest of the United States as leader of the non-Communist world to lessen our control of this vital waterway and rampart at a time when Russian imperialism, heavily and increasingly armed, is very much on the march? The national interest must be the determining factor. We should be governed by geopolitical considerations. If we move out, will the enemy eventually move in?

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A MISSING COMPONENT

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, on Tuesday, January 31, Mr. Herbert J. Hansell, legal advisor to the Department of State, testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Mr. Hansell testified that if the proposed new treaties are ratified by the Senate, implementing legislation will need to be enacted.

The implementing legislation will contain crucial interpretations of the treaty language with regard to the appropriations process, pension costs, labor contracts, toll structure, employment practices, accounting procedures, commercial organization, jurisdiction of U.S. courts and law enforcement, and other important detail—including direct costs to the taxpayers.

Just how important is the implementing legislation?

Yesterday that question was put to the Governor of the Canal Zone, Maj. Gen. H. R. Parfitt, when he testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Governor Parfitt replied that it would be most helpful to the Senate in its consideration of the proposed new treaties.

Elmer Staats, Comptroller General of the United States, told the Armed Services Committee that if he were a Senator, he would want to have available the implementing legislation before voting on the treaties.

But the most definitive statement was made by Mr. Hansell in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee on September 29, 1977.

I quote from Mr. Hansell's testimony, he being the legal advisor to the State Department:

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have this opportunity to report to this committee on the proposed legislation to implement these treaties that is being prepared for submission to Congress in the near future. That legislation, of course, will be an essential component of the overall program of implementation of the treaties.

For emphasis I repeat again Mr. Hansell's statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee:

That legislation, of course, will be an essential component of the overall program of implementation of the treaties.

Yet, that "essential component" has not been submitted to the Congress.

Mr. Hansell told the Foreign Relations Committee on September 29, that:

We hope to have a complete draft available for submission to both Houses of Congress within several weeks. We have been at work on it for some period of time. Certainly well before the end of October we expect to have it to you.

But October has come and gone, November has come and gone, December has come and gone, January has come and gone—and still the implementing legislation is not available to the Congress.

Under questioning Tuesday, Mr. Hansell could not tell the committee when such legislation might be available.

The point that I raise with the Senate and the point which I hope the leadership would consider before calling up the Panama Canal treaties is that legislation considered by the State Department "an essential component" in implementing the treaties—and promised to the Congress last October—is not available.

The fact that the legislation was promised to the Congress in October but is not yet available in February suggests to me that it is, indeed, "an essential component" and must, indeed, have wide ramifications and much complexity. Perhaps as a matter of state the administration wishes to withhold this "essential" component for fear of weakening support for the treaties.

But would it be fair, wise or appropriate to require the Senate to debate the proposed new treaties without the Senate having available the "essential component" of legislation that would be required if the treaties are ratified?

To determine whether the treaties are sound and should be enacted requires that all of the facts be available. Yet, the implementing legislation, essential to carrying out the purposes of the treaties, is not available for consideration by the Senate.

I urge delay in calling up the proposed Panama Canal Treaties until the implementing legislation is available for consideration—which legislation the Governor of the Canal Zone said would be helpful to the Senate and would shed light on the matter; and which legislation the State Department terms "an essential component" in implementing the treaties.

In conclusion, I emphasize, too, that the State Department on September 29, 1977 promised the Senate Foreign Relations Committee "a complete draft (would be) available for submission to both Houses of Congress in several weeks."

I have no desire merely to delay consideration of the treaties; I do feel it important to have "essential" components available when the debate begins.

I should think, Mr. President, that the proponents—even more, perhaps, than the opponents—would want this information available to avoid potential serious misunderstanding with Panama and possible difficulties with the House of Representatives in obtaining enactment of implementing legislation.

In ending, I ask this question: How can the treaties be properly debated when essential components are missing?

I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding to me.

SENATE RESOLUTION 268—PROVIDING FOR RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS DURING CONSIDERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, for the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Pell), on behalf of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I send to the desk a resolution, together with the committee report thereon, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hart). The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 268) providing for radio and television coverage of proceedings of the Senate during consideration of the Panama Canal Treaties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration with amendments.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk read the amendments. They are very brief.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 3, strike "and television coverage (including and making of videotapes)" and insert "coverage (including radio broadcast recordings)";

On page 2, beginning with line 1, strike through and including line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. Under such terms and conditions as the Committee on Rules and Administration may prescribe—

(1) radio coverage of proceedings in the Senate chamber provided for in the first section shall be made available to public and commercial radio broadcasting stations and networks; and

(2) recordings shall be made available to such stations and networks, to Members of the Senate, and to such other organizations and persons as the Committee may authorize.

On page 2, line 7, strike "and television coverage" and insert "coverage and recordings";

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Rules and Administration be and is hereby authorized and directed to provide for radio coverage (including radio broadcast recordings) of proceedings in the Senate Chamber during consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, both signed at Washington, District of Columbia, on September 7, 1977. Such coverage shall be provided for continuously at all times while the Senate is considering the treaties, except for any time when a meeting with closed doors is ordered.

SEC. 2. Under such terms and conditions as the Committee on Rules and Administration may prescribe—

(1) radio coverage of proceedings in the Senate Chamber provided for in the first section shall be made available to public and commercial radio broadcasting stations and networks; and

(2) recordings shall be made available to such stations and networks, to Members of the Senate, and to such other organizations and persons as the Committee may authorize.

SEC. 3. The radio coverage and recordings of proceedings in the Senate Chamber under this resolution shall be carried out in such manner as the Committee on Rules and Administration shall prescribe.

Amend the title so as to read: "Resolution providing for radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate during consideration of the Panama Canal Treaties."

The title was amended so as to read.

Resolution providing for radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate during consideration of the Panama Canal Treaties.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, does the amendment to the title strike out the words with reference to television?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PANAMA DRUG TRAFFIC: NEW EVIDENCE, OLD EXCUSES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, nearly 4 months ago I advised the Senate of certain allegations I had received of direct involvement by Gen. Omar Torrijos and other members of his regime in drug trafficking in the United States and elsewhere. On October 13, I suggested that these charges, if true, could prove relevant to the Panama Canal Treaty issue. I feel now, as I did then, that the credibility and the personal integrity of General Torrijos and his colleagues will bear upon their reliability as Panama's guarantors of the new treaties.

Furthermore, since ratification of these proposed Panama Canal Treaties will definitely strengthen the political and financial status of the Torrijos regime, I maintain that it is important for us to know in advance if we will be bolstering a corrupt government which facilitates transport of illegal drugs to our own shores.

EFFORTS TO SECURE INFORMATION

Mr. President, I think that any Member of Congress who became aware of such allegations would feel a responsibility to call for full disclosure of relevant materials. This is what I have attempted to do during the last 15 weeks, only to find those efforts frustrated by bureaucratic roadblocks. Two full months after filing a "freedom of information request" on October 14, I received 75 pages of highly censored material from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. I was advised that additional DEA files, as well as the deleted portions of the files I received, could not be provided because it could "jeopardize" national security or U.S. foreign policy interests. In late December, I filed an appeal with the Department of Justice, which is currently reviewing the case.

NEW MATERIALS SURFACE

Despite the cloak of secrecy that the executive branch has wrapped around its files on the alleged Torrijos drug connection, the matter will not simply go away. To the contrary, materials relating to the allegations have continued to surface in recent months through unofficial channels.

The latest development that I am aware of occurred on Tuesday of this week, when two copies of Drug Enforcement Administration files were delivered to my office in a plain white envelope by an unknown source. The documents appear to be authentic photostatic copies of DEA and Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs files. Both contain agent reports which refer by name to Gen. Omar Torrijos or members of his immediate family, and implicate them in narcotics traffic going through Panama.

Mr. President, these documents raise more questions than they answer. Perhaps the reports contained within the documents are unfounded. Perhaps the documents themselves are forgeries. But when I sent similar documents to the DEA administrator on October 21 asking for confirmation of authenticity, no response was received. This is typical of the lack of cooperation that the executive branch has demonstrated so far in my efforts simply to determine whether there is any substance to these allegations.

Mr. President, I will not release the two documents which I received yesterday. I believe it is a responsibility of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to make a full disclosure of its files in this regard, and I intend to pursue the matter until they do so. At the moment, I am of the opinion that "someone is trying to tell us something" about drug-trafficking information that is in the possession of the executive branch of our government. As a Member of Congress who is concerned both about the drug traffic coming into this country and about the pending Panama Canal treaties, I feel a responsibility to pursue the matter to its end.

I can say with certainty that the particular items which were delivered to my office on Tuesday by an unknown source were not contained within the 75 pages of sanitized documents which I received from DEA in December, in response to my "freedom of information request." If these documents are authentic, then they were willingly and knowingly withheld from me by the DEA. It is for that reason that I raise the question: Just what else does the executive branch know about the Torrijos drug-trafficking operations, and why is it being withheld from Members of Congress who seek to learn the truth of the matter?

Mr. President, when the Senator from Kansas visited Panama in December of last year he had an opportunity to visit with Gen. Omar Torrijos. General Torrijos seemed very disturbed that anything concerning drug traffic might become involved in the canal treaty debates, and I agreed with General Torrijos. I said the matter should be disposed of. It should not be an issue in the Panama Canal Treaty debate. General Torrijos indicated to this Senator that someone was playing games. He said, "Some agency, your own agency is playing games with you. I will send you the information."

Well, so far General Torrijos has not forwarded the material, but I have written General Torrijos. I have asked for the information. The Senator from Kansas believes we should debate the treaties on the merits. We should not have side issues.

But the Senator from Kansas also believes this may not be a side issue. And how do we know if our own agencies, our own Government will not give us the information? Why does the DEA withhold information? Why does the DEA withhold information from this Senator and others who have made the requests?

What is this national security interest that must be protected? What about the rights of Americans? What about the future of the canal itself?

So far the Senator from Kansas said today as I said on this floor many weeks ago all the Senator from Kansas asks is cooperation, some spirit, some effort, some indication, just some indication that Mr. Bensinger and the Drug Enforcement Administration are willing to give us some assurance that there is not any involvement. The Senator from Kansas can only speak for himself, but if that is forthcoming this Senator will not raise that in the canal treaty debate, and I would hope that they are listening.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE PRESIDENT MISLEADS THE PEOPLE ON THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the President of the United States last night talked to the people of the United States by television and radio about the Panama Canal. He said that much of the opposition to the proposed treaties was based upon misunderstanding and misinformation. His statement is quite understandable when one contemplates the misunderstanding and misinformation disseminated by the President himself last night.

I admire the President personally, but, candidly, his statements of alleged fact were far from the truth. This Senator naturally expected that the President would strive to present his treaties in the best possible light, and that he would present favorable interpretations and conclusions. But I expected that Mr. Carter would base his statements on fact and not fiction. One is forced to the conclusion either that he was misleading the American people unintentionally, or he was misleading them intentionally. There is no alternative to those two possibilities.

Let us take just one minor statement—a minor issue really, but important in building up the myth of U.S. “guilt.” Mr. Carter said that the 1903 treaty “was not signed by any Panamanian.” The President was obviously referring to Philippe Bunau-Varilla, who negotiated the treaty with Secretary Hay of the United States. It is true that Bunau-Varilla was a Frenchman; but one of the first acts of the new Panamanian Government in 1903 was to issue full credentials to Bunau-Varilla as Panamanian Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary. He had full powers to sign the draft, which he did. But the formal signing did not take place until December 4, 1903.

On that date, the following Panamanians placed their signatures on the treaty:

Junta members: J. A. Arango, Tomas Arias, Manuel Espinosa B.

Minister of Interior: Eusebio A. Morales.

Minister of Foreign Relations: F. V. de la Espriella.

Minister of Justice: Carlos A. Mendoza.

Minister of Treasury: Manuel E. Amador.

Minister of War and Marine: Nicanor A. de Obarrio.

Subsecretary of Public Instruction: Francisco Antonio Facio.

Needless to say, the 1903 treaty was reaffirmed in each of the treaties of 1936 and 1955, which were also signed by Panamanians, and ratified freely by the Panamanian constitutional process.

Nor must it be thought that the treaty was unfair to Panamanians or that the Senate would consent to it without persuasion. If the future was indeed in doubt, which is why Secretary Hay was attempting to persuade Senators that it was “vastly advantageous to the United States and—not so advantageous to Panama.” Secretary Hay, like President Carter after him, was merely, tailoring his words to a reluctant Senate.

But even on more substantive issues, the President shaded the truth. On the issue of national security, for example, Mr. Carter was less than forthright when he said:

Throughout the negotiations, we were determined that our national security interests would be protected * * * and that our military forces would have the permanent right to defend the canal if it should ever be in danger.

It is to be assumed that he would try to interpret the ambiguous defense provisions favorably; but the fact is that the negotiations backed down from the unilateral right of military intervention, the only right that would give the canal adequate protection.

In hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Tuesday of this week, former Deputy Defense Secretary William Clements testified that he had negotiated a clear-cut clause granting unilateral intervention to the United States, one that was approved by the Defense Department, the State Department, and the National Security Council.

Mr. President, in response to a question which I put to him, he stated unequivocally that General Torrijos himself had approved that clause.

The language of the clause is as follows, and I think it is important that it be in the Record:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the Canal, the parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for the Canal's neutrality and security through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, and the International Court of Justice or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each party shall take such other diplomatic, economic or military measures as it deems necessary in accordance with its constitutional processes.

That is why Mr. Clements testified that he is now unalterably opposed to the Carter treaties. The most crucial issue in the whole treaty had been agreed upon by all parties concerned; yet the Carter administration backed down and accepted vague and ambiguous language.

Although the President stated last night that "the treaties are supported enthusiastically by every member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff," he neglected to mention that they are enthusiastically opposed by former members of the Joint Chiefs, and by the overwhelming majority of retired military officers. It was not long ago that I placed in the Record the names of 320 high-ranking retired officers who were willing to go public in opposition to these treaties.

Moreover, the "enthusiasm" which the President detected in the JCS support was noticeably absent among the JCS representatives who testified before the Senate Armed Services hearings last week. Adm. James Holloway, Chief of Naval Operations, for example, testified that it was his military judgment that it would be better for the United States to stay in Panama indefinitely with a military presence, rather than to try to go back in if there were trouble. He testified that he supported the treaties only on balance, for the sake of diplomatic considerations.

It is interesting to note, Mr. President, that not one scintilla of this information was conveyed, insofar as this Senator knows, to the American people by the major media of this country. Why the blackout on what the Joint Chiefs actually said?

Similarly, the President's statement that "the treaties also have overwhelming support throughout Latin America" simply is not and can not be supported either by the experience of members of the Armed Services Committee who have traveled rather widely in Latin America, or by the objective situation.

I have visited the heads of state and high ranking military officials of countries which represent at least 75 percent of the population, gross national product, and geography of Latin America, and I have yet to meet one urging us to give up the canal to Panama. The distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. Scott) reported a similar response. And high-ranking defense experts, such as Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board, testified just the other day that he has yet to find a single member of the Board, other than Panama and the United States, who favors the treaties. The economic arguments alone are enough to sway their decisions, for the canal, proportionately, is far more important to the health of their economies than to ours.

Perhaps that is why the two biggest Latin American nations, Brazil and Mexico, did not send their Presidents to the signing ceremony, Guatemala has broken diplomatic relations with Panama, because Torrijos has promised aid to the terrorists in Belize. And in 1975, Panama had to call off a scheduled meeting in Panama City of all Latin Presidents because so many of the leaders refused to come and dignify Torrijos' association with Fidel Castro.

So where is all the love and affection for Torrijos? Where is all the pressure for the United States to surrender our sovereign rights in the Canal Zone?

But perhaps the most interesting falsehood—and I regret to use that word—that Mr. Carter perpetrated last night was his denial that we own the Canal Zone. He said:

We do not own the Panama Canal Zone—we have never had sovereignty over it. We have only had the right to use it.

The Canal Zone cannot be compared with United States territory. We bought Alaska from the Russians and no one has ever doubted that we own it The Canal Zone has always been Panamanian territory. The U.S. Supreme Court and previous American Presidents have repeatedly acknowledged the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone.

The fact is that no previous President of the United States has ever acknowledged Panamanian sovereignty. It is my intention to develop these facts at greater length on this floor at a more appropriate time; but suffice it to say the U.S. Supreme Court has declare many times that the Canal Zone is a U.S. possession and U.S. territory. In fact, it was the U.S. Supreme Court that actually compared our title to the zone to our title to Alaska, in Wilson against Shaw, 1907:

It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation, because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in the ordinary conveyances of real estate The fact that there may possibly be in the future some dispute as to the exact boundary on either side is immaterial. Such disputes not infrequently attend conveyances of real estate or cessions of territory. Alaska was ceded to us 40 years ago, but the boundary between it and the English possessions was not settled until within the last 2 or 3 years. Yet no one ever doubted the title of this Republic to Alaska.

It is incredible that President Carter should choose Alaska as the basis of a comparison coming to the opposite conclusion.

In fact, we do own the Canal Zone. I have referred on this floor on other occasions to the statements of Mr. J. V. Luitweiller, of my State, who was the Secretary of the Claims Commission which settled all the property transfers when we took over the zone.

Moreover, Miss Doris McClellan, clerk of the U.S. District Court in Balboa, and daughter of the late distinguished Senator from Arkansas, whom we all revered, has assured me personally that microfilms of the deeds, both warranty and quit-claim are on file at the district court, and that the deeds themselves are in storage in Suitland, Md.

We are giving away U.S. property—property that belongs to the U.S. taxpayers. It is an act of enormous constitutional significance, because of article IV, section 3 of the Constitution. Is it possible that the President is attempting to evade the consequences of article IV by denying that the Canal Zone is, indeed, U.S. property? I hope that he is not.

Yet at the same time, he is denying that we are paying Panama to take the canal. He says that under the new treaties payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal. The fact is that under the Constitution, those tolls are paid into the U.S. Treasury and belong to the taxpayers. In addition, as the Armed Services Committee hearings have brought out so dramatically in the past few days, there will be enormous deficits which will have to be made up by the taxpayers of the United States, either directly or in the form of interest foregone.

Mr. President, I am prepared to debate the treaties on the basis of fact. Men of good will can agree or disagree on implications of the treaties, or on the probable outcome of a given situation. But give us facts, Mr. President, facts that we can all agree on. If the debate on these treaties is to be meaningful, it must remain on a high level, and it must be solidly grounded in fact. I hope that the President of the United States hereafter will be more discerning in presenting the facts of the case.

Thank you, Mr. President.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL BLACK CAUCUS RESOLUTIONS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to introduce into the Congressional Record resolutions on the Panama Canal treaty adopted by the National Black Caucus of Local Elected Officials (NBC/LEO) and the National Black Caucus of State Legislators (NBC/SL).

The NBC/LEO, founded in December 1970, represents more than 2,000 black local elected officials in the United States. NBC/LEO has worked diligently to make positive change possible for black and disadvantaged people in this country.

The NBC/SL was formed in August 1977 to work toward the solution of many problems plaguing black and disadvantaged Americans. It is concerned about problems on a local, State, and national level, but recognizes the importance of responsible U.S. international leadership as well.

Both NBC/LEO and NBC/SL adopted their resolutions as an affirmation of the importance of the Panama Canal treaties to all Americans. I congratulate them on their leadership in moving these treaties forward.

At this point, I request unanimous consent that the resolutions, passed by the National Black Caucus of Local Elected Officials on December 6, 1977, and the National Black Caucus of State Legislators on November 20, 1977, be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NATIONAL BLACK CAUCUS OF LOCAL ELECTED OFFICIALS

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Whereas, our capability to defend the canal will be enhanced under the new treaty through cooperation with the government of Panama; and

Whereas, no country large or small should agree to another nation holding parts of its territory in perpetuity as we do under the 1903 Treaty; and

Whereas, these new treaties protect the vital commerce and security interest of the U.S.A.; and

Whereas, the 1903 Treaty represents a U.S.A. foreign policy philosophy of the early 1900's, not the 1970's; and

Whereas, the new treaties are in the national interest of the U.S.A. and consistent with the traditional U.S.A. support for self determination and respect for the dignity of all nations great and small; and

Whereas, the new treaties assure a peaceful, prosperous and secure international waterway for the commerce of all nations; and

Whereas, the new treaties are firmly supported by all the nations of the hemisphere; and

Whereas, approval of these treaties will say to the world that the U.S.A. is true to its word about dealing on a fair and equitable basis with all nations. Now, therefore, be it resolved that the National Black Caucus of Local Elected Officials supports the President's proposed Panama Canal Treaties.

NATIONAL BLACK CAUCUS OF STATE LEGISLATORS

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the National Black Caucus of State Legislators supports the President's proposed Panama Canal Treaties.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ALLEN. I think the majority leader.

Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished majority leader when he plans to have laid before the Senate the Panama Canal treaties, for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Under the rule, may I say to my distinguished friend from Alabama, Thursday would be the day on which the committee report would have been available 3 days. I would like to get unanimous consent, if I could, that we proceed on Wednesday. We had earlier planned to proceed on Wednesday, because all Senators had indicated that they could get their supplemental views, and so on, to the Foreign Relations Committee on time for the report to be printed and made available 3 days prior to Wednesday. That was not possible; Thursday is the earliest if there is objection, but if there is no objection, I would hope we could get to the consideration of the treaties on Wednesday.

Mr. ALLEN. I would say to the distinguished majority leader that I would have no objection to the matter coming up on Wednesday, or, if it were possible, today.

What does concern the Senator from Alabama, however, is that no unanimous-consent order with respect to the procedure on the treaties be made prior to the laying down of the treaties for consideration, because many of us would like to be here for the full proceedings, and would not like for unanimous-consent requests to be made prior to that time.

I have absolutely no objection to the request that the treaties be considered, but they would be considered under the rule. We do not want to agree to short-circuiting the Committee of the Whole consideration.

Will the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader agree that no requests for unanimous consent with respect to the procedure on consideration of the treaties be made prior to the treaties being laid before the Senate for consideration?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, that would be very agreeable to me.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield to me for just a moment, so that I may respond to the inquiry of the Senator from Alabama, that is fine with me, too. I certainly have no desire to take anyone by surprise.

There are two matters I hoped we could take care of today, and I wonder how the Senator from Alabama would feel about them. Incidentally, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) is on his way to the floor. I have consulted with him about these matters, and he has no objection.

First, the majority leader has suggested that we abbreviate the 3-day rule by 1 day, so that the Senate could take up the matter Wednesday. I understand the Senator from Alabama has stated that he has no objection to that.

The second matter concerns controlled time. I have no desire to have a limitation of time, but this is such an emotional issue and the Senate and the country are so divided on it that I have suggested to the majority leader that possibility, and he suggested, I believe, that we put down a unanimous-consent order to control the time, that is, to allocate half of the time each day to Senators who could yield it to Members who support their respective points of view.

I think that procedure would add to the orderly consideration of the matter, and I wonder how the Senator from Alabama would feel about it.

Mr. ALLEN. I feel that when the treaty is before the Senate, there should be no time restraints or orders for speeches, because we frequently have Senators who might be in line for speaking and not be on the floor. I think we have difficulty here in the Senate getting speeches made.

I feel that Senators should have an opportunity to be heard. I rather imagine that a procedure will be worked out, but I would not like to divide the time in any way. I think that will take care of itself, would be my judgment.

I have absolutely no objection to waiving the 3-day rule, or to waiving the 1-day requirement of having the treaty lie over for a day. I do not care about that; but I do not want to short-circuit the Committee of the Whole, because that is very important as an order of procedure; and also, the resolution of ratification could not be offered in the Committee of the Whole, whereas it could be in the full Senate, at any time, thereby cutting off amendments.

I am perfectly willing to abide by the statement of both leaders that unanimous-consent agreements will not be asked for other than those we have discussed. I would object to the second request, but not the first, on the matter being brought up.

I am hopeful that the committee report is in, and available to all Senators at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The report has been printed, and is available.

Mr. ALLEN. At the time the matter is called up in executive session, at that time, if there are to be requests for immediate consideration, I would ask that that agreement be made now, rather than the request being made on Wednesday.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have no objection.

Mr. BAKER. I have no objection to that. I thank the Senator from Alabama for his consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. I am happy to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. BAKER. And I have no objection to our proceeding on Wednesday.

Mr. ALLEN. I might, for the record, request that the distinguished majority leader alert the Vice President that his presence would be helpful as Presiding Officer at that time. I have a series of parliamentary inquiries that I would like to make concerning the procedure on the consideration of the treaties.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I may have some myself; so we will try to get the Vice President in the chair at that time.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—EXECUTIVE N, 95-2

AMENDMENT NO. 19

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATCH, as in executive session, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Panama Canal Treaty, executive N, 95-2.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Panama Canal Treaty contains a number of provisions which provide for substantial payments to the Republic of Panama. Article III, section 5 of the treaty provides that the newly formed Panama Canal Commission shall pay the Republic of Panama $10 million per year to reimburse it for providing certain public services in the canal operating area, such as police and fire protection, garbage collection, and street maintenance. Likewise, article XIII, section 4 of the treaty provides that the Republic of Panama shall receive from the Commission certain additional payments "to be paid out of canal operating revenues." Three separate payments are contemplated under this provision: First, an unspecified annual payment computed at a rate of thirty hundredths of a U.S. dollar ($0.30) per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalency, for each vessel transiting the Canal for which tolls are charged, such payment to be adjusted upwards to reflect changes in the U.S. wholesale price index; second, a fixed annuity of $10 million; and third, a supplemental annual payment up to $10 million, the exact amount to be determined by the amount of surplus revenues of the Commission. It is estimated that these payments to Panama will total more than $60 million in the first year of operation, excluding the supplemental payment drawn from surplus revenues.

The language of the treaty does not indicate whether these payments to Panama shall be made in accordance with the legislative processes of Congress. Indeed, representatives of the State Department testifying before Congress have emphasized that the canal will be self-supporting under the treaty, and that all payments to Panama will be derived from operating revenues. In other words, the impression we have been given is that legislative appropriations will not be necessary because these payments will be made directly to Panama by the Commission.

Mr. President, this scheme, on its face, is constitutionally and financially defective. In the first place, it violates the Constitution. In the second place, it seems certain that there will not be sufficient revenue to cover all of these payments, in addition to the cost of the operation of the canal, and that Congress will have to make up the difference through appropriations anyway.

Article I, section 9 of the Constitution provides that—

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law.

Moreover, article I, section 7 provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. It is a well-established principle of our Constitution that the treaty-making power of the Chief Executive is limited by Congress power over the purse. Simply stated—and even State Department representatives acknowledge this rule—a treaty cannot appropriate funds.

TREATIES AND THE EXPENDITURES OF FUNDS

The Panama Canal Commission, according to article III, section 3 of the treaty, will "carry out its responsibilities" as "a U.S. Government agency," that "shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America." Thus the treaty contemplates that a U.S. Government agency will be making payments to a foreign government for the remainder of this century without the consent of the House of Representatives and in derogation of the appropriations processes of the House and Senate. This clearly raises an important constitutional issue. The administration's view is that this is a self-executing treaty, meaning that it takes effect as domestic law without further action by Congress. But are these provisions of the treaty providing for payments by a U.S. Government agency self-executing in light of article I, section 9, clause 7 of the Constitution, which gives Congress the exclusive power to make appropriations? The answer, I believe, is that they are not self-executing.

It is not disputed that the President's treaty-making power extends to bilateral agreements by which the United States undertakes to make payments of money. The first treaty made by the United States after the adoption of the Constitution, the Jay Treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, provided for payments of debts owed by American citizens to British creditors. The treaties with France for the acquisition of Louisiana provided for a payment of 60 million francs. Countless other examples could be cited to illustrate the principle that the Chief Executive has the authority to make treaties which obligate the United States to make payments to a foreign government. But I am not aware that any President has ever made a self-executing treaty providing for such payments.

EARLIER PRECEDENTS

Debate over the provisions of the Jay Treaty requiring the expenditure of funds is instructive in this regard. The Members of the House of Representatives did not question the right of the President to enter into such a treaty. Instead, they debated the issue of whether the House was entitled to obtain copies of the instructions given by the President to the negotiators, and whether the Congress was required to appropriate the funds necessary to carry the treaty into effect. President Washington rejected the demand of the House for copies of the instructions, but the House adopted a resolution, vigorously supported by James Madison, which provided that—

When a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of the Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the Constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such a treaty in effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good.

Congress subsequently enacted a law making the necessary appropriations. The same principles were recognized and the same procedure was followed regarding subsequent treaties where payments were required.

In the case of Turner against Baptist Missionary Union, a Federal circuit court considered the effect of an 1863 treaty with an Indian tribe, which provided for payment of the net proceeds of the sale of 160 acres of land to the owner of the buildings situated on the land. The court said:

A treaty under the Federal Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This, unquestionably, applies to all treaties, where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and cannot be the Supreme Law of the Land, where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative, in the sense of the Constitution, as money cannot be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our government. * * * As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President, was a law, as that a treaty which engages to pay money, is in itself a law. * * * It [the treaty-making power] cannot bind or control the legislative action in this respect, and every foreign government may be presumed to know that as far as the treaty stipulates to pay money, the legislative action is required. (Fed. Cas. No. 14251 (1852), 24 Fed. Cas. 345, 346).

In brief, the precedents, both political and constitutional, are well established that a treaty provision for the payment of money is not self-executing but requires an appropriation by Congress.

PAYMENT PROVISIONS OF THE NEW TREATY

This principle has been confirmed and duly respected in all previous treaties between the United States and the Republic of Panama. The treaty of 1903 provided under article XIV for an initial payment of $10 million and an annual payment of $250 thousand. Article VII of the 1936 treaty increased the amount of the annuity to 430,000 Baboas (B/430,000). A third treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama in 1955 increased the annuity once again to 1,930,000 Balboas (B/1930,000). In each case, the payments were made under appropriations enacted by Congress; and it was never suggested that any of these treaties was self-executing. The current annual payment, $2,328,000, is shown as one of three permanent appropriations in the Department of State budget for fiscal year 1978.

The present treaty, of course, calls for payments by the Commission and it would thus appear that appropriations will not be necessary because no funds will be drawn from the U.S. Treasury. This understanding of the method of payment, however, ignores a number of important considerations. As I have previously noted, article III of the proposed treaty specifies that the Panama Canal Commission, a U.S. Government agency, "shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States." The laws of the United States governing the fiscal management of Government agencies in general are contained in title 31 of the United States Code. Executive departments and non-corporate Federal agencies are subject generally to the provisions of title 31, except the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act. Wholly owned government corporations are subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act and to many of the other provisions of title 31 as well.

Turning to title 31, we observe that it clearly delineates the fiscal responsibilities of Government agencies generally and their dependence on appropriations to authorize the expenditure of funds. The Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, which has been incorporated into title 31, defines "department or establishment" to include "any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government," and the term "appropriations" to include funds and authorizations to create obligations by contract in advance of appropriations or "any other authority making funds available for obligation or expenditure." All moneys received from whatever source for the use of the United States are required to be paid into the Treasury (31 U.S.C. 484). Detailed provisions are made for submission of estimates for appropriations for expenditure by Government agencies (31 U.S.C. 581-752Z). Expenditures in excess of appropriations are prohibited, and all appropriations or funds made available for obligation are required to be apportioned to avoid the necessity for deficiency or supplemental appropriations (31 U.S.C. 665).

In light of these requirements, the provision of the new treaty that the payments to Panama are to be made by the Panama Canal Commission is wholly contrary to article I of the Constitution and Federal law, unless it is assumed—and the language of the treaties does not seem to support such an assumption—that such funds must first be appropriated by Congress. Presumably no one would seriously contend that the effect of the constitutional provision limiting to Congress the power to make appropriations can be circumvented by the device of providing in the treaty that a payment without appropriations is to be made by a named Government agency instead of the United States.

With respect to article III of the proposed treaty, then, it is abundantly clear, that the Panama Canal Commission cannot pay the Republic of Panama $10 million per annum in advance of legislative appropriations authorizing such expenditures. This is also true of the additional payments made by the Commission "out of canal operating revenues" under article XIII of the treaty. Why article III provides simply for payments and article XIII provides for payments "out of canal operating revenues" is a distinction that apparently has no significance regarding constitutional and statutory requirements. The "canal operating revenues" referred to in article XIII are presumably the "tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges" which the United States—not the Panama Canal Commission—is authorized to "establish, modify, collect, and retain" by article III, section 2(c) of the treaty. These revenues, of course, are the same in kind as those that have been derived by the United States from the Panama Canal since it was first opened to commerce and which have been expended under appropriations by Congress since that time.

It may be that the purpose of making the payments "out of canal operating revenues" was to identify such payments as part of the cost of operation, in order to establish rates of tolls. Such a construction necessarily assumes, however, that revenues will be sufficient to cover both the payments to Panama and operating expenses over and above such payments. But this leaves unanswered the obvious question: What if there is a disparity between the amount of revenues and the total of such expenses? Is this deficiency to be absorbed by the U.S. Government by appropriations to cover losses, or by Panama through acceptance of less than the amount of payment stipulated by the treaty? In either case, the provision for payment out of revenues does not appear to affect the constitutional requirement for appropriations to carry these provisions into effect.

Section 4(c) of article XIII, which provides for payment of $10 million "out of canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission" not only runs headlong into present law requiring the agency operating the canal to pay surplus funds into the Treasury, but also substitutes Panama for the United States as the beneficiary of surplus funds. This would effectively preclude further reduction of the U.S. Government's investment in the canal. Like the provision of article XIII for annual payments based on the aggregate measurement tonnage of ships using the canal during the year, the qualifications introduced by section 4(c) relate solely to the determination of the amount of the payment. Neither provision recognizes nor makes mention of the need for congressional appropriations to authorize payment. To be sure, the payment provisions of the treaty seemingly attempt to provide permanent appropriations for the treaty payments, an objective prohibited by the constitutional rule that only Congress has the power to make appropriations.

In sum, the provisions of the proposed treaty for payment of money cannot become effective as domestic law unless Congress has, in accordance with article I, section 9 of the Constitution, appropriated the necessary funds. Under the treaties with Panama now in effect, which also provide for annual payments to Panama, revenues derived from operation of the canal are treated as public moneys and expenditures of those funds are limited to those authorized by appropriation acts of the Congress.

Neither the language of the treaties nor the testimony of State Department representatives, however, offers us any concrete, specific assurances that all of the payment provisions of the treaty will be implemented by appropriations of Congress. Although administration witnesses appearing before congressional committees have freely acknowledged that a treaty cannot appropriate funds, they have continued to insist that this is a self-executing treaty. Herbert Hansell, legal adviser to the State Department, has stated that there is "no ground" for the concern expressed by House Members that the treaty "could be regarded as a means of circumventing that constitutional provision with respect to the payments to be made to Panama under the treaty." Why? Because, he says:

It is intended that the payments to be made to Panama be financed wholly from projected revenues, so as to avoid any need to resort to general revenues.

Mr. President, in all of the testimony that I have examined in connection with this treaty, I have nowhere seen a flat assertion by any representative of the State Department or the Department of Justice that this is a non-self-executing treaty that will require congressional appropriations in order to implement the payment provisions of the treaty; and the treaty itself is silent on this subject.

For these reasons, I am submitting an amendment to the treaty which would obviate this difficulty and eliminate all uncertainty and ambiguity about the method of payment to Panama. This amendment provides simply that all revenues of the Panama Canal Commission shall be deposited in the U.S. Treasury, and that all payments to Panama shall be based on legislative appropriations. It is wholly consistent with established constitutional precedents and laws governing Federal agencies.

PROJECTED DEFICIENCIES IN THE CANAL OPERATING COSTS UNDER THE NEW TREATY

Mr. President, it should further be noted, as I have previously indicated, that the future of the Panama Canal under this treaty, insofar as its financial structure is concerned, is rather bleak. In a recent study by Mr. W. M. Whitman, special consultant to the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, it is estimated that the cost of operating the canal during the first year of operation under the treaty will exceed revenues by approximately $99 million, not counting additional costs to the U.S. Treasury of $7.7 million. Mr. Whitman's analysis is based on a tabulation provided by the Panama Canal Company, and is adjusted to reflect the same elements of cost as those shown in the 1978 budget. It also includes additional treaty costs that are not part of the Company's tabulation.

This study shows, Mr. President, it is illusory to think that the Panama Canal will be operating on a self-supporting basis, as the representatives of the State Department have insisted. Additional appropriations have to be made to make up the deficit, and cover the hidden costs of this treaty—this is not to mention the added economic burden, after the tolls increase, that the American people will have to bear under this treaty as a result of higher prices for materials, including Alaskan crude oil, that will be transiting the canal.

Whitman concludes:

If financial viability of the canal is equated to operation as a self-sustaining enterprise, the venture appears to be doomed from the first year after the treaty goes into effect. This was the thrust of the testimony of all the witnesses who urged or suggested the necessity for absorption of elements of the cost of operation by the Treasury through elimination of interest and depreciation or abandonment of the concept of recovery of the investment of the Government in the canal. There may be reasons, to support adoption of such expedients, but the policy of operating the canal on a self-sustaining basis is not one of them.

Mr. President, I urge all Senators to read this perceptive study with care, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record, together with my amendment, at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement and amendment were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PANAMA CANAL TREATY PROBLEMS

The written statements and testimony presented by the various witnesses appearing at the hearing of the Panama Canal Subcommittee on November 30 and December 1, 1977, disclosed several clearly identifiable problems of some concern to the Committee and the Congress in the consideration of the Panama Canal treaties and legislation to carry them into effect, assuming they are ratified. Those problems fall into five general categories, namely:

1. The projected deficiency in canal revenues to cover operating costs;
2. The sources of funds to cover the deficiency in canal revenues;
3. The form of the Government agency to be established to operate the canal;
4. Ambiguities in treaty provisions; and

5. Constitutional issues.

1. Canal revenue deficiency.

The negotiators and other proponents of the treaty repeatedly have stressed the proposition that under the treaty the operations of the canal are to be self-supporting and that canal revenues are to be used exclusively for payment of costs of the operation without cost to the U.S. taxpayer.

The treaty provides for annual payments to Panama totalling some $62 million in the first year of operation, exclusive of a contingent payment of an additional $10 million to be paid to the extent canal revenues exceed expenditures. Other provisions of the treaty transferring income-producing property to Panama will reduce the revenues of the Panama Canal by some $130 million, partially offset by a reduction of about $50 million in canal operating costs.

An analysis of Panama Canal revenues and costs in the first year of operation under the treaty in comparison to the estimate provided in the 1978 budget program, which does not include provision for the effect of the treaty, is attached. This analysis is based on a tabulation provided by the Panama Canal Company, adjusted to reflect the same elements of cost as those shown in the 1978 budget and to include additional treaty costs, so far identified, not included in the Company's tabulation.

The analysis shows that in the first year of operation under the treaty, Panama Canal revenues will fail to cover costs of operation of the canal and related treaty costs by about $99 million, exclusive of additional cost to the U.S. Treasury of $7.7 million. The recovery from canal revenues of operating expenses and all other treaty related costs would require an increase in rates of tolls of more than 60 percent. If the additional costs to the Treasury of $7.7 million, referred to above, are excluded from the calculation, the increase in rates of tolls required would be reduced to 56 percent.

Although the calculations of the insufficiency in Panama Canal revenues to cover expenses summarized above relate to the first year of operation, there is no basis for optimism that the financial results of operation will improve with the passage of time. No detailed analysis of costs and expenses for future years similar to that provided for the first year of operation under the treaty is presently available, but the conclusion to be drawn from the data so far available is that costs will rise at a rate higher than any foreseeable increase in revenues over the period of operation of the canal by the United States under the treaty.

If financial viability of the canal is equated to operation as a self-sustaining enterprise, the venture appears to be doomed from the first year after the treaty goes into effect. This was the thrust of the testimony of all the witnesses who urged or suggested the necessity for absorption of elements of the cost of operation by the Treasury through elimination of interest and depreciation or abandonment of the concept of recovery of the investment of the Government in the canal. There may be reasons to support adoption of such expedients, but the policy of operating the canal on a self-sustaining basis is not one of them.

2. Sources of funds to cover expenses of operation.

The ability of the canal to generate additional revenues required to cover canal operating expenses under the treaty lies in (1) possible increases in traffic, and (2) increases in rates of tolls.

a. Traffic increases. The factor cited most frequently as a partial solution to the financial problems of the Panama Canal under the treaty, is the anticipated increase in canal revenues from shipment through the canal of North Slope crude oil enroute from Alaska to the East Coast of the United States. The increase in Panama Canal revenue from this source has been estimated as high as $30 million a year, but for 1978 the estimate by the Panama Canal Company is $4 million. On the basis of the latter estimate, the deficiency of revenue in relation to costs would be reduced to $95 million or $103 million depending on whether the additional costs to the Treasury, noted above, are considered.

There is general agreement that the increase in revenues resulting from the movement of North Slope oil through the canal will be temporary because of the probability of use of less expensive alternatives such as pipelines. In the near time, the movement of this commodity through the canal will unquestionably improve the financial results of operation of the canal for two or three years, but it will neither eliminate the revenue deficiency in those years nor affect the long-term outlook.

The only other suggestion that canal revenues may increase to offset costs increases, even in part, is based on a presumption that historical growth of the canal will continue at the same rate or at a modified rate in the future. This logic has been rejected by most economists who insist that analysis of future individual commodity movements on established trade routes is the only sound basis for projections of future canal traffic.

b. Tolls increases. As previously indicated, on the basis of the Panama Canal revenue figure projected in the 1978 budget, the increased operating costs resulting from the treaty would require a toll increase of from 56 percent to 60 percent to put the canal on a self-sustaining basis.

Assuming an increase in revenue of $4 million from the movement through the canal of North Slope oil in the first year of operation under the treaty, the tolls increase would be reduced to the range of 52 percent to 57 percent.

Representatives of the shipping industry have indicated that increases in rates of tolls in the amount necessary to make the Panama Canal completely self-sustaining under the treaty are unrealistic and will price the canal out of the market because of the availability of less expensive alternatives.

Apparently, during the negotiation of the treaty there was no attempt at a systematic analysis of the potential canal revenues available for funding the cost of the various provisions eventually agreed to. The draft environmental impact statement, published by the Department of State in August 1977 (42 F.R. 43466) suggested that the assessment of the economic impact of the treaty was then impossible because of lack of data as to the costs of operation of the Panama Canal after the treaty became effective. The final EIS dated December 1977, states that "An initial toll increase in the neighborhood of 30 percent will be necessary to cover the operating costs . . . of the Canal during the new Treaty period. The exact level of toll increases will depend on such factors as:

The structure of the canal operation under the new Treaty, especially its operating cost requirements, and

The short-term impact on Canal traffic of Alaskan oil shipments." (pages 33, 34)

c. Appropriations or absorption of costs by U.S. If tolls revenues cannot be increased in an amount sufficient to make the canal self-supporting, it appears to be obvious that the deficiency in revenues will have to be made up from the U.S. Treasury, either through absorption of part of the costs or by direct appropriations.

While the proponents of the treaty have consistently adhered to the position that one of the objectives of the treaty is that the canal continue to be self-supporting, they have also simultaneously proposed that substantial costs of operation of the canal be absorbed by the U.S. Treasury through discontinuance of payment of interest on the investment of the United States in the canal, writing off the investment entirely, and treatment of various costs arising from the treaty as obligations of the Treasury rather than of the Panama Canal. Representatives of the shipping industry and others go further and also propose elimination of depreciation as a cost of operation recoverable from tolls, and payment of interest by the United States on Government funds derived from operation of the canal and deposited in the Treasury.

Interest on U.S. investment. At the Panama Canal Subcommittee hearings on November 30, 1977, the testimony of Administration witnesses indicated general unfamiliarity with the history and purpose of payment from canal revenues of interest on the investment of the United States Government in the canal. Interest was described by those witnesses as "profit" and it was suggested that elimination of the interest payment is necessary to keep the Panama Canal Commission "self-sustaining." The Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury described the background of the requirement of interest payments as follows:

"One reason that payment was required in 1951 when the Canal Company was established as a self-sustaining business enterprise was to avoid allowing the users to have a subsidized toll or exclusively subsidized toll by requiring that the cost of capital be included in the toll base. That requirement will no longer be necessary because under the new arrangements, the toll will increase in order to meet the costs and requirements under the new treaty arrangements.

"Tolls will approach a more economic level and a need for interest payment as a device in effect to avoid subsidy will no longer be necessary."

The requirement that the Panama Canal Company pay interest to the Treasury on the net direct investment of the U.S. Government in the Company is found in section 62 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code. (76A Stat. 8). This provision was originally enacted in 1948 in the legislation incorporating the Panama Railroad Company (62 Stat. 1076) pursuant to the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 841 et seq.), and of course applied to that corporation which had been operated as an adjunct of the Panama Canal since the time of construction of the canal. See State ex rel Rogers v. Graves, 299 U.S. 401 (1937).

In 1950, when responsibility for the operation of the Panama Canal was transferred to the Panama Railroad Company, which was renamed the Panama Canal

Company, the requirement for payment of interest on the Government's investment in the corporation was continued. (Act, Sept. 26, 1950 (64 Stat. 1041)). The 1950 legislation was based on recommendations of the then Bureau of the Budget, approved and forwarded to the Congress by President Truman. In reference to the requirement that the corporation pay interest to the Treasury, the report of the Bureau of the Budget stated:

"The principle that Federal business enterprises should pay a rate of return on the Government's investment equal to the cost of the money to the Treasury is now well settled. The President recommended in his 1948 budget message that corporations should be required to reimburse the Treasury for the full cost of money advanced to the corporation. There is no reason why the Panama Canal and its adjuncts should be exempted from payment of interest since they are essentially Federal business enterprises." H. Doc. 460, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 8.

At the Panama Canal Subcommittee hearing on December 1, 1977, Leonard Kujawa, a partner in Arthur Andersen & Co., testifying as an expert on Panama Canal finances, confirmed that interest, as the cost of capital invested in a business, is part of the cost of operation of that business. As such, if a business operation such as the Panama Canal is to be self-sustaining, the revenues derived from the operation must be sufficient to cover interest payments on invested capital.

Conversely, as pointed out in the testimony of Comptroller General Staats, if annual interest payments are not made into the Treasury, the cash position of the Panama Canal Commission would be improved "but it would also reduce Treasury receipts and impact on the overall U.S. budget."

The amount of the interest payment to the Treasury in fiscal year 1978, shown in the 1978 budget program, is $19.7 million.

Depreciation. The statutory formula for establishing rates of tolls for use of the canal now includes depreciation as one of the elements of costs to be recovered from tolls.

The discontinuance of depreciation on part of the assets of the canal was another expedient suggested at the hearings for reducing the upward pressure on rates of tolls brought about by the treaty. On the other hand, the Comptroller General pointed out that the property transfers provided by the treaty would necessitate increased depreciation to make possible recovery of the U.S. investment in the canal over the life of the treaty and that "For the proposed Commission to be financially self-sufficient, toll rates would have to be raised to cover these increases in depreciation costs." The Comptroller General also noted that these actions "may not be economically sound, because of the impact on toll rates and possible adverse effect on traffic and revenues." In other words, under the treaty it may no longer be possible for the Panama Canal to be self-sustaining.

The property of the United States in the Canal Zone, to be transferred to Panama under the terms of the treaty, was acquired at an original cost of about $1 billion. The book value of the property associated with the Panama Canal, exclusive of military property, is currently $752 million.

Other treaty costs. Costs to the U.S. Treasury resulting from the treaty that are not directly and immediately associated with operation of the canal probably could not be included in the tolls formula for payment out of revenues of the canal. These costs have not been completely identified but they appear to include appropriations required to fund part of the economic assistance program under the separate agreement accompanying the treaty, the cost of the joint study for the need for and feasibility of a sea level canal for which the treaty provides, the loss to the Treasury of the payment now being made in reimbursement of capital appropriations to the Canal Zone Government, and possibly the cost to the Civil Service Commission and military departments of employee assistance programs contemplated by the treaty.

3. Form of Government agency to be established to operate the Panama Canal.

Legislation to be enacted by the Congress must establish the Government agency to operate the canal and provide the ground rules for its operation.

Article III of the Panama Canal treaty provides that the United States will carry out its responsibilities by means of a U.S. Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission "which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America." The treaty also provides that the Panama Canal Commission "shall be supervised" by a Board composed of nine members, five of whom are to be U.S. nationals and four nationals of Panama.

From the time of completion of the canal in 1914 until 1951, the canal was operated by an independent agency called The Panama Canal. The Panama Canal was established and functioned in accordance with the laws of the United States generally applicable to all Government agencies, including the various laws governing the financial management of such agencies now largely incorporated in title 31 of the U.S. Code. Under those laws revenues derived from operation of the canal were paid into the Treasury, and costs of operations were paid from direct appropriations for that purpose.

In 1950, Congress transferred responsibility for operation of the canal to the Panama Railroad Company, a government agency in corporate form that had been used by the United States Government as an adjunct to the operation of the canal from the time of construction of the canal.

The corporation was renamed the Panama Canal Company and its operations were subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act as well as other applicable provisions of title 31 of the U.S. Code. Revenues from the operation of the canal and related activities are deposited in the Treasury or depository banks approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and expenditures are authorized by the Congress in appropriation acts authorizing the use of such revenues for the purposes set out in the corporation's budget program, as modified by the Congress in the appropriation act.

The 1950 legislation transferring operation of the canal to the Panama Canal Company changed the name of the agency known as The Panama Canal to Canal Zone Government with the responsibility of providing the various services incident to the civil government of the Canal Zone. No basic change was made in the form of organization of that agency. A brief summary of the history and laws applicable to the operation of the two agencies now responsible for operation of the canal and the government of the Canal Zone is included in the separate study of the relationship of the treaty provisions to the Constitutional power of congress to make appropriations.

In establishing the government agency for operation of the canal under the new treaty, the Congress could select either the corporate form along the lines of the Panama Canal Company, the non-corporate form, following the prototype of the original Panama Canal agency, or some combination of the two. Some of the advantageous features of the corporate form, such as business-type budgeting and audit by the General Accounting Office, have been referred to by the Comptroller General. On the other hand, the corporate form is particularly useful for business operations that are truly self-sustaining, and if a substantial amount of direct or indirect subsidy is involved, the conventional unincorporated government agency offers the advantages of closer control by the Congress. Of course, if the unincorporated form of agency is selected, the legislation could incorporate provision for business-type budgets and audit by the General Accounting Office.

A related matter of concern is that of providing for the qualifications and method of appointment of members of the Board to be appointed to supervise the Panama Canal Commission. This feature of the legislation will be especially important in view of the provisions of the treaty for division of the membership between nationals of the United States and Panama.

4. Ambiguity of treaty provisions.

a. General considerations. Ambiguities in the language of the two treaties pose serious problems of interpretation that are virtually certain to become the subject of future controversy. Although the U.S. treaty negotiators have offered their explanations of the ambiguous language, those interpretations have often been at direct variance with those published by the Panamanian negotiators. In considering the significance of these diverse interpretations, the United States Government should keep in mind the enumeration of the causes of conflict between the United States and Panama, published by the Government of Panama on the occasion of the rejection by Panama of the new treaties negotiated in 1967. The concluding paragraph of Part I of the document read as follows:

"7. Last, so as not to make the list of causes of conflict interminable, we mention the greatest cause, the constant cause, the cause that has daily contributed to keep alive the resentment of Panamanians and feeds a sentiment of rebellion against the offensive presence in part of the national territory of a foreign Government which acts in an arbitrary, totalitarian and absolute manner, contemptuous toward the presence of the territorial sovereign. We refer to the invariable conduct of the Government of the United States of America of interpreting the clauses of the existing treaties in the manner most convenient to their interests and contrary to Panama's rights and imposing their arbitrary and unfair interpretations with the power in their hands, and that Panama has not been able to counteract to date, of excluding and throwing out of the Canal Zone the official presence of Panama and the enforcement of our laws." Reprinted in Report on the Problems Concerning the Panama Canal. Committee on Merchant Marine & Fisheries, 91st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 87.

As the quoted statement implies, the diplomatic relations of the United States and Panama have been characterized by almost continuous controversy over the construction of the language of treaties and agreements that the United States usually has regarded as plain and unambiguous. To cite only one example, Article V of the 1942 Agreement for the Lease of Defense Sites in the Republic of Panama (57 Stat. 1232) provided that the defense sites would be vacated "within one year after the date on which the definitive treaty of peace which brings about the cessation of the present war, shall have entered into effect." In 1947, Panama asserted that the surrender of Japan constituted a "definitive treaty of peace" ending the war. The United States did not accept that interpretation, but eventually yielded to pressure and vacated the sites before the peace treaty was signed. The history of this particular disagreement is set out at length in the Department of State's publication Foreign Relations of the United States for the years 1946 (pp. 1095, et seq.) and 1947 (pp. 881, et seq.).

b. Payments to Panama. Paragraph 4(a) of Article XIII of the treaty provides for payment to Panama of an annual amount of 30 cents "per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalent, for each vessel transiting the Canal for which tolls are charged." (Emphasis supplied.) A Panama Canal net ton is clearly defined in existing laws and regulations as the basis for establishing rates of tolls for use of the canal. However, not all vessels are susceptible of measurement in Panama Canal net tons; some ships and other craft, such as warships, floating drydocks, etc., pay tolls on a displacement basis. Whether or not the phrase "or its equivalent" relates to the payment to Panama for ships that pay tolls on displacement rather than "Panama Canal" tonnage is not clear from the treaty provisions. If that is the intent of the provision, there is no criterion provided for determining what is the equivalent of a Panama Canal net ton in computing the payment to Panama. This could obviously become a matter of controversy and should be clarified before the treaty is ratified.

Paragraph 4(c) of Article XIII provides for a payment to Panama, in addition to other payments, of $10 million per year "to be paid out of canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission including amounts paid pursuant to the treaty."

This provision apparently contemplates determination of whether or not the payment is due on a cash basis. If so, and if "expenditures" are limited to payments actually made, excluding unpaid obligations, it could create a serious problem for the financial administration of the canal. The theory of the treaty provisions seems to have derived from the statutory provision that now requires the Panama Canal Company to pay into the Treasury annually the amount of funds in excess of the Company's requirements for working capital and for authorized plant replacement and expansion. (2 C.Z. Code 70). However, there are obvious differences between the language of the two provisions, and it is questionable whether the treaty provision would permit retention by the Panama Canal Commission of funds for working capital or plant replacement and expansion.

The precise meaning of this paragraph of the treaty would become a matter of considerable importance to the financial management of the canal under the new treaty, and its meaning should be clarified before legislation is enacted to carry it into effect.

A third ambiguity appears in paragraph 5 of Article III of the treaty which, after providing for payment to Panama of $10 million in reimbursement for certain services, goes on to provide that at three year intervals "the costs involved in furnishing said services shall be reexamined to determine whether an adjustment of the annual payment should be made because of inflation and other relevant factors affecting the cost of such services." (Emphasis supplied.) There is nothing in the treaty or other documents accompanying the treaty that defines what other relevant factors are for consideration in the adjustment of the amount of this payment. It was suggested at the hearing that the actual cost of services provided might be one such factor, but it would appear to be desirable to reach a firm understanding, with appropriate documentation, defining the meaning of the phrase in question.

Implicit in all the provisions for payments to Panama is an ambiguity arising from the absence of any language referring to the indebtedness of the Government of Panama to the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone Government, now aggregating some $8.5 million. In normal business transactions provision would be made either for set-off of this amount against the payments to Panama or for outright cancellation of the debt. Whichever result is intended, it should be clearly understood by both parties and incorporated in the legislation to carry the treaty into effect.

c. Property transfers. Paragraph I of Article XIII of the treaty provides that on termination of the treaty, Panama will assume total responsibility for operation of the Panama Canal which shall be turned over in operating condition and "free of liens and debts, except as the two parties may otherwise agree."

At the end of any year of operation of the canal as a continuing business enterprise, there remain and are carried forward obligations incurred in completed periods of operation, such as unpaid employee compensation, liability for unused leave, and other accounts payable, which aggregated $80 million in 1976, and are estimated at $87 million in 1978.

Whether or not the quoted provision of Article XIII requires the liquidation of these liabilities before the canal is turned over to Panama is not clear, but the ambiguity should be resolved to permit orderly financial planning and management in the period intervening between the effective date and termination of the treaty.

d. Use of the canal by U.S. Government vessels. Paragraph I of Article VI of the neutrality treaty provides that vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and of Panama "will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously." At the hearings on the treaties this provision has been referred to as providing that warships of the United States are entitled to priority in transit in case of emergency, but other statements in Panama by the treaty negotiators have indicated that no priority of passage is involved.

The statement issued by the White House after the meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14, 1977, discussed below, confirms that the provision in question "is intended, and shall be interpreted to assure the transit of such vessels through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly."

e. Defense of the canal. Article IV of the Panama Canal treaty provides that "Each party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack, or other action which threatens the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it." Article V provides specifically against intervention in the internal affairs of Panama by U.S. nationals employed by the Commission. Article II of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal provides that Panama declares the "neutrality" of the canal in order that it shall remain open to peaceful transit of vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, and Article IV provides that the United States and Panama agree to maintain the "regime of neutrality" established by the treaty "in order that the canal shall remain permanently neutral."

In the light of all these provisions the question has been raised as to whether the United States would be authorized to take appropriate action to keep the canal open if the threat to the operation of the canal originates in Panama. The statement issued by the White House after the meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14, 1977, states that under the neutrality treaty Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal shall be open and secure to ships of all nations and that each country "shall, in accordance with its constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal." The statement goes on to say, however, that this does not mean nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any U.S. action will be directed at insuring that the canal "will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama." Administration witnesses at the subcommittee hearing expressed the view that the treaty gives the United States the right to take whatever steps the United States deems necessary to maintain the neutrality of the canal, no matter what the threat may be.

f. Joint statement of October 1977. The statements issued by President Carter on October 14, and General Torrijos on October 18, for the purpose of eliminating the ambiguities in the neutrality treaty are intrinsically ambiguous in themselves.

Apparently the statements were entirely informal. On his return to Panama following his meeting with President Carter, the press reported that General Torrijos emphasized that he had not signed anything on his visit to Washington. Granting that the statement represents the personal interpretation of the treaty provisions discussed on the part of President Carter and General Torrijos, the effect of the informal unsigned statements as amplifications of the language of the treaty is at least open to question.

5. Constitutional issues.

In addition to the financial problems in operation of the Panama Canal under the new treaties, the treaty language poses two fundamental constitutional problems that are of even greater significance to the United States Government, namely, the requirement for action by the Congress to dispose of property of the United States and to make appropriations of public funds. The treaty language purports to convey property of the United States to Panama and to provide for payments to Panama without action by the Congress as the Constitution requires. These issues are addressed at length in a memorandum on the necessity for appropriations to authorize the payments to Panama presented at the subcommittee hearings on December 1, 1977, and in extensive hearings and briefings conducted by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the first session of the 95th Congress. A further hearing by the Committee on the constitutional issues is scheduled in January, 1978.

PANAMA CANAL OPERATION

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a letter and enclosure which I received from the Department of State on February 3 in reply to a request by the Committee on Foreign Relations for additional economic and financial data concerning the operation of the Panama Canal.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

We hope that this material helps to clarify some of the questions which arose during the hearing and stand ready to supply any additional information the Committee may need.

Sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS J. BENNETT, JR.,
Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations.

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE NEW PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

This paper summarizes research on the ability of the Panama Canal to be operationally self-sustaining until the end of the century and examines the implications of the Panama Canal Treaty on domestic and world commerce.

Research performed by the U.S. treaty negotiating team, by independent consultants and by various U.S. Government departments indicates that:

1. The Canal enterprise can generate sufficient revenue under the basic treaty to cover all its costs.
2. Opportunities for toll increases substantially exceed the revenues which will be required.
3. Cost savings opportunities are substantial.
4. The impact of likely toll increases on domestic and world commerce will be minimal, if not negligible.

CAN THE CANAL PRODUCE SUFFICIENT REVENUE UNDER THE NEW TREATY TO COVER COSTS?

Since 1915 toll revenues have risen from $4 million to $165 million in fiscal year 1977. At current toll levels they will increase to $210 million in 1985 and to $224 million in 1990. With a modest 25 percent toll increase, revenues would increase to $251 million in 1985 and to $268 million in 1990.

At the same time various estimates have been made of the Panama Canal Commission's operating costs. An exhaustive study on Panama Commission cost projects has just been prepared by Arthur Anderson & Company for the 1979-83 period. These projections conclude that Canal costs, including payments to Panama and including an inflation factor, will range between $241 million and $249 million in 1979 to between $237 million and $262 million in 1983.

The most significant impact of the new Treaties on future Canal financial operations will be the several annual payments to Panama which will be funded out of Canal operating revenues as operating Canal expenditures of the new Panama Canal Commission.

Article XIII of the Treaty specifies three annual payments to Panama from Canal revenues as an equitable return to Panama on the national resources it has provided the Canal. The first payment is calculated on the basis of 30 cents per Panama Canal ton for each vessel transiting the Canal. Five years after the Treaty goes into effect, this payment will be adjusted every two years to reflect changes in the wholesale price index. This payment should cost the Panama Canal Commission about $45 million in fiscal year 1979. This payment is a direct result of Canal traffic and would not, of course, be paid if the Canal were not operating.

The Panama Canal Commission will also pay Panama a fixed annuity of $10 million out of Canal operating revenues. This payment is a fixed expense of the Company and is not a function of traffic.
